One of the meteorological records is the amount of sunshine which last year visited certain places. Were such a record kept of the life of each of us, what would be its tale? What would be the story of last year? Would it be something like this—Sundays were generally sunny and quiet; Mondays, cloudy; Tuesdays, dull and cold; Wednesdays, windy and dangerous; Thursdays, gleams of sunshine through heavy rain-clouds; Fridays, brighter again; Saturdays, promise of fine weather? But the exhortation is to "Rejoice evermore." Only our rejoicing is to be "in the Lord" who never changes. Through every day as it comes, our minds should be turned to Him, and then, whatever our circumstances without, in Him we shall have joy and peace. The soul's weather-glass should stand at "Set Fair."

A review of 1895 from a religious standpoint cannot be very inspiring. It is always well to be cautious in making generalisations as to the drift of events in these days when life is so complex. But certain things stand out in the record of the past year. Public movements show that a wave of neglect for all that is distinctively religious is passing over the nation, and has infected our public men. Reformers are disheartened; the old cries round which the churches used to rally with enthusiasm are growing rare and faint, and the newspapers reflect the general state of apathy that exists among the people.

This, we are told by some, is the penalty of unwise and undue haste among those who lead the party of social reform, who are anxious to coerce their fellow-men into a better life by means of legislation. There may be something in the plea, and reformers must be wise as well as zealous. At the same time it is well to remember that every righteous law, whether local or national, must be for the ultimate benefit of the community. But no nation will ever be coerced into goodness. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

But there is surely more than that to be said. We are passing through a period of unsettlement. New influences are abroad, which are finding their way through current literature into circles and homes formerly quite closed from the incursion of worldly forces. A steady stream of French realism is pouring into the mind of the nation at large. It infects everything, and lowers the tone of public morals and of private conviction. The works in largest demand at the libraries are for the most part deeply contaminated with this degenerate spirit. What strength lies in them is derived from sensationalism, from vivid but doubtful scenes of passion, from situations in which the seamy, unregulated, self-assertive side of human nature is boldly and sympathetically depicted; and in which the old social conventions equally with eternal spiritual ideas are cynically and scornfully repudiated.

We are thankful to believe that alongside with this supply of doubtful literature there is a steady demand for what is "true and pure and of good report." Some great books have been published during the last year, and they are being eagerly read; and the literature of devotion has been strengthened by notable additions. If these appeal to, and are read by, the few rather than the many, we believe they will prove the seed of life, that will at last overcome the forces of death in the national life.

Meanwhile, we must rally round the great abiding truths which are the world's hope and strength. "And Elijah repaired the altar of the Lord that had been broken down." Let us repair the altar of God's dear Son, and plant the Cross of his sacrifice where all may see it and worship at it. The faith of our fathers has not spent its force. There is a great reserve of spiritual power latent in our churches, which waits development. All those who lead or bear office in them should be instant in prayer and wise in action, seeking every opportunity of reviving the evangelic fervour and faith whereby alone men can be saved. Brighter days will then soon dawn on our beloved land. For God over rules and reigns above; and these lower currents will not prevail against His redeeming purpose.

One of the many good resolutions useful to make at the beginning of the year is a better principle of selection in regard to the books we read. A large number of Christian people are strangely careless in this matter. A young lady said the other day, "I read everything, because I like to know which way the wind is blowing." The wind blows from all directions in the world of thought. There are always "airs from heaven and blasts from hell" about—breezes laden with the perfumes of Araby the Blest, and siroccos poisoned with the miasma of the nethermost pit. We shield our bodies from harmful blasts; shall we expose our souls to any and every hurtful gust of influence simply that we may know "which way the wind is blowing"? Let us turn our minds to better things—to the eternal law of right, to the steady stream of God's will, and inquire whither that is moving. Any book that can help us to attain to a better knowledge of Him is worth our while to read; any book that ignores Him and confuses us in our search for Him and his Truth is not worth reading, however up-to-date it may be.

A very effectual Gospel work goes on all the year round at the Soldiers' Home, Winchester, under the leadership of the Misses Perks and Mr. C. Edwards. Visiting it just before Christmas we found that a special mission was to have been held by Mr. Richard Weaver from the 15th to 22nd ult., but illness prevented the evangelist from fulfilling the engagement. The gap was filled in the emergency by Miss Mary Bailey, deputation secretary of the British Syrian Schools, who had been visiting the Home. This lady is a cultured and deeply spiritual student of Scripture, whose words penetrated very deeply, and were used by the Holy Spirit to the blessing of many persons.

Miss Bailey also awakened an interest on behalf of the work which she more especially represents; and very naturally so, for, after all, the movements of the Spirit in the hearts of men are very similar in Eastern or Western lands. All alike need his regenerating grace, which imparts the same light and gladness to all who receive it. We heartily commend both these missions to the prayer and sympathy of our readers.

It is said that the excessive physical exertion coupled with constant mental strain, to which the Welsh Methodist ministers are put shortens their days and sadly thins the ranks of elderly men. While many churches in England will not look at a minister who has reached middle life, that is, has reached his prime, the absence of venerable men from the Welsh ministry constitutes a serious problem. Nearly all the Welsh preachers, it is said, preach three times on Sunday, and walk from fifteen to twenty miles, truly a severe day's work, for the three services would add in physical strain alone some fifteen or twenty miles more, and then comes the brain exertion. The phenomenon is strange—a Christian ministry mostly of Timothy's—few Pauls, few Johns, few Peters. It is not healthy however it comes.

There is a heart-weariness that sometimes comes over Christian workers, which is one of the greatest trials they have to bear. Sometimes it is the reaction following a period of great success, as was the case with Elijah under the juniper-tree, and which is probably more physical and mental than spiritual. Oftenest it creeps on under the shadow of a long period of comparative failure in their work. The emotional demands of their duties are heavy and constant; they have to aim at always being in the spiritual state in which they can rouse and help others; and when these demands have to be met under dispiriting conditions, and are apparently followed by trifling results, the burden is sometimes almost too heavy to bear. This is just the time of the year when they are most in danger of this mood.

What is the remedy? Thronging duties make a time of complete rest impossible. The refuge from the recurring trouble must be spiritual. Jesus often retired into a kind of inner solitude even when He was busiest and could not get away from the multitudes. There was ever a quiet mountain-top as it were in the recesses of his heart, whither the Spirit repaired, and where He bathed it with pure draughts of the Father's love, returning into the busy world with energies refreshed.

And is there not a call here for a more deliberate personal cultivation of devout habits on the part of those who teach others? Their greatest peril is to forget their own needs, because so absorbed in the needs of those around them. Paul was keenly alive to the possibility, when he had preached to others, of being himself a castaway. And so he kept his body under, and cultivated his own higher life assiduously. And more, he ever begged, in solemn words, for the prayers of his converts. At this season, therefore, while we are thinking kindly, and praying earnestly for all sorts and conditions of men, let us not forget our preachers and teachers, with their special temptations and trials.

We quite agree with a correspondent in a contemporary who thinks that we are in danger of compromising the kingly dignity and majesty of the Saviour, by our great anxiety to make Christianity palatable to young men, and endeavouring to remove all their hindrances. Our Lord Himself never assumed an apologetic tone, neither did his disciples. He plainly announced that there would be troubles and offences; He insisted on the duty of carrying a cross and of encountering shame. The apostles gloried in the reproach of the cross. We shall not have Christians worth the name if they will not do the same thing. The authority of our Lord must be enforced—his title to be obeyed, as well as his love, set forth.

It is right to take every stumbling-block we can out of the way of anyone who wishes to enter the Kingdom of heaven, but is it these sincere souls who see stumbling blocks? Is it not more generally the persons who do not want to go in, and who want to find an excuse for their conduct? Wrong things ought always to be removed, because they are wrong, never mind whether anyone stumbles at them or not; and difficult things should be made plain—if they can. But we have never yet eliminated all mystery from the kingdom of truth, and we never shall. It would be a dreary and tame region if it lay all explored and mapped out, with turnpike roads running through it from end to end.

No doubt it is a pleasant and instructive thing to visit the remains of ancient civilisation, but how many of the travellers vividly realise that in their little hand Bible which they carry in their bag they have a greater force and a more marvellous wonder than anything to be seen in pyramids, temples, or palaces? The one is only a memento of the dead past; the other is living, spiritual, and active. "The passion of the prophets for justice and righteousness has counted for infinitely more in human history than the generalship, statercraft, and culture of these great Empires." Add to that the power which lives and moves in the story of the Gospels, and in the teaching of the Epistles!

Sir Arthur Cotton writes hopefully about agricultural prospects, if only English farmers and others on the land can be got to face their position and duties as other Englishmen have done. In view of the serious problem which our city populations force upon us—their poverty, their degradation, their separation from uplifting influences—one hails with relief any suggestion from a practical and competent man which promises a change for the better. Some agriculturists, it seems, have already proved by facts that "the capacity of the soil is far above all that has been hitherto imagined." Sir Arthur has grown a plant of Indian-corn from English seed nine feet high, with a cob containing 600 seeds of well-ripened corn. We have never believed that the world was populated beyond the capacity of the land to support everyone. Human ignorance and sin are the enemies to be combated, and the adversity we are passing through is a wonderful school for making ignorance learn.

Whilst cordially granting that England is greater in peace than in war, we cannot agree with The Investors' Review that our finest genius is expressed in the inventor and handicraftsman. Englishmen have done their best in souls, not in wood, stone, and metal. Our philanthropists and religious workers, our martyrs and missionaries, have done more for England's greatness than all her merchants as merchants. It may be a fine boast that "we have done more to spread the benefits of civilisation in the world, to lift mankind in all parts of the earth out of the dead infirmity of uncivilised routine, than any great nation the world ever saw." Milton, with a far truer insight into the meaning of her history and mission, admonished her "not to forget her precedence of teaching other nations how to live." It is another work to teach them how to live, than to bring to them material benefits.

It is delicate, and may sometimes be an oppressive and dangerous thing to lay hands on an industry by which many humble persons live. A late Chancellor of the Exchequer found that out when he threatened a match tax, and the match-sellers threatened him. Now we shall hear the cry of the laundresses, for the Laundry Act closes the work done in houses, and compels it to be done in a place conforming to certain regulations. This may be all very well as a protection against the abuse of small places in which many women and girls work, but it tells hardly upon poor but honest and careful women who take in washing. The help they get is from women whose husbands are often out of work in winter, and who really keep the wolf from the door. Perhaps our determination to have everything done according to act of Parliament creates as much mischief and misery in one quarter as it removes from another; at any rate, the cry is being raised from the laundries, "You have taken away our living."

So thoroughly Christianised have several of the South Sea Islands become that it would be quite safe to leave the natives to themselves, only that they are so troubled and tried by the white man and his sinful practices, and by his religious divisions and jealousies. The trader comes with his rum; the Seventh Day Adventist comes with his peculiar notions, and seeks to reap the fruit of other men's labours; the Roman Catholic comes with his unscrupulous self-assertion; the pleasure-seeker, with no fear of God before his eyes, comes, and lives like a heathen. It would be an unspeakable joy if the simple people could be left to their simple ways, living in peace and quietness, and looking for "the city that hath foundations" as their eternal home. To strengthen and safeguard them, their old friends the missionaries still have to dwell among them.

The efforts of the Board of Trade to keep our sailors out of the hands of crimps are meeting with a fair measure of success. The men have a strong leaning to the old free ways of handling their own money when they reach port, and then doing with it what they like, which generally is to waste it in rioting and drunkenness. But the offer of the Board of Trade to take care of their money, and to see them, when they land at a foreign port, safely shipped off home again, pulls hard on the other side, and once they fall in with it they seem to be very thankful for it. The measure has proved very useful at Dunkirk for a year, and might be happily extended at least to the chief Continental ports.

Archdeacon Wolfe, of Fu-chow, regrets the outcry which there is among the foreign community against the employment of lady missionaries outside the treaty ports, and strongly resists it. After thirty-four years' experience he has no hesitation in saying that a mission without a large staff of lady missionaries is destitute of one of the most potent agencies for the conversion of China to Christianity. The women, half the population of China, can only be reached by lady missionaries. The ladies also give great strength and efficiency to any mission of which they are members. These and similar facts are, we believe, so well fixed in the minds of missionary friends at home, that no fear need be felt of their withdrawing ladies from any part of the field. The present feeling is just one of those tests which are always coming to try faith and obedience.

It will be a wonderful day for art when it is consecrated to the highest uses. It may be clever while it is ungodly; it becomes entrancing and elevating when it enshrines divine thought, and is warmed with divine emotion. Tissot, the great French artist, made a fortune by his etchings when he was only a worldly man; but a change came over him like that which came over Millet, and now he bends all the strength of his genius to the reproduction of the scenes of the life and times of our Lord, and with marvellous results, it is said. The effect of the exhibition of his pictures was "curious and interesting." People were seen to go away weeping. Many came from the provinces with return tickets. Persons came to the pictures as to a shrine. Music might have a similar elevating power in the hands of a devout and loving man. When Jesus is taken as the Master of the whole man and the whole life, He will touch the finest gifts with a purer fire than that of their own peculiar genius.

A Letter of Farewell.

By REV. ANDREW MURRAY.

I FEEL as if I cannot leave England without writing a few lines to bid farewell to so many friends I am leaving behind.

There are the brethren in the ministry, and others in charge of the conventions, for whose loving and truthful welcome I never can be too grateful. There are those whose most loving hospitality at the different places we visited made us feel so truly at home while absent from our own home. There are so many with whom it has been our privilege to have blessed fellowship in the presence and service of our beloved Lord, of whom not a few greeted me lovingly as the members of my book congregation. From many others I have had letters—some of them, I am sorry to say, never answered—either inviting to hold meetings, asking for spiritual help, thanking for blessings received, or giving assurance of prayer.

To all these I feel more grateful than I can express for the love and confidence shown, and I can only say, "What thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?"

I know not how I can better express my good-bye wishes than by just giving you the words that were the keynote of our day of united prayer last Thursday at Exeter Hall.

In the morning it was LOVE. "Beloved; let us love one another, for love is of God." "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us." We want a deeper conviction of the sacredness, of the heavenliness, of love to each other; and to recognise in it not only a Christian virtue that makes us glad or good, but the very life and presence of God binding us into one. Let what God has given us together to taste of this joy be an incentive to expect a larger measure and a fuller display of its power. It is Divine love in its beginnings that makes us one when we come together in one mind and one spirit; that love made perfect in us will enable us to love even those who are not of one mind with us, and to make the blessed hours in which love has been in special exercise, the keynote of our whole life. God grant that the love that has bound us together may make us intimately and intensely one with every child of his, so that men may know that God has loved us, and given his love in us.

The word for the afternoon was PRAYER. Blessed bond of union between all God's children, that neither space nor time can weaken! Blessed link that unites us with our Lord and each other, and keeps up the living flow of the Spirit from the Head through all the members! Blessed power which, amid our earthly feebleness, makes love mighty through God to bring down the blessings of heaven to earth. With prayer in the name of Jesus a new power was brought into the world: be in prayer for all saints. And whether the All Saints Prayer Union, that was suggested, be formed or joined by us or not, let our prayer for each other become more and more the proof that we are wholly surrendered to Christ, and filled with his Spirit of intercession.

In the evening meeting our word was GOD. God, the everlasting One, who fainteth not, neither is weary, the strength of his people, who wait on Him! Yes, in that one word, God, we have all we need. From Him came the beloved Son, that to Him He might bring us back. From Him comes the blessed Spirit, giving his mighty power to work in us. Oh! that we knew our God aright! How simple, how natural, how unceasing, how blessed, would be our waiting on Him.

LOVE—PRAYER—GOD. My beloved brothers and sisters, may I in parting pass on these three words from our last day's meeting to you all. Love in the Spirit to each other, and to all saints; prayer in the name of Jesus; God, our Almighty God, to be waited on and trusted: this is a three-fold cord that cannot be broken.

In the faith that our God is visiting his people, and is very near to bless them with large increase of the spirit of love and prayer, and faith in their God, I commend you to Him. My heart thanked many whom I have not seen and met. May I ask each one to accept a loving greeting from my dear wife and myself. Our God is with each of us till we all meet in his presence!

"God's in His World."

A NEW YEAR WATCHWORD.

By REV. JOHN SMITH, EDINBURGH.*

THE Egyptian bondage was bitter to the Hebrews, and it lasted three generations. Year followed year and no relief came; the fathers dropped into the grave, broken with the toils of the field, but the sons had to take up the yoke which their fathers had let fall. Nor had they in all that time one great soul with whom God conversed, and whose words might stir and sustain their hearts. The latest memories of such communication and heavenly impulse lay four centuries behind. What a wonder that the very thought of God was not crushed out of their minds! But, marvellous to tell, it lived. Some might fall away, many corruptions doubtless crept in, but still the faith in Jehovah lived in the heart of the nation. Ay, more, they held fast, cowed and broken in spirit though they were, to the great promise of God to their race.....

Is there in all the world another such record of the obscuration and crushing of the religious instincts of a whole people, over so vast a period of time? Surely if, in an infantile condition, while its great principles were yet undeveloped and its imperishable resources were yet unrevealed, living religion could endure such an ordeal and burst into new life after such an interminable delay, then, come to full maturity, and reposing at last on complete spiritual foundations, it will resist every onset, blossom afresh after long backsliding and partial defeat, securing at length a universal triumph.

This is a most comforting thought. Watching the dying down of the spiritual, the resurgence of material interests and aims, the reappearance of the Pagan spirit in the advanced thought of the world, the lawlessness which owns not even a Divine superior, but is its own God, and lives for its own happiness alone, and which scruples not to end this life when it pleases, as having a right to do what it will with its own—watching these and many symptoms besides, one is almost filled with fear. Even in Scotland, the last stronghold of the spiritual, the breaking down of the old reverences and supports of religion is going on day by day. Must that end, as so many would like it to end, in the dying out of the spiritual from the life of men, in the fading of all supernatural revealings into conscious myth and illusion—in a mere life of the seen, bound by chains of sense and time?

Let us look at God's method as revealed in the long captivity of Egypt. Sometimes in a thousand years He does not perform the work of a day. But then again, in a day He does the work of a thousand years. We believe that, through all the decays of the present, God is moving on to some creative epoch yet to dawn, even as upon the long darkness of the captivity there broke, as in a moment, not only for Israel, but for the world, a new spiritual day.....

Through the decays that are in progress God is working to wider ends than we can conceive—to the universal subjugation of mankind under his sway. He is permitting a time of breaking down and decay that He may make room in his kingdom, more grandly realised, for those who are still without. The very social unrest is driving men in upon Christ, that they may find in his teaching loftier standards for individual living, juster conceptions of relative obligation. The widespread unbelief, the manifold antagonisms to contemporary religious teaching and life, are letting in a lurid light upon the multiplied divisions and surface differences of the churches; and are compelling all who own Christ's name to converge upon the essentials of spiritual Christianity, and to join heart and hand in bringing the world to Christ's feet.

Measuring our weakness against the wants of the world, we are rediscovering the fulness of the promises, realising afresh the might of the Spirit, and learning to throw ourselves upon the almighty risen Redeemer, in a large trust that will not be denied. While the captivity continued with ever-increasing severity, God was multiplying Israel exceedingly. While the wisdom of the world is triumphing in the seeming defeat of the faith, God is giving trophies of his grace on every shore. Some day the world, like the heathen king of Egypt, will run athwart the conscience of God's own, and wake to find itself powerless before a new creative day of religion—before Christianity triumphant in millions, ransomed and renewed by his grace.

The Years.

ONE by one the years are flying,
Like the snowflakes on the blast;
One by one youth's sunny tresses
Whiten as the years go past.

Many a loving heart has vanished
Over mountain, over wave;
Some are sleeping, with the snowdrifts
Lying on their lonely grave.

One by one the years are falling,
Like the snowflakes on the main;
Sunny seed-times, golden harvests
Never to come back again!

While our deeds of good and evil,
Traced in records of the sky,
Traced on Memory's mystic tablets—
Bygones! never change or die.

At the Old Year's closing portals,
At the opening of the New,
Hear, O Lord, our cries for pardon,
Self-reproach for life untrue!

Guilty, helpless—yet we're trusting
All-sufficient grace and might;
"God with us"—with this our motto
We shall walk with Him in white.

Tunbridge Wells.—For the past fortnight Mr. W. G. Carr has been conducting Bible Readings in this town. The interest has been very manifest, and the result must surely be that the Word of God will have a larger place in the hearts and homes of God's believing people. The meetings were large throughout.

Rallying Points.

I.—REPENTANCE.

"Let us return unto the Lord."—Hos. vi. 1.

"Let us go speedily"—"I will go also."— Zech. viii. 21.

UNITY is strength, and there is a holy persuasiveness about words such as these, "Come, let us." An abstract command would not have half the power to win reluctant hearts. In all life it is so. The general who would win the battle must himself head his forces. The farmer who would inspire energy and enthusiasm in his workmen is wise if he personally superintends his team. Even if it be not literally essential that

"He who at the plough would thrive Must himself hold or drive," yet the spirit of the proverb is true, and quite as true of spiritual husbandry as of the natural. The pastor who only preaches, and does not practise as well, need not anticipate any great spiritual movement amongst his people. The father who urges his child to tread the narrow way whilst his own feet pursue the paths of sin and death, will be very unlikely to produce a deep impression by his words.

"Come" and not "go" is the leading note in the Gospel symphony. "Come" was our Lord's own reiterated word of invitation, and the echo reaches down to our own day. "Let him that heareth say, Come" (Rev. xxii. 17). We are responsible to pass on the message in the spirit of the Master Himself, and as those who really care about the nature of the reception with which it meets. He has addressed us in the love-language of infinite grace. The Bible is not couched in abstruse or legal language, but breathes the very outpourings of God's heart, in terms easy to be understood. Our attitude, as his messengers, should be a similar one, and our persuasive cry be that of old, "Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord; I WILL GO ALSO."

"Come, and let us return unto the Lord," seems to demand early attention as we think of the many rallying points and rallying cries of the inspired Word. It is one which, at some time or another, applies to every child of Adam; for we have all gone out of the way of God, and need to return. There is no single exception to the rule.

"All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way," is the confession of the awakened soul. Our "own way" does not seem a very bad thing to us until the light of God's Spirit reveals the enormity of it. "There way that seemeth right unto a man"—his "own way" may seem to be so. Conscience, slumbering, may bring no charge; there is no open and heinous crime of which he can accuse himself; and yet, when the Spirit of God opens his eyes, he discovers that of this outwardly moral but Christless life God has said, "the end thereof are the ways of death" (Prov. xiv. 12); "Come, and let us return unto the Lord."

The one who has transgressed the law of man often seeks safety in flight; the friend who has betrayed his trust is glad to put distance between himself and his victim; the disobedient child hides even from its own mother; but for the wanderer from God there is only one resource open, and that is to return. To flee from God is impossible; our only hope is to take up the language of the Psalmist, and cry, "I flee unto Thee to hide me."

If there had anywhere appeared in space
Another place of refuge, where to flee,
Our hearts had taken refuge in that place,
And not with Thee.

For we against creation's bars had beat
Like prisoned eagles, through great worlds had sought,
Though but a foot of ground to plant our feet,
Where Thou wert not.

And only when we found in earth and air,
In heaven or hell, that such might nowhere be,
That we could not flee from Thee anywhere,
We fled to Thee.

This returning is genuine repentance. It is the discovery and the acknowledgement that our faces have been set in a wrong direction; that we have hitherto been travelling the wrong road; and it is the honest, deliberate turning of the soul towards God. This is true and practical contrition; it is obedience to the Lord's primary demand, "Repent ye, and believe the Gospel." The reason that there is so little belief is probably that there is so little repentance. We know how easy it is to point to the Lord Jesus one whose heart has been prepared by the plough of conviction. In our own experience we have proved—have we not?—that it is, most of all, the sense of our sin which makes the Saviour precious. "The Saviour and the sinner suit each other."

Amongst my readers is there one to whom these words have been, as yet, a neglected call? Oh, that with all the earnestness of a trumpet-call, and with all the tenderness which becomes a messenger of the gracious Lord Christ, we might once more urge you, "Come, and let us return unto the Lord." "Come thou with us . . . for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel" (Num. x. 29). Oh, we who know the Lord are never weary of returning to Him; as alas! we have many a time need to do so, and we fain would take you with us to Him, who alone can satisfy the heart.

To those who, as strangers to his pardoning love, are "afar off," and to those who may have forsaken their first allegiance to their Lord, may these Divine words come with constraining power, "Let us return unto the Lord." There is no other way of rest and peace but to "return" to the soul's true home and the one ark of refuge. "Come, and let us return unto the Lord." We shall not miss our way, for Christ is Himself the Way. We shall not miss a welcome, for whom the Lord invites He Himself goes forth to meet and embrace with rejoicing. "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him" (Luke xv. 20).

Out of my bondage, sorrow, and night,
Jesus, I come! Jesus, I come!
Into thy freedom, gladness, and light,
Jesus, I come to Thee!
Out of my sickness into thy health,
Out of my want and into thy wealth,
Out of my sin and into Thyself,
Jesus, I come to Thee.

Jewish Work at Birmingham.—A quiet and useful medical and mission work is being carried on in this city amongst Jewish women and children by Miss Werfel, a Christian Jewish lady. During the year the books show over 1000 attendances at the dispensary, where the patients have received advice from Dr. Blakeney, who has most kindly given his services throughout the year. Many thousand visits have been paid to the homes of the patients and others by Miss Werfel—who devotes almost all her time to this work. Encouragement has not been wanting; some have received the messages of God's love—all have heard it—and many hearts have been softened and prejudices overcome by the loving ministry of healing. If Christians only knew the patient suffering of these people—their unhappy lot, exiles from home and friends—in addition to their terrible spiritual darkness, they would help forward such a work as this. I shall be glad to communicate with any such. A. M. LERMIT, Treasurer.

Algerian Prisons.

By CHAS. COOK.

"Lord, show pity on all prisoners and captives."

LAST summer I paid a visit to Algiers and its prisons. The civil prison is away up on the heights of the old Moorish city, where I found 600 men, mostly Europeans. The place was tolerably clean, but each cell contained three or four men, apparently without books to read, or work to do. At the end of each corridor was a large dormitory, and here were imprisoned a large number of Moorish criminals. A good number of the prisoners were unable to read, and I discovered that I should have been forbidden to distribute the word of God among those who could, besides imperilling the liberties of Mr. Brading, the then missionary, who accompanied me.

Passing out into one of the exercising yards, we saw fourteen prisoners awaiting execution. None of them could read, and unfortunately they being Kabyles I could not speak to them, they not understanding French; my friend, though he knows five dialects of Arabic, was ignorant of their language. A morning or two later we heard the volleys of the soldiers who thus despatched these immortal souls into eternity.

We visited several other prisons, one in particular, some ten miles outside the city, filled with some 600 dark, swarthy convicts, many of whom were Spaniards. They were roughly clad, and poorly fed; sadness and depression seemed to have rested upon them, and hope, apparently, had entirely left them. We were unable to supply them with the Word of God, and forbidden to speak unto them the Gospel of Christ. How, then, will these captives ever hear the joyful sound?

The labours of our brethren, however, in the city are being blessed. I came across Moors here and there who had been brought from darkness to light. The following case was most interesting:—A young fellow about eighteen, who had been converted, was anxious that the missionary should visit his mother and uncle in the country, and we arranged to do so the next day.

On reaching the village we were hospitably received, and after the usual meal had been cooked and served, a short service was held. A hymn was sung, and then prayer was offered in the name of Jesus by the young convert. An elderly brother, also a Christian, followed in prayer, and then the missionary told out the Gospel to a small but interesting congregation. The mother was interested, but the uncle—who was in a rapid consumption I should judge—was anxious to know the Lord.

We left them amid profuse thanks, and praying God to bless his message, and specially to the dying man. Thus God is working among these Mohammedans, saving individual souls, who, in turn, are used to awaken an interest in the souls of others.

I was much interested in one of our brethren of the North Africa Mission, a native of Sweden, who is translating the Bible into the Kabyle language; and desire to bear testimony to the self-denying labours of these brethren and sisters labouring in Algeria. I had the pleasure of meeting also two of the lady missionaries from the interior, and bespeak the prayers of your readers for all who are working in this dark and needy part of our Lord's vineyard.

Religious Persecution in Russia.—From St. Petersburg a Berlin correspondent learns that a number of influential persons in that city, some of them members of the Russian aristocracy, will prepare a petition for presentation to the Tsar on the occasion of his approaching coronation, setting forth the grievous condition of the Baptists and Stundists in gaol and in exile, praying for their pardon, and for some extension of religious liberty to the Protestant peasantry of the south and south-west who have already sundered their connection with the Greek Orthodox Church.

The Turkish Massacres.

DEAR SIR,—The accompanying details of some of the awful events which have recently taken place in Asiatic Turkey, come to us from a source upon which we can most confidently rely. Your insertion of the statement in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN will perhaps increase the interest already taken in the subject, and, at the same time, deepen the sympathy so widely felt in our country for the sufferers. Whilst earnestly hoping that the accord which happily exists at the present time between the great Powers of Europe, in regard to Turkish affairs, may result in a speedy amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of the Sultan, the Evangelical Alliance keeps strictly to its own particular sphere in taking a special interest in all that relates to religious freedom.—Yours faithfully,

A. J. ARNOLD, General Secretary.

INCIDENTS OF THE MASSACRES.

Oct. 1.—The monastery of Verakugh, in the district of Komakh, was sacked.

Oct. 4.—The Sourp Anardzat Monastery at Pakarich was pillaged.

Oct. 12.—Five other monasteries in the district of Komakh were destroyed.

Oct. 21.—The monastery at Chokha, in the same district, was pillaged.

Oct. 21-24.—Eight monasteries in the district of Erzingen were sacked.

Oct. 22.—The church at Pesouan, in the district of Erzingen, was pillaged, and the priest, with thirty of his people who had fled to the church for refuge, were killed in the church.

Oct. 14.—During the massacre at Baiburt, the Armenian villages of Baiburt were summoned to abjure their faith on pain of death, and the people of four of these villages yielded to the pressure and declared themselves to be converted to Islamism. In the city of Baiburt itself the Archimandrite, and all of the school teachers, except the teacher of one primary school, who escaped, were put to death.

Oct. 24.—In the Terjan district of the province of Erzurum, about 1,000 Christians were killed, and the survivors only escaped by accepting Mohammedanism. The males among these converts, including the acting bishop of the diocese, were afterwards publicly circumcised, and the Muslims insisted that the "converted" women should be given at once as "wives" to their young men, as proof of the sincerity of their conversion.

Oct. 27-31.—The church at the village of Umudum was burned, and the priest killed. The church at the village of Tevnik was robbed and profaned. The church at the village of Koinik was pillaged, and the priest killed. The church at the village of Garash was sacked and profaned. The above-named villages are all in the plain of Erzurum, where twenty-four Armenian villages were devastated at the same time. The Armenian monastery at Hassan Kale was burned, and in it the Bishop and eleven inmates of the monastery.

Oct. 27-30.—In the district of Kara Hissar Sharki nearly all the Armenian villages (twenty-seven are known) were destroyed, numbers of the men killed, and a great many young women and girls were carried off to be incorporated in the Mohammedan population. The destitute survivors, fleeing towards the coast, have been turned back by Government troops. Many churches have been desecrated and pillaged. At Tamzara, in this district, the old and rich church of Sourp Takavor, a place of pilgrimage dear to the Armenians, was entirely emptied of its contents—sacred vessels, books, vestments, jewels, etc., valued at £6000. The monastery of Sourp Kevork was also pillaged. Two priests and two school-teachers (one of them a Protestant) were killed. At Purk, in the same district, the church was burned, with the people who had taken refuge in it.

Oct. 28.—At Enderes, in the same district, the church was burned, with a number of women and children who had taken refuge there.

Nov. 2.—Two priests were killed at Pingian, in the province of Harpoot. At Danzik, in the same province, the Armenian villagers, being commanded to become Muslims on pain of death, saved their lives by professing Islam. At Lijk, in the same province, the village was summoned to become Muslim on pain of death, but the result is not yet known.

Nov. 9.—At Missis (Mopsuestia), in the province of Adana, the commander of the Turkish troops of the reserves, with a number of his men, entered the Armenian church during service, tore the vestments from the priest's back, desecrated the sanctuary, poured out the holy oil and the sacred waters, tore up the Bible and prayer-books, beat the priest, and outraged his wife, who lived in rooms adjoining the church. The priest afterwards sought to make complaint to the civil authorities, but was imprisoned for slander at Adana. At Khizan, in the province of Van, the superior of the Armenian monastery was killed, his skin flayed off, stuffed with straw, and hung up in a public place. A considerable number of the population have been forced to become Muslims.

Nov. 5-14.—In fifty-three Armenian villages on the plains of Dulova and Kozova, in the province of Harpoot, the churches have been sacked, and many of them are known to have been destroyed. Scant returns have as yet come in, but many of the clergy are known to have been killed.

Nov. 11.—In the city of Harpoot, the Christian quarters of the city were sacked and many houses burned. Over 500 people were killed, and many others escaped death only by accepting Islamism. The churches and schools were sacked and burned. Many priests were killed with horrible torture. Others yielded to the pressure and became Mohammedans. The Protestant pastor at Koh, near Harpoot, was killed for refusing to become a Mussulman. The Protestant pastor of Hulakeuy escaped from the horde of butchering Muslims, and, with his wife, reached the city of Harpoot in safety. There they were taken from the house where they had found refuge, were ordered to accept Islamism, and, on refusal, both were put to death. At Itchae, near Harpoot, when the massacre occurred, a number of the people succeeded in escaping to the Armenian church, which was a strong stone building. Having been induced to come out they were allowed to pass the door one at a time. Each one, as he came out of the church, was invited to embrace Mohammedanism. All who refused were killed on the spot. Fifty-two thus accepted martyrdom, among them the venerable Protestant Pastor Krikir. The Armenian church has now been transformed into a mosque and the Protestant church into a stable. The latest information from the city of Harpoot is dated Nov. 26. The pressure to force both Gregorian and Protestant Armenians to become Muslims was very great. The letter adds: "Many martyrdoms have occurred in the villages." The four great monasteries in the province of Harpoot have been pillaged and burned. The Archimandrite Papazian, who was at the monastery of Tadoun, was subjected to horrible tortures before his persecutors finally became weary and put him to death.

Nov. 10.—In the villages of the Erzingen, the people, still threatened with massacre, refused protection by the Government officials, and finding no help from any source, are losing courage and becoming demoralised, and the tendency to escape from an awful situation by accepting Islamism shows signs of increase.

Nov. 11.—The Theological Seminary of the American Mission at Harpoot, with several other buildings belonging to the Mission, were pillaged and burned, in the unconcerned presence of the troops.

Nov. 18.—In the city of Marash many hundreds of Gregorian and Protestant Armenians—men, women, and children—were massacred by Muslims, aided, if not led, by the troops. Nearly all of the leading men of the Protestant churches of the city, and the pastor of the church which is affiliated to the Church of England were killed. The pastors of two of the other Protestant churches of the city have been imprisoned since these dreadful events. (The names of eighty-seven Protestants killed there have been received.) The Theological Seminary of the American Mission in that city was pillaged and burned by Ottoman troops.

Nov. 30.—In the city of Cesarea several hundred Gregorian and Protestant Armenians were massacred. It seems probable that in every case the offer of life on condition of acceptance of Mohammedanism was made. Numbers of women, and children of twelve years, were thus killed after refusing to deny their Lord. A considerable number of women and children in the city and surrounding region have been carried off as booty by the Muslims.

The Religious Tract Society has completed another annual distribution of Christmas gifts, which will, no doubt, brighten the season for the many lying in London and country hospitals, as well as for those who will spend it in soldiers' and sailors' homes, refuges for the destitute, work-houses, and similar institutions. The thanks expressed by the various managers bear witness to the warm welcome which these packets of cheerful and seasonable literature never fail to receive.

To Open-air Preachers.

THE annual letter to the members of the Open-air Mission, penned by Canon C. D. Bell, D.D., late rector of Cheltenham, and entitled "THE EVANGELIST AS A WATCHMAN, A WORKER, AND A SUFFERER," is the utterance of one warmly in sympathy and practically familiar with the work of the open-air preacher. Speaking on the motto of the Mission for the year (2 Tim. iv. 5), he says:—

"DO THE WORK OF AN EVANGELIST.

"That is, be a preacher of the Gospel of the grace of God, of salvation through the merits and death of a crucified Redeemer. Tell men of 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' and how He is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth. What a message you have to proclaim! Good news, glad tidings to the very chief of sinners! God has provided a way through which his banished ones may return, for He 'was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them'; and now, in the tenderness of a love that would have all men to be saved, beseeches them to be reconciled unto Him.

"What a privilege to go with this message into the streets and lanes and alleys of our towns, or into the highways and hedges, and to tell the sinful and the outcast of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus! It is the most blessed and the noblest work on earth. In this you are fellow-labourers with God.

"And what blessings attend the preaching of the Word! for through this we save souls; and to bring even one sinner to Christ; to be the instrument of turning men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God: to pluck souls as brands from the burning, and to set them as jewels in the Saviour's crown—he that has saved even one soul from the error of his ways has not lived in vain, nor laboured for nought. He has achieved a great work, and an imperishable work, for he has filled a vacant throne in heaven, and added a voice to its choir."

Mission Boat on the Oise.

AFTER a stay at Pontoise, the Bon Messenger was at the small village of Cergy. A good hour before eight o'clock, on the first day, crowds of people were gathering on the bank, and the workers were obliged to let them in. In less than five minutes the boat was filled. The cure of the parish came and attended the meetings regularly during the three weeks that the boat was there. To the last the meetings were filled nightly and the people were most eager to listen. Large numbers of Testaments and hymn books were sold.

After Cergy, the little vessel went to Jouy-le-Moutier, where it still is. Mr. Anderson wrote on December 12th, "Yesterday and the day before will be memorable ones. On Tuesday before seven o'clock a crowd had gathered waiting for admission. At ten minutes past seven every available place was filled and the doorways blocked. At the close we sold books for over ten shillings. The following evening the people were gathered at 6.30, and by seven every inch of space was filled. The platform was occupied, while people sat on each other's knees, and stood wherever there was room. We began at seven, and for more than an hour they listened with the utmost attention. I could not move as I spoke, for fear of knocking my neighbours. I do not know how many were outside, but we left the windows all open that they might hear something.

"The audience was composed of healthy, red-cheeked men and women, happy-looking and broad-shouldered. They were noisy in finding their seats, but once the meeting was begun they were silent and most attentive. We sold that evening, Testaments, Bibles, and hymn books for more than fourteen shillings. While the boat seats 156, the doorkeeper counted the people as they went out and found there had been 224 inside!"

While the weather continues so mild we shall be able to continue the meetings. We intend to take the boat to winter at St. Denis, outside Paris, on the canal, and our friends of the Wesleyan Mission hope to be able to utilise it for meetings, if the weather be favourable, as they have a work there. We again commend the work to the prayers of your readers.

The Power of Prayer.

By MR. GEORGE MÜLLER.

THE language of Psalm cxvi. 1, 2, might be the experience of every one of us, so far as God is concerned. Each might be able to say: "I love the Lord, because He hath heard my voice, and my supplications; because He hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon Him as long as I live." I strongly recommend young believers to keep a memorandum book, in which to set down the subjects of special prayer, and note the answers side by side.

THE GREAT SECRET IN PRAYER

is on no account to give way till the answer is given. It is a mistake to look upon faith as a gift, it is a grace which all may exercise. There were gifts in the days of the Apostles, of which faith was one. The grace of faith will increase in proportion to its use. When I began the life of faith in 1829-30, at Teignmouth, I remember how weak I was in faith as compared with now. I could then trust God for a shilling or a pound, but as time went on I found there was no limit to the degree in which I might trust Him, and I learnt to trust Him for hundreds and thousands of pounds. If I now knew that God had called me to a work needing £200,000, I should trust and expect God would give it; and thus invariably during the past sixty-six years. What I mention this for, is to impress upon you that there is nothing to prevent everyone having the like privilege, so far as God is concerned.

It has been a great joy to have been able to give instruction in schools to 123,000 children, many of them being under our care for as much as ten years; but the most precious answer to prayer in connection with that work has been that thousands of them have been brought to Christ, the spiritual blessing of the children being the great thing with me from the beginning. As many as sixty have been saved in one school in half a year, and many of those saved in these schools are now preachers of the Gospel at home or missionaries abroad. It was much laid on my heart to and in answer to prayer I have had the joy of circulating 274,000 Bibles, 1,425,000 New Testaments, besides very many thousands of portions of Scriptures, in various languages, so that these books have been scattered in almost every country. For example, when Spain was opened to receive the Word of God, I at once sent out 5000 copies at a time, and have continued to do so, though priestcraft is working as hard as possible to prevent the circulation of the Scriptures. Formerly in Rome all luggage was searched to prevent a single copy of the Scriptures entering into any of the provinces, and even travellers' pockets were searched with the same object; but as soon as Rome was opened to receive the Word of God, I was able to send out tens of thousands of copies. I only mention this to encourage you so to deal with God. Let each one ask, "What am I doing?" individually in this important matter; and why not begin, no matter in how small a way, to scatter the Word of God? The poorest may do a little with Testaments at 1d. and 2d. each, and Bibles at 6d. and 8d. upwards. There may be some who have never given away a single copy of God's Word; but if this is done with prayer, asking God's blessing, what might not be the results? Others may be able to do more. And I remind you of the many poor aged persons, who can no longer read their small-print Bibles. But for 2s. you could give them a large Bible, with good type, which might be a great blessing to them. If you will only begin in earnest, in a small way, and praying for God's blessing and help, you will go on steadily increasing, and you will realise what it is to be very happy in the Lord, and learn what it is to deal with God about everything. By little and little it came to me (though in myself weak and helpless) that by a kind of spiritual instinct I should turn to God with every need. And there is no reason why this should not be true of everyone of us, and that we should be able to say, "I love the Lord, because He hath heard my voice and my supplications."

MISSIONARY OPERATIONS.

As soon as I was converted I desired to be a missionary, and at five different times in the first eight years I offered myself as a missionary; but the more I prayed about it the more clearly I saw that it was not God's will that I should go out to the heathen, because He intended to use me far more in Europe than if I had gone to India. Meanwhile, I felt it to be my privilege to give every shilling or pound I could for missionary objects, and I prayed to the Lord to send me money for these objects, and from very small beginnings the Lord soon sent me money in abundance, even by thousands of pounds at a time, so that I have received for missions alone £253,500, simply in answer to prayer. This large sum has been sent to hundreds of missionaries in all parts of the world, in sums of £10 to £50 or more at a time, and very often I hear from them that the sum sent reached them in the very time of greatest need. Often and often beloved Mr. Wright and myself have found ourselves with no money in hand to send to the missionaries, but at other times we have had the joy of sitting down to arrange for the distribution of £1000 at a time, and then came back letters from all parts of the mission field, saying how God has cheered the beloved labourers.

Mr. Hudson Taylor, encouraged by the way in which God had helped me, went out to China in dependence on God, and, in union with Mr. Jones, did so apart from any society, simply trusting in God. They had their trials of faith, but they found how faithful God is to those who trust Him, and I have had the joy of helping many of the labourers of the China Inland Mission, which is now probably the greatest missionary institution in the world, and thousands of Chinese have been saved by its instrumentality.

This is all mentioned to encourage you to prayer and trust in the living God. My universal remedy for every trial and difficulty is prayer and trust in God; but one great thing is to seek only the glory of God, and not our own glory, and to do his work in his own way. The blessing that has rested on all these missionary efforts has been most abundant, and my hope is that you may thus more and more be encouraged to have great expectations from God in answer to prayer.

Common Lodging-Houses.

THERE are, within a bowshot of Westminster Abbey and the stately towers of Westminster Palace, a large number of registered common lodging-houses, accommodating more than 1800 men, women, and children. The houses visited by the workers of this mission on Sunday afternoons are occupied almost wholly by women and children; whilst the night work is confined to houses occupied by men and lads. A special feature of the afternoon work is the rescue of hapless, friendless, fallen girls. Since the formation of the mission in 1889, 120 girls have been taken in hand—rescued, reclaimed, restored to parents, friends, and relatives, and placed into homes and respectable situations.

The mission bands, consisting of members of various churches and chapels in the district, have laboured zealously in carrying the good news to those who, not attending any place of worship, would not otherwise have been brought under religious influence of any kind.

Funds are greatly required at the present time, also gifts of clothing, food, and Christian literature. The secretary is Mr. T. F. Moyes, 114, Earlsfield-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

Cruelty to Children.—The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children desire to make a forward movement, and to provide that third part of the country not yet under its protective care with the agency which has done so much to control unworthy parents. Where it is now at work it has reduced the pains and increased the happiness of 200,000 helpless children. To sustain what is now being done for so much of the nation as the Society is at work in, £55,000 per annum is needed. The director is Rev. Benjamin Waugh, 7, Harpur-street, London, W.C.

College Life.—5.

By CUTHBERT McEVOY, B.A.,

Classical Tutor of Regent's Park, New, and Hackney Colleges.

PATIENCE.

THERE are times when every stimulus to action seems withdrawn. The love of adding to our stock of knowledge fails. The hope of attainment is miserably dim. We are more deeply convinced than ever that the steep ascent which others have scaled so easily is for us insurmountable. The uselessness of the labour on which we are engaged presents itself to us with unparalleled clearness: no less vividly do we discern the attractiveness and utility of some other task. In that field we might succeed; in this we never can.

To work on at such times as these, not only without the prospect of results, but even in the face of discouragement, this is true patience. It is a virtue pre-eminent in great men. One might almost say it is necessary to greatness. Carlyle had lent the manuscript of his French Revolution to Mill: while in Mill's keeping it was burnt: when Carlyle heard of it all he said was that he must try to keep from Mill the greatness of his loss: and then he wrote it out again.

Two courses are always open at these periods of ebb. We may either give up or go on. The decision is made in a moment. It is by deciding in small things that we would always rather go on, that we are able to conquer when most hopeless.

One who is inexperienced in study is apt to think that college is a kind of talisman that will give him possession of all learning. He has heard a fine sermon which has made a deep impression. Knowing little of the varied experience of men and things in which that utterance had root, he is fired with an ambition to preach a fine sermon himself, and to make a similar impression. He vaguely feels that college will give him the power. After the first year—a year perhaps of valiant work—he looks for results. How much nearer is he to his ideal? If his work has been appreciative it will have been a daily revelation to him of increasing distances. He will seem farther away than ever. The delusive snow-peak which seems at first so near is really far withdrawn, and demands many miles of travelling in the dusty plain to reach its base. So with his ideal. But if he is right-minded, this discovery will act as an incentive. The harder the attainment the worthier the object. Without a backward glance let him march forward joyfully over the dull road, knowing that every step brings him nearer to the "ampler ether and diviner air" for which the God within him craves.

Of all things let him not content himself with a lower ideal than that he had before. Such a course will mean that he will fall as far short of his lower mark as he now fails of his higher. "Learn how far high failure overleaps the bounds of low successes."

By the narrowest way of perseverance and the strait gate of self-discipline that enduring power and usefulness are acquired. In the oft-quoted words:—

We have not wings, we cannot soar,
But we have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

To restless and emotional natures, whose power is rather explosive than enduring, patience is a counsel of perfection which they cannot brook. "Let me be up and doing!" they say. "Away with musty books and futile pedantry, let me get to my life's work in the pulpit, moving men's minds to noble ends, or in the far off mission-field, spending my vigorous years in valiant service for the delivery of them that sit in darkness." Your mistake is in asking to begin your work. Your work has begun already. The way in which you determine to master this principle of grammar or solve that problem in mathematics is earnest of your success in mission-field and pulpit. It contains in itself the promise of an awakened conscience in a thousand heathen whether at home or abroad.

When your keel touches the coral and you stand under the palms alone among a crowd of dull barbarians, what will it avail that by a niggardly nicety you saved yourself up and passed an examination with a minimum of effort? But who shall question the instant ascendancy you always have with you through these diligently-acquired habits of thoroughness, courage, and self-discipline, which find spontaneous expression in every word and deed, and clothe the whole personality with a quickening atmosphere of life? Were such habits of patience the only result of your education at college, you would have worked well to have acquired them. Your books are an admirable training in patience. The close and regular application demanded by the entrance into any new field of thought, the consequent curtailment of your pleasures, the belief that this uninteresting drudgery holds the promise of an inestimable blessing—all these features of your work of themselves call into play virtues of no mean order. But for him who can look further there is a brighter prospect beyond. The growing ease of intellectual power, the awakening to life of dormant faculties, the opening of a thousand unsuspected channels through which the soul, drawing nutriment from the commonest circumstances of life, becomes, instead of a stunted growth, such a flower of perfect beauty and liberal development as grows beneath the wide airs of heaven.

Milestones on Life's Journey.

A STUDY FOR THE NEW YEAR.

THESE speaking stones will serve as a few way-marks for wanderers, milestones for travellers, and guide-posts for pilgrims on the journey of life. Let us carefully read the inscriptions, follow the directions, and haste to our life-work in the name of the Lord; and remember that our journey, testimony, and service may end long before we reach the close of 1896. Then, if we are faithful for the Master, "That will be glory for us for ever." The lights and lessons of these remarkable Scripture stones are so plain and so appropriate at the beginning of the New Year, that "he may run that readeth" (Hab. ii. 2).

1. The stone preacher (1 Sam. vii. 12). Be thankful for past mercies.
2. The stone memorial (Josh. iv. 7). Be thoughtful for great deliverances.
3. The stone altar (Ex. xx. 25). Be careful with special instructions.
4. The stone teacher (Josh. viii. 32). Be obedient to solemn lessons.
5. The stone pillar (Jer. xxviii. 18). Be trustful for all things.
6. The stone witness (Josh. xxiv. 27). Be faithful to all your promises.
7. The stone testimony (1 Kings xviii. 32). Be decided for God and the right.

As on our railways, there are proper signals of danger, caution, and safety, so in the Bible are moral signals, which being attended to, may be passed without loss, and the city of God reached in peace and safety.—Is. xxx. 21.

Man is, as it were, a book; his life and actions are its contents. He may be as a folio, quarto, or octavo, yet death comes in like "finis" at the end.—Ps. xlix. 10.

A Scotch minister once had his own way of doing things. "Just as the year was opening," says one of his parishioners, "I was very busy in my shop, when right in the midst of my work in stepped the minister, without knocking or a word of announcement. 'Did you expect me?' was his abrupt inquiry. 'No, Sir,' was my reply, 'I did not.' 'WHAT IF IT HAD BEEN DEATH?' he asked, in a solemn, earnest tone; then away he went and left me to think it out." C. India's Hope.

By J. E. BUDGETT MEAKIN.

IN reading the stirring reports of the Keswick Convention in THE CHRISTIAN (and no one can imagine the pleasure and profit to be derived from their perusal till they have tried it far away from the scenes described, in a heathen land, where all the moral surroundings are so depressing), one small sentence has struck me as the greatest truth about India that I have ever yet seen expressed. I quote from Mr. Gelson Gregson's report of his tour:—

"There are native Christians enough in India to carry the Gospel through the country if they were endued with the power of the Spirit."

I feel as though it were useless to add more than personal testimony to this most noteworthy fact. Think what it really means! Think what a new light it sheds on India's real needs!

During the past summer I have been passing up and down this great empire, ranging through Bengal, Hindustan, the Punjab, Kashmir, Rajputana, Goojerat, the Mahrattha country, the Dekkhan, the Coromandel and Malabar coasts, Ceylon, the Central Provinces, Baluchistan, and Sindh, trying to realise somewhat of its vast diversities, its peoples, and its needs; of the darkness and light that here lie side by side. It would take a goodly volume even to outline all I have been privileged to see of mission work and workers—here a little, there a little—and of the feelings of admiration and praise which it has excited. But all the pages I could write could not tell of the awful needs which still remain to be met, of the work which is lying ready to hands that hang idle. The picture of it all is like a nightmare, the grossness unrealised at home of India's superstitious idolatry and devil worship. Islam and Buddhism seem daylight by the side of this heathen darkness, notwithstanding all its philosophic subtleties, and the real earnestness its devotees display.

But of India's 280 millions, already over half a million are Evangelical Christians, at least in name, and of these again some 4300 are engaged as Christian pastors or teachers, working side by side with 1700 foreign missionaries. It is here that the hope of India lies, for no land can become even nominally a Christian land till its own sons become its evangelists, and missionary work become superfluous. When will that day dawn for India? Why is it not already commencing to dawn? The men and the women are there, and if only those already set apart were counted, there are already sufficient to stir the land from end to end for Christ, "if they were endued with the power of the Spirit."

The truest test of the reality of Christian work is the proportion of converts who become evangelists. Numbers mean very little. It is quality, not quantity we need. The latter must result from the former. In so-called Christian lands but two operations are needed as a rule, cleansing and filling; but in these lands a third must precede, the change of belief, and though all three operations may, and frequently do, take place at once, too often the so-called "convert" is only converted in belief as to his ideas of the way in which to serve God, and his heart remains untouched. What we so often see with regret among those brought up at home amid Christian influences, yet who are not born again, is here intensified almost beyond comparison. I was informed by an American Methodist missionary that the average increase in the native churches connected with the branches of his mission in North India was 1000 a month, and had run to 1500 a month for months together. Leaving out the children, presumably included in these figures, the question is, how many were really converted, and of such—supreme test of all—how many have become Spirit-filled evangelists? Probably a very large proportion would have been only too glad to earn a livelihood as catechists, as teachers, or as pastors, but how many, all over India, have the Spirit's power?

It is not the multiplication of salaried pastors that India needs, but such lay-workers as Paul and Peter, Barnabas and Silas were; such can reach their fellow-countrymen as Europeans never can. Owing to the position of the English as the paramount power in India, the gulf between the missionary and the native yawns exceptionally wide, and is impossible to cross, except in the rarest of cases.

But the native Christian is to some extent in touch with us, and often makes himself ridiculous in his ill-directed attempts at imitation, as in matters of living and clothing. Over him the missionary has an untold influence, not so often shown by obedience as by the effects of daily observation and contact. Whatever may be the spiritual tone of the missionary, that, more or less, is the tone of the church gathered round him. Wherever I have had an opportunity of conversation with a native convert, I have asked what brought him to Jesus, and, in almost every instance it has been the life of some Christian—not always a missionary—which has first impressed him with a desire to know more of so good a Way. Argument alone was never the means of the conversion of a Hindu. To use the words of Barth, "the student of the Indian religious controversy, on which the Hindu dotes, and in which he excels, has no hold on his religion, which has, so to speak, no definite dogmas. Arguments sink into this soft mass, and are lost, like a blow from a sword on one of those inferior organisms which have no fixed centre of vitality."

But just as much as the example of the missionaries tells upon our native brethren, so the lives of those who hold the ropes at home tell on the missionaries, who will always be fairly representative of those from among whom they come. We cannot hope to see the evangelisation of India take place till her sons and her daughters are filled with power to undertake it, though there be sufficient for the task already declared for Christ. We cannot hope to see them seeking and obtaining this power till led to do so by its influence through the lives of their teachers. We cannot hope to see the missionaries as a body so endued and so sustained till we at home, from whom their ranks are recruited, are more generally Spirit-filled. God might, indeed raise up an independent set of workers for Himself, but that has never been his way; with us lies the responsibility, with you and me.

"Do You Ever See Any Results?"

How often is this question asked of those engaged in rescue work! Let the following extract from a letter received by us from a young woman supply the answer. We rejoice with the unknown worker, and hope that she will become acquainted with this encouraging testimony. We withhold the writer's name and address:—

"A fortnight ago whilst I was walking down Regent-street, a lady spoke to me, and gave me a folded card with the text, 'The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.' While the lady was pleading with me to give up sin and seek pardon, the Spirit of God so wrought conviction in my soul I saw what an awful doom awaited me. I earnestly prayed that God would pardon me and give me the gift of eternal life. I believe God heard my prayer, and that I am saved. My dear mother sent me THE CHRISTIAN as usual, and my eyes caught sight of Mr. Mark Guy Pearse's 'Christmas Plea.' I thought of home, and asked God to give me grace to go home and confess all, and before you get this I shall be on my way home. My object in writing this is that the lady that gave me the text may know that her labour is being blessed among us poor girls. I should have written to her but do not know her address."

Our Daily Homily.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 5.

"IF THE WAY BE TOO LONG FOR THEE, SO THAT THOU ART NOT ABLE TO CARRY IT."—Deut. xiv. 21.

GOD'S pitifulness is very manifest here. If the pious Jew found it impossible to transport all his tithes in kind, he might change them into money, and bind it in his hand. It was far from God's thought that his service should become irksome, or the soul faint in performing it. An alleviation was suggested, of which the worshipper might take advantage, if he would.

This principle may be applied in several directions. We are not to make God's service a toil, but esteem it a delight. "Thou shalt rejoice, and thine household." The Lord's Day should be the gladdest of the week; full of love and joy, and holy song. We should carefully guard against anything approaching to slavish observance; and be very careful that our children and servants should look forward to it with delight. Christian work should not be carried to the point of exhaustion. There is a mistake somewhere, if it so breaks down the health and spirits that the worker is not able to carry it. At such a time, we need to avail ourselves of any assistance or alleviation that may be possible. Acts of devotion, also, should be for our enjoyment and refreshment. It seems sometimes as though God's children relied more on length than strength, in their prayers. They are not at ease or natural in the Father's presence. The forms of their devotion are so numerous and prolonged, that they are not able to carry them. By all means maintain the salutary form, but not for form's sake. Let the joy of the Lord, taking pleasure in his presence, be always the first thought.

"THY BONDMAN FOR EVER."—Deut. xv. 17, R.V.

This is what we desire to be to Christ. We have forfeited our own natural inheritance, and have taken refuge in his house. For six years we have enjoyed all that Jesus could do to make us happy; has not the time come when we should say to Him, "We do not want to go out from Thee again, but to remain with Thee for ever"?

There are two stages, so to speak, in our dealings with Him. First, we come driven by fear; the produce of our own efforts has failed, we have no other resort. Like the bird fleeing from the hawk, we have made for his breast; like the sailor driven by the tempest we have taken the first harbour that offered. But when we have tested the blessed Master, and found Him so sweet and strong, we elect to remain with Him, not for his gifts or even his salvation, but for Himself. We do not wish to go out free; we love Him so dearly that we would rather go anywhere with Him than remain without Him.

This resolve of ours is ratified by Him. He nails our ear to his cross. Through the blood of self-sacrifice, and self-surrender; through our deeper appreciation of the meaning of his cross, as separating us from the old selfish life; through our identification with Him in death and resurrection; through our sacrifice of all that would hinder us—we come into deeper and closer oneness with Himself. As the Father bore through his ear, in accepting his glad delight to do his will, so does Jesus make real and permanent the consecration we lay at his feet.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7.

"THOU SHALT REMEMBER THAT THOU WAST A BONDMAN."—Deut. xvi. 12.

This gave the touch of gentle tenderness to Israel's treatment of the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. They knew what loneliness and desperate suffering were; and from their own experience could speak to the heart. Without tenderness and sympathy, what are our gifts to the poor worth? It is as important to give graciously and kindly as to give at all. None are so sensitive as sufferers, whether in mind, body, or circumstance; they are quick to notice the slightest roughness or harshness in our manner of bestowing relief; they would prefer a pittance given with tender sympathy to a larger gift flung at them grudgingly. But what can give this thoughtful sympathetic manner like the memory of our own sufferings, when we were bondmen in Egypt!

It may be that God is passing thee through some fiery ordeal, to teach thee and fit thee to be his almoner; touching and soothing as his outstretched hand of pity. Soon thy present sorrow shall be but a memory, but thou wilt be called to minister to the fatherless, the widow, the stranger. Always say in thine heart, God is passing me through this sorrow, and comforting me, and delivering me, that I may be able to comfort those who are in any trouble with the very accent, and caress, and tender word which He hath spoken to me.

In heaven itself we shall never quite forget that we were bondmen once, but were redeemed with the precious blood of Christ. This will give a new meaning to the song of adoring gladness.

"THAT HIS HEART BE NOT LIFTED UP."—Deut. xvii. 20.

Beware of pride! By that sin fell the angels. If they fell by it, how much more may we. When a man is raised from some lowly sphere to a position of commanding influence, he is greatly tempted to arrogance and pride. The adulation which he receives on every hand makes it all the harder to live humbly and unassumingly. But when once pride enters, it seems to close the heart to God. The proud man multiplies to himself chariots and horses, with the intention of making his position more secure, but he shuts out the help of the Most High. How necessary, therefore, that our hearts should not be lifted up.

The corrective suggested here is meditation on the Word of God. The king was to write out a copy with his own hand, and meditate on it all the days of his life; this would keep him in the lowlands of humility. The Bible is so true in its analysis of the heart, like a mirror it reveals a man to himself. It gives such exalted views of the greatness and holiness of God, compared with which the greatest human state is like the royalties of an ant-heap. It assures us that we must receive everything as the gift of God's grace. "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law, of works?" No, but by the grace of God which bringeth salvation, apart from merit.

May God make us humble, with a transparent humility, which is not conscious that it is humble, like the utter unconsciousness of the little child, who does not bend back on herself. Still and quiet your soul, dear child of God, as a child weaned from its mother; and be sure to feed humility on the sincere milk of the Word.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9.

"WITH ALL THE DESIRE OF HIS SOUL."—Deut. xviii. 6.

Here is the inspiration of a noble purpose taking a man out from his quiet life in some distant village, far removed from the great sacred city, and plunging him suddenly into the very midst of its holy engagements and services. Other men were happy there. What more did they want but the quiet routine of buying and selling cattle, tending vines, and cultivating their fields? But for this man these could not suffice. There was a light that excelled beckoning him on; a voice, which only he could hear, calling to him. He was not asked to come; his name did not appear on the rota of the Temple servitors; the great Temple might seem perfectly able to dispense with him; yet because with all the desire of his soul he longed to be one of the Temple Levites, he might minister in the name of the Lord, as the others did; and be supported, as they, from the Temple funds.

It is a blessed thing to feel an impulse like this. It may prompt to home or foreign missions, to some enterprise of self-denying ministry to the helpless and sad, to service for God or man. It may come on you like a strong current, fresh from the ocean, sweeping up into some quiet river or harbour basin, and lifting the ponderous barges. But when it comes, be true to it, nurse it, reverence it, thank God for it, trust and follow it where it leads. You will find a niche awaiting you, and the portions by which life will be nourished and maintained.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10.

"THEN SHALL YE DO UNTO HIM AS HE HAD THOUGHT TO DO TO HIS BROTHER."—Deut. xix. 13.

There is a Nemesis in wrong-doing; evil comes home to roost; what we meditate against others returns on ourselves. They that take the sword shall perish with the sword. The publican who sells drink to debauch sons and fathers lives to see the drink curse his own family. The man who is treacherous to women lives to see his own sons fall beneath their wiles. Adoni-bezek cut off the toes and thumbs of captive princes, and confessed the rightness of the fate which overtook himself.

And why is all this? Because God sits behind the slight curtain of the present, judging the acts of men, and "keeping watch upon his own." As in the Eastern town at dawn the judge sits to hear whatever cause is brought for trial, avenging the poor and needy, and punishing the oppressor; so does God sit listening, noticing, and passing sentence. Nor is it necessary to wait for the conclusion of the present age to see the sentence inflicted. Now the judgment is set, now the books are opened, now the "Come, ye blessed," and "Depart, ye cursed," are being uttered. God has so made the moral world that the seed of punishment lies hid in each unkind word, each unchristian act; and it is only necessary to give time enough to find that the man who has sown to his neighbour's hurt will reap that hurt in his own life.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11.

"WHEN YE DRAW NIGH TO THE BATTLE, THE PRIEST SHALL APPROACH."—Deut. xx. 2.

When Abraham returned from the slaughter of the king, the priest of the Most High appeared to welcome him, and to prepare him for the still more subtle encounter which awaited him with the king of Sodom. As Abraham drew nigh to that battle the priest approached.

Whenever a battle is imminent look out for the priest.—Do not go to the war at your own charges, you cannot stand against the mighty power of your arch-adversary. Look around, and see the Priest stand. What Priest? The Apostle and High Priest of your confession. He will offer prayer for you, and anoint your shield with the precious oil, and put his hand upon your hand as you feebly draw the bow. "What makes you so bold, my lad?" the captain asked of a stripling as he went into the fight. And the answer came quickly, "My mother put her hands on my head and blessed me ere I left our home."

Whenever the Priest has been near, anticipate a battle.—The best hours come to prepare us for the worst. The Dove descends that we may be able to stand for forty days against the devil. Do not be surprised at this. And whenever some experience of unusual radiance and helpfulness has visited you, say to yourself, "This is God's sweet way of preparing me against coming trial. Let me walk warily, for danger is near. The Priest has been with me, I am drawing nigh to the battle."

International S. S. Lessons.

JANUARY 12.
THE BOY JESUS.—Luke ii. 40-52.
GOLDEN TEXT (verse 52).

THE first and last verses of this lesson describe the perfectly natural growth of Jesus. The one (40) refers to his growth from infancy to boyhood; the other (52) his growth from boyhood until his public ministry began. In both He appears as a real boy, growing not only in body, but in intellect as well. His growth was on perfectly natural lines. The laws on which the development of body and mind depends were as applicable to Him as to us. His was a true humanity: boys may therefore speak to Him of their experiences with the assurance that He perfectly understands them. The only point of difference between Him and others was that He was perfectly free from sin, and was therefore a special object of God's favour.

It is interesting to think of the surroundings of the early life of Jesus. From the age of two years his home had been in Nazareth, a place which travellers describe as one of the most beautiful on the face of the earth. "It is situated in a secluded cup-like valley, amid the mountains of Zebulun. Its white houses, with vines clinging to their walls, are embowered amidst gardens and groves of olive, fig, orange, and pomegranate trees. Behind the village rises a hill five hundred feet in height, from whose summit there is seen one of the most wonderful views in the world."—Stalker. Here, with his brothers and sisters (Matt. xiii. 55, 56), He lived in a home where deep and true piety prevailed. Think of Him as submitting to parental authority (51), as attending the village school, as delighting in the study of the Old Testament Scriptures, and as communing with his Father in all the beauties of nature that surrounded Him.

Of the incidents of the boyhood of Jesus we have recorded only that with which this lesson deals.

The first Passover of Jesus (41, 42).—At the three great feasts Jews were required to be present at the Temple (Exod. xxiii. 17). When the children were twelve years old (42), they were expected to take part in these religious observances. To Jesus this first Passover must have been a most memorable occasion. Every detail of the feast He had already studied, and his spiritual vision, undimmed by sin, discovered the typical significance of all. Was it already dawning upon Him that He was the true Paschal Lamb; that the Old Testament feast would soon give place to another which would show forth his death, and celebrate a far more remarkable deliverance?

The painful discovery (43, 44).—Jesus "tarried behind" not in wilful disobedience of his parents. It is not wonderful that when Jerusalem was so crowded with people, He and his company should be separated. The parents discovered his absence at the close of the day (44). They "supposed" they had the companionship of Jesus when they had not. Are they the only persons who have made the same mistake? If you will examine, as they did, you may find that Jesus is not with you. How dreary and dark and hopeless life's journey must be when He is not with us!

The successful search (46-50). They were true seekers because they sought with hearts sorrowing for the want of Him (41), and with diligence and persistence. The "three days" included one for the journey from Jerusalem, one for the return, and one for the search. Note where they found Him (46). It is said that there were three synagogues in the Temple enclosure. One was in the inner court. Here the Rabbins explained the law, and here probably Jesus was found. The Temple was the most likely place to find Him; not only because here they lost Him, but because this was his Father's house (49). He felt at home here. Every part of it was full of significance to Him. His question, "How is it that ye sought Me?" seems to mean that they had no reason to expect Him anywhere except among the things of his Father. They found more than they expected (46-48). He was among the doctors, not as "a lecturing demonstrative child," but as an intelligent and thoughtful enquirer. He showed no immodesty or forwardness, yet He surprised all by the depth of his interest, and the intelligence of his answers. The surprise of the parents suggests that in the home "Jesus habitually observed a humble reserve." The first recorded utterance of Jesus (49) is important. It seems like a reply to Mary's word, "Thy father and I" (48). "My Father's house," says Jesus, "is here." It was the motto text of his life. All other considerations were secondary to the great business on which He had come.

The Children's Column.

LETTER FROM THE CHILDREN'S EDITOR.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS,—You will be wondering who I am, so I must introduce myself.

I am in the habit of meeting with many little folks both on Sundays and weekdays, so that quite an affection has sprung up between us, and we love each other dearly. But I delight to enlarge my circle of acquaintances, and so I want to spend one hour each week with you. If you are not otherwise engaged on the Lord's Day, we will have it together then; if your time is fully occupied on that day, then I want you to set aside another evening, when we can chat together and try to help each other in our daily life. I hope, too, that I may be able to help some parents who are anxious to entertain their children on the Sabbath evenings, and who frequently find it a difficult task.

This leads me to say that I want to hear from my young friends from time to time. I do not wish the talking to be all on one side. So I shall be very pleased to receive a line from any of my readers, and any suggestions for making the hour we spend together more interesting, will be heartily welcomed. Of course, you will not expect me to write to each of you individually; but I shall acknowledge your letters in THE CHRISTIAN the following week.

I shall imagine my young friends in family groups all over the world, and shall endeavour to make this page as interesting as possible, and to impart variety into it week by week. Sometimes we will have a story, sometimes a description of mission work, or a little talk from some Bible verse or narrative. But I particularly want to show you what a very fascinating book the Bible is, and you will soon, I hope, begin to discover this for yourselves.

I should like you to find out carefully the answers to some "Bible Searching" questions, which will appear each week, and send them to me on a post-card with your name and address. All correct answers will be acknowledged in this column a fortnight later under the initials of the sender.

Other plans will be announced as we go along; perhaps prizes may be arranged for; we shall see. So I will now end my letter by wishing you all a very Happy New Year.—Your affectionate friend,

WHAT A LITTLE GIRL DID.

YOU have all heard of the city of Tyre, which is spoken of many times in the Old and New Testaments. There are ninety villages which all belong to that city, and not a Bible was to be found in any of them not so very long ago.

But a little girl who had been taught about Jesus in the British Syrian Schools, Beyrout, went to Tyre to spend her summer holidays. She took her Arabic Testament with her and read verses from it to the people. They began to get quite interested, and used to look forward to her coming to them day by day. But at last her holiday was over, and they had to say good-bye to the book and its little teacher.

But they often thought and talked about her and about the beautiful words she used to read, until after two years they felt they must get a teacher of their own. So they wrote to Beyrout and asked for one to come, and whom do you think was sent? Why, this same little girl, who had by this time left school and was old enough to go as the teacher herself, and worked up quite a flourishing school.

Now there are twenty-nine schools, in different places, in which 3000 children are being taught about Jesus. Would not you like to help to send a teacher to another of those dark villages? I am sure you would. Then write to Miss Mary Bayley, 27, Homefield-road, Wimbledon, S.W., and ask her what is the best way to set about it. I know she would be so pleased to tell you.

THE "ROBINS" CHRISTMAS.

WHAT do you think I went to on Friday? A "Robin Dinner!" and in case you don't quite know what that is, I will tell you.

It was held at a big building in London called St. Martin's Town Hall, and a thousand children were there. Their fathers and mothers were all very poor, and I don't suppose many of them had spent a very bright Christmas. But this was their Christmas "party." And a wonderful party it was! There were tables spread with nice white cloths, and I think I never saw such bright faces and such a crowd of them! The children weren't very well dressed, of course, and they looked very hungry most of them; but they seemed as though they meant to enjoy their "party," and they certainly did.

First they had roast beef and potatoes and bread, and you should have heard them shout and scream, and try to sing bits of songs while they were waiting for their plates. A band was playing while they were eating, and they tried to keep time—on the floor with their feet, and on the tables with their fists and knives and forks. But they forgot all about the tunes when the ladies and gentlemen who were serving them marched into the room with the big plum puddings. Then there was such a scene, and such shouting, and cheering, waving of hats, stamping on the floor, and rattling on the tables.

After the dinner they each had an orange and a book and Christmas "crackers" given to them, and, after a few words from Mr. C. A. Bullock (who got up the dinner) and Rev. J. H. Scott, rector of Spitalfields, an entertainment followed, at which there was music, conjuring, and all sorts of fun, provided by about twenty ladies and gentlemen.

Some boys and girls who live in happy homes have collecting boxes for giving Robin dinners to the hungry boys and girls. If you would like one, write to Mr. Bullock, 7, Paternoster-square, London.

The Light of the World.

By PASTOR THEODORE MONOD.*

OUR Lord Jesus Christ has said: "I am the Light of the World." What man ever could speak, could think of speaking, such a word as that? Christ did not say "I possess a measure of light; I am able to teach the way," but "I am the Light," "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." We need not look for any further texts, I think, to prove the Divinity of our Lord.

I am addressing an audience of professing Christians, not one of whom doubts that Christ is the Light of the world. He dispels the darkness: the darkness of error with which we are surrounded, and against which every one of us should continually and humbly guard himself. Christ delivers us from the darkness of ignorance, which is great; which is total as regards the things of God and eternity. He delivers us from the darkness of sorrow; and in the night of sorrow causes us to see the day-star of hope. Christ dispels the darkness of death; so much so that many a time the dying Christian has been seen to be, not sinking from darkness to darkness, but rising from light to light.

We believe all this. We rejoice in it. We testify to it. We would be greatly scandalised if anyone should say that Christ is not the Light of the world. But Christ has spoken another word parallel to this. He has said "Ye are the light of the world," speaking to his disciples in the Sermon on the Mount; the sermon of which many are apt to say that it is their gospel—all that they believe in. Very well; Christ says in it, "Ye are the light of the world." Not "Ye ought to be," or "I wish you were," but "Ye are." Therefore Christ is now illuminating the world, dispelling the darkness of ignorance and sorrow and death by Christians, or, as we pronounce it, Christians. Do we believe that also? We must confess the truth, and say that we hardly do believe it. Perhaps we think it is a very humble thing not quite to believe it; a humble thing to say, "Well, we are not the light of the world, but we ought to be." That is not going to illuminate the world at all.

God does not now enlighten the world through the visible Christ upon the earth, nor through angels; but through men and women. We have to go about the world as lights, bearing about Christ, the very words of Christ to begin with; but far more than that, bearing about in our body Christ Himself. Paul said that he bore about in his own body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be manifest in his mortal body. And in our own sphere, as we are bearers of Christ, we are the light of the world.

What a glorious privilege is this! Let us not push it aside. Of course, we are very far from being the light of the world as we should be, as the disciples of Him who was the Light of the world. But suppose for a moment, taking our Christendom as it is, with all its misery and its folly, all its inconsistencies, and all its jealousies—suppose that it should suddenly disappear; that every Christian man, woman, and child, every witness for Christ, whether as preacher or otherwise, should disappear, and God should call them all to Himself to-day—what would the world be to-morrow? What would it be next week, and next year? The world would stand aghast at the darkness that would rapidly gather round it—the moral darkness and the intellectual darkness. Though in very feeble measure, we as Christians are yet the light of the world.

But we must be truly and fully the light of the world. How is that to be done? Where is the practical connection between these two words of Christ, "I am the Light of the world" and "Ye are the light of the world"? We may find it in another word of Christ in John xii. 35: "Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you; walk while ye have the light, lest the darkness come upon you. For he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light." Observe the three verbs; everyone of them is exceedingly important. "While ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light."

In the first place, we have the light. If we did not have the light what should we have to believe in? Of course those who want to find all their religion in themselves, and to draw it all out of themselves, cannot speak of any gift of God, or of any revelation of God to believe in. They take their standpoint in themselves, and they speak of themselves; that is not believing. But if we know that we must find another standpoint than our own brain, and our own feelings; if we seek for a rock in the midst of the surging waters, then we can believe. Believing is just resting on the rock.

Here we are speaking about the light, and we must have the light somewhere. Where is it? Everywhere, I might say. The glory of Christ fills the heavens. He is at the right hand of God. He is with us where we are every day by the Holy Spirit. Christ dwells within the poorest and feeblest of them that put their trust in Him. He is there manifesting Himself to every one who will see Him, ready to enter into every heart that will open the door for Him. He is there, as the sunshine is there, even for the blind man, though he cannot see it, who cannot enjoy the blessing of it until his eyes are opened. Therefore, when the Lord speaks to Paul at the time of his conversion, He says He calls him to make those people to whom he is sent turn from darkness unto light. How? Not by making light for them, but by opening their eyes that they may see the light, and turn to it from the darkness, and from the power of Satan unto God. Just so God is giving light to the world.

But then, what is the next thing? "Believe in the light." It would seem, certainly, that if God gives light to the world, the world would immediately receive the light, and rejoice in the light. But what does John say? "The Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." What does Christ say? "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, but men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." The natural bent of man is to close his eyes to light. What we have to do is to open our eyes to the light; and that is believing—letting the light which is outside of us come inside of us, so that we can say with the man whom Christ healed, "One thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see." Believing in Christ might be translated literally, believing into Christ. It is a taking possession of Christ. Believing is not admitting something about Christ, or even saying something to Christ; it is taking hold of Christ. It is always an act of the soul, not of the mind. It is the simplest act of all—so simple that one is almost afraid to obscure it by trying to explain it. Many a time the soul has suddenly given itself up simply to Christ—let itself fall into the arms of Christ, finding peace and rest, and it has said, "Is believing as simple as that?" Yes, it is as simple as that; but you have to do it. You must turn your eyes away from the darkness and believe in the light; you must thank God that He has given you the light, and must say, "That light is for me, that light shall be mine; that light is mine." Then you will understand the beautiful words of Paul to the Corinthians, "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ."

But what then? Having the light in your heart it must needs shine in your life. "Believe in the light that ye may be the children of light." What a wonderful thought! You are thinking, "If I have the light I will have to do this, that, and the other." Do not think of what you will have to do; think of what you will be. Think of what you are. If you believe in Christ at all, you are the children of light. You dispel the darkness wherever you go. You do not need to prove it; only show it. The light proves itself by its own shining.

Some time ago I heard a lecture in Paris about a new kind of photography. Some one has discovered the way to produce colours in a very beautiful manner, quite scientifically. I am told the man is hard at work trying to make the discovery thoroughly practical. The lecturer showed us some results already obtained, and they were very good indeed. The light was divided into four parts—white, yellow, blue, and green. He said, "You can see these colours?" Yes, we could see them. He told us that when he began he had to write on each colour its name, so that there should be no mistake. That was a poor beginning; but he kept trying, and now it could be seen without any writing that one was green and one was red. I am afraid there are some Christians of whom you could not say that they are light, unless you ask someone else whether they are or are not. It has to be written somewhere. But if we are light we shall shine away the darkness around us. We all have known, and do know, Christians—very likely humble Christians whom God has not called to speak much, or to stand on platforms—who are just like the electric light. They shine sorrow away; they shine sin away; they shine all bitterness away, by their presence; that is, by the presence of Christ within them, shining through their eyes, through their words, through their deeds, through their whole life. The practical consequence for us of these meetings must be—and if it is not this it will be next to nothing—that every one of us will go about saying to himself and herself, "Christ is the Light of the world; I am the light of the world."

Stand Steady—Stand Ready.

EACH at his station of labour,
Stand steady;
Pass the word each to his neighbour,
Stand steady!

One only purpose pursuing,
Each to be true in his doing,
Fit for the Master's reviewing,
Stand ready!

Swiftly and surely down-sinking,
Stand steady!

Life's golden measure is shrinking,
Stand steady!

Old Year and New Year are greeting,
A sigh and a smile at the meeting,
But never a pause in repeating
Stand ready!

Blithe when the sunbeams are sparkling,
Stand steady!

Brave when the storm cloud is darkling,
Stand steady!

Patient, all troubles betiding,
Steadfast, all changes abiding—
Blameless, though comrades are chiding,
Stand ready!

Faithful, with no one to praise you,
Stand steady!

Hopeful, though fear oft betrays you,
Stand steady!

True, and the Truth will not shame you,
Meek, and the Highest shall name you,
Pure, and the Master shall claim you,
Stand ready!

Fires of temptation may prove you,
Stand steady!

Nought from his care shall remove you,
Stand steady!

Arms everlasting are round you,
Trusting, no foe shall confound you,
Till the Master's approval has crowned you,
Stand ready!

Rev. H. M. Williamson, D.D., Belfast.

QUITE lately a notable meeting was held in Belfast to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the settlement of Dr. H. M. Williamson in Fisherwick Place Church, one of the largest and most leading congregations, in point of Christian zeal and liberality, in connection with the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The present may be a fitting opportunity for giving a short account of the life and labours of this honoured ambassador of Jesus Christ.

HENRY M. WILLIAMSON first saw the light near the quiet primatial city of Armagh, Ireland. His early education was begun near home, but when old enough he was sent to what was known as one of the Royal schools of the land, located in Kilkenny. He subsequently entered and passed through Trinity College, Dublin, and began his theological studies in Edinburgh soon after the Disruption. God had been pleased to reveal Himself to the young student before leaving his native land, and he started for Scotland with a clear knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour. Edinburgh after the Disruption was the scene of a great spiritual awakening. These were also the days of Chalmers and Cunningham, Welsh, and "Rabbi" Duncan. Among all the students of his year, none were more diligent, painstaking, and conscientious than Mr. Williamson. He was duly licensed by the Free Church Presbytery of Edinburgh in 1849.

His first place of settlement was Dunblane, near Stirling, where he laboured faithfully and fruitfully for about five years. From Dunblane the young pastor moved northwards to Huntly, a name suggestive to many of hallowed memories, and linked with the last Duchess of Gordon.

In the early sixties as our readers know, the North of Scotland was visited by a most remarkable manifestation of awakening and converting grace. In one of the extracts lately given in these columns from Mr. Radcliffe's forthcoming memoir, some deeply interesting recollections by Mr. Williamson were given. He threw himself into the movement with all the ardour of his Celtic nature. In conjunction with some earnest-minded ministerial brethren, and such zealous evangelists as Brownlow North, Reginald Radcliffe, Duncan Matheson, and Mr. Hay Macdowall Grant of Arndilly, Mr. Williamson carried the fiery cross of the Gospel far and near, and multitudes were won to Christ. In all these aggressive endeavours the Huntly pastor had the heartiest support and sympathy of the Duchess of Gordon. The great "Huntly meetings" of 1860, and subsequent summers, held in the grounds of the Duchess's mansion, were largely the outcome of Mr. Williamson's untiring ingenuity and devotion. The good Duchess died in 1864. She had lived at the Castle for almost half a century, and during the closing years of her life it was the privilege of Mr. Williamson to be both her pastor and friend.

After the death of the Duchess, the eyes of some earnest people in Aberdeen were turned to our pastor-evangelist. Through a railway coming near to one of the churches of the granite city, the company found themselves obliged to buy it, but allowed it to stand unused. These earnest Aberdonians conceived the idea of inviting Mr. Williamson to begin preaching in the empty church. After prayerful consideration he was led to accept the proposal, and began with fresh courage his new crusade. Soon a flourishing congregation was gathered. It was speedily "recognised" as a regular charge by the Free Church Assembly, and a fine soul-winning work was carried on in it for several years. There are those in the ministry and in the mission field to-day, who, as Mr. Williamson's spiritual children, look back with gratitude to God for his years of busy but blessed service in the pastorates of Huntly and Aberdeen.

During 1869, the congregation of Fisherwick Place Church, Belfast, were seeking a colleague and successor for their honoured minister, Dr. Morgan. The news of Mr. Williamson's success in Aberdeen had travelled across the Channel, and as the result he went back to his native land, to be a blessing under God to many of her people. His labours during all the intervening years, both in the congregation and in many parts of the country, have been incessant and greatly owned of God. It has been his privilege to rally and inspire those who longed to do aggressive and evangelistic work, but who were then met by more serious obstacles than confront them to-day. Many who heard his Gospel statements and appeals and his addresses bearing on the responsibilities of Christians, were roused to new zeal on behalf of those around them. Evangelistic meetings in cottage, hall, and street, were either born or found new life through the stirring and telling talks of the Fisherwick Place pastor.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey visited Belfast, for the first time, in 1874, and found in Mr. Williamson a whole-hearted colleague and friend. His heart, home, and church were alike open to help the work of grace in any way he could. Day after day he might be seen sitting by the side of some backslider or inquirer, and pointing him to the great Restorer and Saviour. Possessed of a vigorous constitution, he was able to go through an amount of incessant work at this time under which a man of ordinary strength must inevitably have broken down.

Simultaneously with the great meetings in Belfast, revival services were begun in Bangor, a few miles distant. Remarkable gatherings crowded the hall night after night and numbers were led into the light. The late Henry Moorhouse was present for three or four nights at the beginning of the work, and other friends helped, but the largest part of the speaking and arrangements fell to Mr. Williamson's lot. The late Dr. Donald Fraser, when in Aberdeen, once met a young minister there. As they were speaking together, Dr. Fraser said, "Have you met Mr. Williamson?" "No," was the reply. "Ah, well," said he, "there are not many sharp arrows out of the Word that he has not shot." These arrows from the quiver of the King were sharp in the hearts of the King's enemies at this time. The Bangor meetings went on for several weeks with deepening interest to the end.

Besides this more prolonged campaign, Mr. Williamson has been giving all available strength and time to his well-loved Gospel work. In different parts of the country his services are much sought after. He has been for many years a warm supporter of colportage in Ireland, and has taken a leading part in promoting the success of an inter-denominational society, doing a most encouraging work at present throughout the land.

Mr. Williamson's heart has gone out towards the heathen all through the years of his ministry, and his sermons on this subject have borne fruit both in regard to means and missionaries. Some twenty-four members of the church in Belfast have gone to the front, while others are engaged in various branches of Christian service at home. Although the rapid development of Belfast has been trying to a centrally-situated congregation like Fisherwick-place, our friend has been well sustained by a loving and loyal people. A goodly number of his devoted colleagues, like the late Professor Watts and Rev. John Kingham, have gone home; but others remain to cheer and encourage God's servant, who has been bearing the burden and heat of the day so long. A few years ago the united professorate of the Belfast Theological College and Magee College, Derry, conferred upon Mr. Williamson the degree of Doctor in Divinity, amid the good wishes of many friends.

Time has dealt lightly with our Gospel ambassador: through grace he has worn well every way, and there are many to warmly wish his closing days or years to be among the most useful of his long, faithful, and fruitful ministry.

Mission Work in Public-Houses.—Mr. J. J. Brown, L.C.M., special missionary to public-houses and coffee-shops in St. Pancras, held his fourth anniversary last week in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Camden Town. Earnest addresses were given by several friends and the missionary, and much interest was manifested by the landlords and their families, of whom a goodly number were present.

The Japanese in Formosa.—According to intelligence from Formosa, the capitulation of Taiwan-fu, the capital of the island, and the peaceful entry of the Japanese, which brought the long campaign to a conclusion, were due to the gallant conduct of two Scotch missionaries, Messrs. Ferguson and Barclay, who at the critical moment, when the excited population were expecting the worst, approached the Japanese and led them in peace into the city.

Mr. Radcliffe in Geneva.*

WORDS can never express what we felt when we found ourselves quietly settled at Les Grottes, Geneva, looking out from our windows to the lofty summit of Mont Blanc. But the beauties of the Lake Lemman, the Rhône, and the Arve, were only typical in the natural world of what we found of spiritual life in the disciples of Jesus. What charmed us far more than the natural beauties—splendid though they were, and lovely to gaze upon—were the love, the affection, and the innumerable little kindnesses of the dwellers around Geneva's lake.

One of the first welcomes was from Madame Merle-D'Aubigné. On April 13, 1862, the first meeting was held by Mr. Radcliffe on Sunday afternoon in the little chapel of the Rive Droite, Geneva. M. Merle-D'Aubigné prayed; and the blessed Spirit spoke to hearts.

The Word of the Lord seemed to run and be greatly glorified in Geneva, and around its lake, in the lovely villages and country houses that abound there.

One very remarkable meeting was held in the Casino at Geneva. Mr. Radcliffe spoke of "the water of life," and it was a moment of solemnity and power when the speaker said: "Oh that I could speak your language! Oh that my voice could resound throughout Geneva, across Switzerland, across Italy, across beloved France, to cry to all, drink, drink, drink, at the fountain of living water! Oh, the love of God! May the Holy Spirit give you to understand this love!"

Madame de Mont Richer, with whom Mr. Radcliffe stayed while at Marseilles, made a very excellent interpreter. Her two gifted daughters, Isabella and Cecile de Mont Richer, who came with their mother to Geneva to assist at the after-meetings, helped nobly in talking to the anxious in the many meetings held in chapels, in rooms, as well as in the open air. Crowds flocked to hear the Word, and the little newly-translated hymns sounded joyously from all the gatherings.

I have lying before me a long list of prayer-meetings for women, conducted by different ladies in different places, Mlle. Gaussen, Mesdames Lombard, Madame Descombaz, Madame Ador, and others.

The young men had also many prayer-meetings. The children would not be left out; and they too had their prayer-meetings. Even the deaf and dumb met together for reading and prayer.

It was the cloud of prayer ascending, and presented by our High Priest, that brought down the shower of blessings—so rich, so copious, that flowed out along the banks of the lake where Cæsar Malan had prayed in faith; and Fletcher of Madeley had pleaded at Nyon; and the late M. le Comte de St. George had, by his consistent and exemplary life, commended the Gospel to his neighbours, year after year, at his chateau at Changins.

A very interesting meeting took place in our drawing-room at Les Grottes, of a number of deaf and dumb people. Mr. Radcliffe invited them to refreshments, and we had really quite a gay party; the joy of these dear afflicted people was manifested in bright smiles.

Mr. Radcliffe spoke to them, Mlle. Gaussen interpreting his words into French; and then the gentleman who accompanied them to Les Grottes conveyed the address to them on her fingers. How eagerly they listened, and drank in the great truth of God's love to them! They often stopped the interpreter, to ask a silent but earnest explanation on their fingers. It was a happy meeting: and five months after a letter came to show how God had blessed his own through a double interpretation, notwithstanding ing a double infirmity. "With God nothing is impossible."

But the adversary would not let the blessing flow on without trying to stop it; and so Mr. Radcliffe wrote from Les Grottes on May 21:—

"We are being much encouraged by the way the Lord's work is going on here. The last two Sabbaths I had meetings in the open air, in a private field lent us by a gentleman for the purpose of preaching. People came out in great numbers. I have been prohibited by the police to continue speaking in the open air, but will believing Christians pray that I may still speak in the open air, that the people may flock to hear the Gospel, and that a great blessing may descend on Geneva and Switzerland?"

"The law in Geneva undoubtedly allows this; but our help must be from the living God."

The Government offered the court of the college to preach in, then withdrew. Then a gentleman offered the Infant School, and also withdrew. It was most astonishing, the dark-looking law papers that were handed to us peaceful people.

At last the congregation assembled on private ground, which was enclosed, where Mr. Radcliffe stood on the box of a carriage in which I was sitting with Mrs. Gordon, of Parkhill, and Miss Wilson, of Islington.

No sooner had we commenced singing—the multitude so quiet and solemn—than the Prefet de Police came forward, with a number of men behind him, drew out a most formal-looking little stick, mounted with silver, and put it—almost shook it—in my husband's face, and stopped the meeting.

Mr. Radcliffe then lifted up his voice, and said to the dear people, who were singing the beautiful hymn, "Jésus est notre ami suprême, Oh, quel amour!" "Arrêtez." Then to the Prefet de Police: "Do you take the responsibility of stopping me?" He said, "Yes!"

Addressing the crowd, Mr. Radcliffe said: "I am stopped from preaching, by the police; but I invite you all to follow me to my own 'campagne.' No power on earth can stop me." This was translated beautifully by a gentleman.

Then followed such clapping. I saw many fashionable ladies quite carried away by their feelings. Mr. Radcliffe begged silence, and told them to submit. At the same time we moved the carriage very slowly; and all the people followed, until those who did not know what was happening thought it was a fire we were escaping from. Every few minutes the carriage stopped, and Mr. Radcliffe announced: "I am stopped from preaching by the police, but I invite you all to come and hear about the wondrous love of God."

The enemy had outwitted himself, for the crowd increased during our slow progress up the streets of Geneva. On we passed, by cafés, shops, markets, and hotels, on by Protestant churches, on by the principal Roman Catholic Church, from which emerged black-robed priests, to gaze and wonder at the strange procession; through the green acacia trees of the suburbs: up to the "Campagne Gaussen."

The venerable Professor Gaussen himself, whose quiet home was close by, though unable to join the town meeting, came out to worship with us in the cool country air.

Mr. Radcliffe spoke, as he had promised, simple, touching words about the marvellous love of Christ, admirably translated, sentence by sentence, in the musical, ringing intonations of Parisian French.

Much prayer was made, and wisdom sought. We believed guidance was given. Mr. Radcliffe went on as if nothing particular was happening. A field belonging to M. Sillem was offered, and gladly accepted, near "Les Eaux Vives"; and there, I believe, at this happily-named place, "Les Eaux Vives" (the living waters), Mr. Radcliffe gave his last address to the crowds of Geneva.

The Month & Its Lessons.—I.

JANUARY.—The Cold Month.

JANUARY is the opening month of our civil year. "Januarius" was the name given to this month by the Romans, in honour of their god Jannus. He was supposed to preside over all gates, doors, entrances, and avenues, and therefore a fit guardian for the opening gates of the New Year. Janus is always represented as having two faces—the one looking backward over the past, the other looking forward into the future—a very suggestive thought for everyone who through God's mercy is allowed to pass into the new year.

WHAT THE COLD TEACHES.

1. Cold Atmosphere proves God's faithfulness (Gen. viii. 22). Cold atmosphere in nature is healthy, in grace is hindering.

2. Cold Weather gives the sluggard a chill (Prov. xx. 4). We must avoid the sluggard's sleep (Prov. vi. 9); sloth (Prov. vi. 6); and shame (Prov. xx. 4).

3. Cold Waters meet the need of the thirsty (Prov. xxv. 25). The cold water of the Gospel—blessing and comfort (Prov. xxv. 25; Jer. xviii. 14; Matt. x. 42).

4. Cold Refreshings show the ministry of love (Mark ix. 9, 41). Remember the Master's word. Refresh his saints and the reward will be ours (Matt. x. 41).

5. Cold Days try our faith (2 Cor. ii. 27). The way to keep warm is to keep Christ's love burning in our hearts (2 Cor. 5. 13, 14).

6. Cold Nights test our love. (John xviii. 18.) Peter's faith and love were cold, and fires of coal could not warm him, but the fire of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost did. (Acts ii. 4.)

7. Cold Hearts reveal our characters (Matt. xxiv. 12). Love in the heart is the great thermometer of the Christian life and service, the evidence of the Christian life, the mainspring of obedience, and the secret of true service for God (1 John iii. 14, John xiv. 15, 1 Thess. i. 3-9, John xxi. 15, 16, 17).

The ancients called January the cold month, frosty month, and winter month, and this is generally what we find it to be; but the winter frost and snow speak as clearly to us of God's wisdom, goodness, and love as the warming brightness of the summer sunshine (Ps. cxlviii. 8).

A minister going to church one Lord's Day morning, when the weather was extremely cold, was overtaken by one of his neighbours, who shivering said to him, "It's very cold, sir." "Oh," replied the minister, "God is as good as his word still." The other, not apprehending his drift, asked him what he meant. "Mean," he replied; "Why he promised about 3000 years ago, and still He makes his word good, that, 'while the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest and cold and heat shall not cease,'" C. EDWARDS.

Sailors in Port Said.

DEAR SIR,—May I ask the sympathy and prayers of your readers for a work that has been started in Port Said for the salvation of the many sailors who are continually passing through the Suez Canal? Two young ladies, Misses Ella Shaw and Anna Vausant, who have been connected with our mission work on this Pacific coast, and have proved themselves good soul-winners and tried workers, have lately opened a Gospel Mission in Port Said. They expect to have meetings every night.

We hope that the Lord will lay it on the hearts of many of his children to pray for these brave young workers, and if any Christians are passing through Port Said, we hope they will look into the Mission.—Yours truly in Christ. GEORGE B. STUDD.

The Missionary Bureau.

DEAR SIR,—At this time of the year, when Christian people are giving so largely to home appeals, we would put in a plea for assistance to meet the never-ceasing claims of the foreign field. Our treasury is very empty, more so than ever; and, besides meeting pressing claims, we have a lady worker waiting to go out to Haiti. Her outfit and passage will cost £30. It seems as though an open door awaits her there.—Yours truly, F. B. MEYER.

LIVERPOOL, JANUARY 1-5.

THIS week in Liverpool there is being held a Missionary Conference, which bears a complexion wholly unique and infinitely significant. It is convened under the auspices of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union, and is the largest and most representative gathering of Christian students ever held in Britain. Some 620 British students, men and women representing about sixty-five colleges of various denominations and faculties, have gathered with representatives of the volunteer movement in America, France, and South Africa. In addition, forty-five students are expected from the Continent, belonging to institutions in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

A Conference thus constituted may well arrest the attention and prayers of thoughtful Christian people; those who are familiar with the history and principles of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union will see in it a sure indication that the hand of God has been upon this Union for good; that an aggressive missionary policy dominates those who are to be the Christian leaders of to-morrow; and that the Spirit of God is pressing the students to approach with renewed earnestness the work of completing his kingdom.

What is the purpose of the Conference? (a) In relation to the students themselves. In the first place, the Conference is to be a rally of the student volunteers, those who are entered upon the register of the Union as "purposing, if God permit, to become foreign missionaries." The student-body is fluctuating, college life is a formative period, college interests are often distracting, and it is needful from time to time to bring together the volunteers that they may meet their "fellow labourers in the Gospel," and that each may encourage the other to "cleave with full purpose of heart unto the Lord and the Lord's work."

In the second place, the Conference is intended to anchor the missionary obligation with greater fixity in the hearts of all students who are not volunteers, those who, as the phrase runs, "find their work at home." Inspire Christian students with missionary zeal, and you will speedily find Christian ministers, members of Parliament, doctors, lawyers, bankers, merchants, and professional men of all kinds counting it a privilege to hold the ropes for their brethren who descend into the pit.

Moreover, at the Conference the students will come into close touch with the leaders of over forty missionary societies, and will receive from them encouragement and counsel as to the future development of the work, while these leaders will have an opportunity of consulting together as to how they can best use the forces at their disposal.

(b) In relation to the Continental Universities. The Christian movement among students, which during the last few years has been so strongly felt in America and Great Britain, has not been without fruit on the Continent; organised aggressive work has been undertaken, and students' conferences have been held in Germany, Scandinavia, and Switzerland. Hitherto, however, no strong and definite missionary movement has sprung up; continental missionary societies requiring educated men for their work, have had to do the education themselves. Surely it will be a mighty gain if God should use this Conference as a channel for pouring out a flood of his Spirit upon the foreign delegates and carry them back to their fellow-students to kindle a fire that shall never be put out.

(c) In relation to the whole Church. Missionary appeals without number have been made to the Church of Christ, appeals based on a Divine command or a human need, on an inexorable logic or an indisputable Providence. And yet from one quarter and another we hear the cry "Retrench!" One society after another finds it difficult to maintain its existing position, let alone the idea of making any considerable advance, by sending out the men who are purposing to go. The Church has not yet risen to her responsibility; to our shame be it recorded that the world's evangelisation is progressing with culpable slowness, not because men and women are not prepared to sacrifice much to go, but because the Church is not prepared to sacrifice even a little to send. While we humbly submit that the ultimate basis of a missionary appeal is found in the unconditional and universally-binding command of Jesus Christ, we cannot but feel that in addition to other appeals, based on the unfolding of a Divine Providence, which during the last forty years have stirred the Church, this Conference will present to every Christian man and woman yet one more trumpet-call to be up and doing—a call based on the providential bringing forward of men and women to go, in answer to past supplications for labourers; it will fix the mind of the Church on this fact, that God has called for the labourers and has thereby intensely deepened the obligation to send them.

As this issue reaches the reader's hand, the Conference will be in progress; let each one therefore who is called by the name of Christ, and in whose eyes the glorifying of Jesus Christ throughout the world has become of supreme importance, arrest for one moment the current of his thought and wish, and turn towards the Father the full stream of passionate prayer that He will use this Conference to satisfy the deepest longings of his Son. A report of the proceedings will appear in our next issue.

On a Spanish Railway.

SOME months ago a merry party of Spanish fishermen was returning by train from one port to another on the conclusion of a successful season; their spirits were high, and they were joyfully looking forward to returning to their homes. One of their number had but lately accepted Christ, and with him was his wife, Ramona, a very active and consistent Christian, of some eighteen months' standing. The large third-class carriage in which the party travelled was crowded with some fifty or sixty passengers, amongst whom was a young priest, easily distinguished by his sable garb. The fishermen, intent on amusement, quickly formed a plan to raise a public contest between the faithful Christian woman and the priest, who was sitting near. So with pretended gravity one of them soon began to ask her loudly if she thought it right to pray to the Virgin and saints? if good works could save? if confession should be made to a priest? etc., etc., and many other questions on which they thought that—

SHE AND THE PRIEST WOULD DISAGREE.

Ramona, young though she was in the faith, was Spirit-taught, and lifting up her heart in prayer to the Lord for guidance, took out her New Testament from her bundle, which she had with her, and inwardly rejoicing at the grand opportunity of testifying for her Lord before a priest, and to many others, she quietly read a passage of Scripture referring to each question put to her.

Answering the question: Ought we to confess to the priest? she replied, "We are commanded to confess our sins to the Lord, and 'He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness' (1 John i. 9). We are told 'confess your faults one to another' (James v. 16), and 'so,' she said, 'if I do an injury to a priest I ought to confess it to him, and if he does me an injury he ought to confess it to me.' "But," she continued, "you have asked me several questions, let me now ask you one. Do you know the only recorded instance of one who confessed his sins to priests in the New Testament?" As they were ignorant of the Bible, of course they could not reply. "Can't you think," she said. "Well, if you can't tell me, I must read it to you; no one could wish to follow the example there given," and she turned to and read Matt. xxvii. 3-5, of Judas confessing his sin to the priests, and afterwards hanging himself.

Soon the careless fishermen were interested in spite of themselves, and many others were earnestly listening around, some standing up and eagerly bending forward to hear what was really a very faithful Gospel address based on a constant reference to the Word of God. Others whispered among themselves, and, glancing at the priest, said, "Why does not he do his duty and stop this heretical woman?" Great excitement and interest prevailed amongst all the passengers. Meanwhile, much to their astonishment, the young priest said nothing, but he listened intently. Thus matters went on for some considerable time, till at last the priest's destination was reached, and as he got up to leave and passed Ramona, to the amazement of all, he said, "Many thanks, Señora, for what you have said and read. I have before." And then, seeing that the attention of all in the carriage was fixed on himself, he said publicly, "What the Señora has said is the truth; and what can be said against the truth?" He then thanked her again, and cordially shook hands with her and her husband, and got out of the carriage, leaving the occupants thunderstruck with the conversation, so different from their expectations.

All lightness and jocularity had now ceased, and presently a fellow traveller most earnestly asked where books like the one read from could be purchased. Ramona told him where Bibles and Testaments could be obtained in the town to which they were going; but thinking he might not have the courage to go to the Evangelical Hall, she offered to sell him her own New Testament then and there. He gladly accepted the offer, and bought it at once; she then had a further opportunity of putting the Gospel before him and others, and urged him to come to the Gospel meetings at their destination. He did so, and became more and more interested, was afterwards visited in his own cathedral town by faithful Christians, and after some months he boldly confessed his faith in the Lord Jesus alone as his Saviour.

Those who have not worked for the Gospel in Roman Catholic countries can hardly credit the subtleties and lies resorted to by the priests to prejudice men and women against going to hear its proclamation. This man, as he told us, had been solemnly warned that, if he entered the Evangelical Hall, some dreadful misfortune, perhaps sudden death, would befall him; he, therefore, took the precaution of taking with him to the hall two of his grandchildren, whom he left near the door, enjoining them to watch and notice what happened to him, and to go out and give warning to his friends should the Protestants try to kill him. He is now the only witness for Christ in his native town.

There are in our own country those whose hearts are not at rest; many are attracted by the enticements of Rome, and they think they will there find a peace and rest hitherto unknown. It may be that the Lord may bless this narrative to some of their souls, and that they may follow Ramona's example in searching the Scripture and finding what it saith upon each point which may arise. She herself had been converted by the prayerful study of the Word of God, having previously been an earnest Romanist, brought up to pity and despise all others; but when she had an opportunity of reading a New Testament the Lord taught her his own way.

GEORGE MACKINLAY.

The So. American Continent.

THE reproach of neglect which has long lain at our doors, as a Christian people, with reference to the vast continent of South America, is beginning in a small measure to be rolled away. A new effort for its evangelisation has been inaugurated under the title of the South American Evangelical Mission. It has had its inception in Canada, and Dr. Bremner, lately a practising physician in Toronto, as leader, is about to put into actual operation the plans of the new Society. A representative of THE CHRISTIAN conversed with Dr. Bremner a few days ago and obtained from him some details which will be of interest to the friends of missions.

The reader will naturally wish to know something of Dr. Bremner himself, and of the way in which he was led to make this new start in life at middle age. The doctor is an Englishman, with an English medical degree. Losing strength in the pursuit of his profession, he went to Toronto some five years ago. His health being restored, he recommenced work as a doctor, and built up an extensive and lucrative practice, chiefly in connection with the orthopaedic branch of the healing art. His mind and heart, however, were set on foreign missionary work, and he was led to speak of his desires respecting South America, to his Toronto pastor, Rev. T. B. Hyde. It so happened that Mr. Hyde had been reading the book on "The Neglected Continent," compiled by Mr. Millard and Miss Lucy Guinness, published by Messrs. Marlborough & Co., and he was in full sympathy with Dr. Bremner's proposals. "We must not let you go alone," he said; "We will do something to support you as a church, but that will not be enough; we must get others to join us." In the result, other Toronto pastors were interested, and this Society was formally constituted on Evangelical and unsectarian lines. Its executive council in Toronto comprises three Presbyterians, two Congregationalists, one Baptist, and one Methodist. The British committee of reference includes well-known Christian gentlemen of different denominations in Liverpool, Manchester, London, and Scotland. Its operations will be conducted financially on the basis of the China Inland Mission—looking to God for the supply of the needed means, without direct appeal to his servants and stewards.

Dr. Bremner, with his wife and three children, is now in England, and they hope in a month or so to start for South America. Meantime his companion in the work, Mr. G. L. M. Brown, is already voyaging to Monte Video, there to prepare the way for the arrival of the superintendent. In the interval before his departure Dr. Bremner is seeking to interest friends throughout this country in the future work of the Society. We earnestly recommend those communities which are able to further the project, to secure a hearing from Dr. Bremner; he may be addressed Cambridge Villa, Hadley-road, New Barnet.

It may be added that our friend, having devoted means as well as life and talents to his Master's service, defrays his own expenses from Toronto to South America; and, so far as time and ability will permit, he intends also to support himself and his family by professional service. We state this that friends who can show practical sympathy in the necessarily large expenses of the work of initiation, may know that the chief workers are fully consecrated to the Lord.

In a recent address at the Aldersgate-street noon prayer-meeting Dr. Bremner said:—

Since I gave myself unreservedly to God, I have been led to see clearly that God would have me go to South America. I was compelled to study that vast continent and was amazed to find its overwhelming need. In that huge country, sufficiently fertile to feed the whole population of the world, there are thirty-seven millions, and thirty-four millions out of these have never had a chance of hearing the Gospel at all. Yet it is a country near to us, commercially accessible to England and America. Think of the various countries in it. In the North we have in Guiana a monument of what God can do. Long years ago the Moravians began there on a self-supporting system. For fifty years they saw no result, but the blessing came and has continued ever since. It is no longer a heathen but a Christianised country. Next comes unhappy Venezuela, with 2,200,000 inhabitants, and only two or three workers, so far as I know. Then there is Colombia, with twelve missionaries to 4,200,000 people. Brazil has fifteen millions of people and 110 Protestant witnesses, including the wives of missionaries; Ecuador, with 400,000 people, has not a single missionary; Peru, with three millions, has but nine labourers; Bolivia, with 1,450,000, has no missionary at all; while Chili, with 3,300,000, has but sixty-one Gospel labourers. In Argentina, with four millions, there are from forty to sixty. Uruguay, with 750,000, has five missionaries; and Paraguay, with 1,260,000, has, I believe, one missionary.

It may be asked, What am I doing, or intending to do? I am taking my family to Monte Video, where I hope to start a training college, receiving young men from England and America, as the Lord may send them, training them in medicine, in the languages, and in evangelisation, in order that they may go all over the land, into places where there are no missionaries. There are numbers of centres where medical missionaries would find the door wide open at once. In many parts the people are longing to hear the truth. One man wrote some time ago an eager appeal for the Gospel, and coming into business hands, it was treated as a joke. We have, however, got into communication with that man, and he has proved to be intensely in earnest. In one dark place we have heard of in the course of a year, and bearing the consequent persecution.

God has laid this burden on the Anglo-Saxon race in England and America. Who will respond? We need prayer, we need volunteers, we need funds. People talk about self-sacrifice, but there are those who have never sacrificed a mutton-chop for Christ and his Gospel; and all the time the heathen are dying without God and without hope.

Missionary Work in the City.

ON Friday, Dec. 13th, St. Paul's Missionary Society, in connection with Hitchcock, Williams and Co., held its fifty-third annual meeting.

The report stated that there had been a slight increase in the funds, which are divided amongst the principal missionary societies; the various meetings, being morning prayer, Bible-class and evangelistic services, had been sustained throughout the year. Sir George Williams, the president, spoke of the necessity of deeper interest in missionary work, especially as we have lately seen such trophies of missionary enterprise as the African chiefs.

Rev. EGERTON R. YOUNG, the pioneer of mission work amongst the Red Indians, was not long in deeply interesting his audience, as he told of the triumphs of the Gospel amongst those people; a great measure of his success amongst them was due to his trust in them, bolts, bars, and keys being all thrown away, and throughout all his experience he had never regretted such a step.

Rev. W. CORNABY spoke of his work amongst the Chinese at Hankow, where he had laboured nine years.

Rev. A. R. BUCKLAND, M.A., in a few words told of the active part that women were now taking in the work of the Church Missionary Society, who have recently sent out a band to Uganda.

The closing address was by Dr. NEWMAN HALL, whom the chairman spoke of as the Wellington of the Christian Church. He quickly brought his audience to the motive power of the mission cause, which was, personal consecration to Christ, pressing home with great power the question, "What will you do?"

Most present voted that the meeting was one of the best ever held, and not a few received a rich blessing, which, it is hoped, will continue and permeate all the work of the Society.

St. Chrischona Institutions.

IN a recent circular letter, Pastor Rappard says:—"The Institute at St. Chrischona is full. Seventy-two young men are being taught in the Word, and instructed in various branches of useful knowledge, thus preparing themselves to serve the Master in such spheres as He may appoint [to them. The majority of our students are Swiss or German; this year, however, we have seven Russians and two Italians amongst the number. We trust that they may be the means of spreading the light and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ amongst their countrymen when they return to their own land.

"Sixteen brethren left us during the past year. Most of them are at work in different spheres as pastors, evangelists, city missionaries, etc. Two out of the number are just now staying in London, where they are diligently studying English, with a view of joining the China Inland Mission, and going out to that distant land in the spring of next year.

"The work of evangelisation is spreading in Switzerland, Germany, and Slavonia. Two encouraging facts are selected out of the reports of our evangelists. A wandering artisan came to the little town of Frauenfeld. There he happened to meet an old companion who had found permanent occupation there, and become a member of our little mission. He invited the wanderer to come with him to the Mission Hall. That very evening the Good Shepherd met the poor lost lamb. At the close of the meeting the young man came to the evangelist under deep conviction of sin, and found pardon and peace in Jesus.

"One of our evangelists in Slavonia owns a portable harmonium. One day as he was travelling in a third-class railway carriage he began to play on his instrument. His fellow-travellers gathered to listen, and he seized the opportunity to speak to them of his Master. Then he sang the hymn, 'Come home, come home, oh thou wandering child!' When he had concluded, he noticed a young woman who was weeping bitterly. She begged leave to copy the hymn, and added, 'It is now three years since I left my father's house against his will, but now I will return. I will write home at the very next station.' May she have found the way to her earthly and heavenly Father!

"The Home of Rescue has maintained its work and character. It has almost always been full, and amid much to discourage us there have been cases of restoration which cause us to praise the Lord for his mercy to the vilest sinners. Our receipts during 1894 amounted to £5992. Our expenditure was £5496, leaving us a surplus of £496, so that our old deficit is now cancelled. For this we give most hearty thanks to our Father which is in heaven."

Rescue and Prevention.

H.R.H. PRINCESS CHRISTIAN writes on behalf of the London Diocesan Council for Rescue and Prevention:—"The work of prevention and rescue was formerly, and is still, carried on by local associations, many of which were in existence before the council was formed. These are doing admirable service. They collect and disburse their own funds, and it is greatly to be hoped that their influence and power for doing good may largely increase. But they by no means cover all the ground. In places where no such associations exist, the same work is undertaken as far as possible by a ladies' committee appointed by the council until a local association can be formed.

"We endeavour wherever it is possible to remove young girls from bad homes or perilous surroundings, to place them in training homes or in carefully chosen situations, and to send those who need such care to special homes. It is necessary in our work to provide salaries for efficient workers and temporary homes for those who are brought under our care. There are still many large and very poor districts in every part of the diocese from which urgent appeals for help are constantly coming to the secretary. The funds at the disposal of the council are now completely exhausted—they have never exceeded £600 in one year, and at least £3000 a year is necessary if the work is to be done at all thoroughly.

"I and those engaged in the work plead for the protection of young lives, for the restoration of the erring—our own sheltered homes plead silently for the cause. I cannot believe that we shall plead in vain.

How to Make Giving Easy.

GIVING to God ought to be a great pleasure, and I believe it fails to be so because there is so little teaching about it, and what there is is generally so very uninteresting. As far as my experience goes, I have only heard once a sermon on "Giving," and when collection Sunday comes round it is looked upon as a hardship, or as a something that has got to be, and there are, alas! too few cheerful givers amongst us. It would be better that the reluctant givers should keep their money. Should we offer a service to God that we would not to one another, and who would be the recipient of an unwilling gift?

When I was quite a small child, I was staying in the home of a Christian lady, and whilst there she taught me this verse, Mal. iii. 10, "Bring ye all the tithes into the store-house, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove Me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

Many say that there is no use teaching a child what it does not understand, but no verse of Scripture, as I grew older, made so much impression upon me, and more especially as I found that my own dear mother, on limited means, with a large family, made the giving of her tenth the practice of her life.

There is no direct command in the New Testament to set aside a tenth, but we read, "Let every one lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." And why? "That there be no gatherings when I come." Does this not mean that there should be no collecting, that the money would be ready when the call came, and that, instead of being "reluctant givers," they should be "cheerful givers"? I believe that the tenth of the Jews was the proportion that God knew the poorest could give; but our command goes further, even as "God hath prospered us." A tenth out of a small income means a great deal more, accordingly, than the tenth out of a large income, and many who do not now even give their tenth could set aside much more without missing it.

How is this question of giving to be made interesting? Let it be taught in our Sunday-schools, in our Bible-classes, let us hear more of it from our pulpits, not merely as a duty, but as a loving service to Him who has done so much for us; let us hear more of an interesting nature of the work to which we devote our contributions—not a dry announcement the Sunday before "collection," with a few statistics equally dry, ere the plate is passed round.

I know of a church being worked up from a low state financially, through the judicious tact of its minister in introducing each Sunday some loving hints as to what we owe God. I know, also, of a Bible-class where some seventy poor girls support one of Dr. Guinness's black boys on the Congo at £6 a year, and they had a surplus this year of almost £3, which they forwarded willingly to another department of the same Mission. Each girl keeps a box into which she drops her weekly offering. It is every penny "cheerful giving," and why? Because each month this subject of giving is made a special feature in the class, and the object to which they devote their money is brought before them in as interesting manner as possible, through the medium of "Regions Beyond," and other missionary papers. They are now enthusiasts about missions, and have stirred up many outsiders of their acquaintance to think as they do in the matter of giving, and they do not confine themselves to this one work.

I have heard one young factory girl say, "I feel so ashamed when I think of how I used never to take any interest in missionary work. Every now and again there was an announcement in our church of a collection for missions and other objects, but I never felt it had anything to do with me."

There are some people generous by nature, and experience daily that it is more blessed to give than to receive, but with the majority the more prosperous they become in this world, the harder the heart grows to outside calls, and it can only be obviated, I think, by following the Bible teaching of setting aside a portion according "as God hath prospered us," and that portion should at least be the tenth of our income.

Calvary versus Mecca.

"ONE man may turn his face towards Mecca and another towards Calvary, and who shall dare to interfere? We Christians would be the first to safeguard the religious liberty of the Turks, and to defend their right to worship God according to their own convictions." These words have struck me in one of our leading social and religious newspapers. I read and re-read them with that growing uneasiness which comes to every soul that loves the truth and the whole truth.

What do these words mean? To their writer they may be simply his signature to the blessed charter of religious toleration, happily accepted in the greater part of the civilised world. Thank God for religious toleration—true, as Christians, we glory in it. But there is a growing liberality, which is becoming more and more fashionable—a fatal doctrine of indifferentism, paralysing every missionary effort, and lulling to a rest, one day rudely to be broken, those that are at ease in Zion; leaving to a false peace the souls that are satisfied to remain in their sins. In these days when one reads papers on the "Defence of Islam"; when the tendency is to make little or nothing of the vast abyss between a false and true religion, oh for a voice to waken the sleepers, "If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins" (John viii. 24).

At this moment, within one hundred yards of my barred Arab window, scores of long-robed Moslems are bowing their turbaned heads in unison towards Mecca. The call to prayer has just sounded across the soft evening air. As the "Allah Akbar" (God is great) falls on my ear I long for a clarion voice to ring out "God is Love," till it drowns the nasal singing of the moudhin*, and startles some of the few sincere souls with the thought that after all their great God is very far off (Jer. xxiii. 25).

Does it really not matter if their faces are turned towards Mecca or Calvary? Is it of no importance to God whether they look for salvation to his sent One or to him who came "in his own name"? Mecca or Calvary! Let us turn our vision toward each—let us listen to the voices that speak from each.

Mecca! birthplace of Mahomet, who in his early life stood, as it were, where two paths met—the way of the Cross, which led to eternal glory, and the way of the crescent and star of earthly fame and aggrandisement, leading, alas, whither? Calvary! which speaks to us of Him who in his temptation in the wilderness turned from the kingdoms of this world and their glory, all of which belonged by right to Him, and trod the path of scorn, rejection, and hatred of men, choosing to drink of the cup which his Father gave Him.

Mecca! from whose walls issued the "man of blood," leading in his van those who, like himself, should by the flashing of their swords call the vicious and lawless, eager for rapine and spoil, to follow in the hope of gain and glory. Cruel sword of cruel master, never sparing where it could not subdue, carrying no other message in its ruthless march but Surrender or die! Calvary, whose rugged rocks were stained with the life blood of Him who came not to destroy life but to save it; Him of whom never truer words were said, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." Where are his angel hosts? where the vast resources at his command? "if He be the Son of God"? "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight."

* The man who calls to prayer.

Mecca speaks of Mahomet, Calvary of Christ; therefore we have only to look at the life and doctrine of each to know whether it matters or not in which direction men's faces are turned. Here are these Moslems around us representing millions more living in selfishness, ignorance, and sin.

Why are their passions uncontrolled, their women despised and ill-treated, or kept for their master's pleasure? Why is there no idea of family life, no care for the sick, little or no education (apart from European provision), no justice, no thrift, no honesty?

Why do women's tears fall fast with no hand to dry them, and hearts ache and ache till death becomes a happy release? Why do little children grow up taught from their lisps to take God's name in vain, and to see his laws broken, until they believe that is the only life they in their turn can live? Why do men pray (?), drawing near with lip worship, and from the very threshold of the mosque lie, curse, and ruin the lives of those who should be bound to them by the most sacred ties? Why? Because they follow the prophet of Mecca, who himself was under the bondage of sin and a slave to his passions. Because they trust in a dead man who was impotent to rule his own spirit, and on his death-bed, turning to the women about him, uttered the truest words he ever spake: "I verily have not power to save you in any wise." Why? Because he knew nothing of the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world, nothing of the power which is able to keep from falling, and to give an abundant entrance into the presence of God.

What soul ever looked to Mecca and was transformed by "beholding"? What soul ever found a single inspiration to holiness or self-sacrifice in studying the life of the false prophet?

Not one-thousandth part of the case in all its social, political, sanitary, philanthropic, and above all religious aspect, can be put in this brief essay. How can any soul who has found salvation, peace, joy, and power, ever but feel a consuming desire that these poor sin-bound Moslems should turn their eyes from this deceiver of "many" (Mal. xxiv. 11) "denying the Lord that bought them" (2 Peter ii. 1), and find purity and peace at the sight of Calvary?

"Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord. How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophecy lies? Yea, they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart."

"Behold I am against them that prophecy false dreams, saith the Lord, and do tell them, and cause my people to err by their lies, and by their lightness: yet I sent them not, nor commanded them" (Jer. xxiii. 25, 26 and 28).

"Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for He shall save his people from their sins" (Mal. i. 21). "Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

The Children's Home.—The annual festival of the Children's Home was held on Friday evening in Exeter Hall. Mr. Horace Marshall presided, and addresses were given by Rev. Marshall Hartley, secretary of the Wesleyan Conference, and Mr. J. Williams Benn. Dr. Stephenson, the Principal, said that the institution maintains close upon 1000 children in training, and watches over 500 others, who, though they had situations, were still within the limit of those years when oversight and advice were necessary. There were now thirty children awaiting admission after conforming with the regulations concerning admission, and there were countless others who would like to be admitted if there were accommodation. Last year they made both ends meet financially. This year they hoped to do as much, but they were already a little behind.

Notes from Kimberley.

WRITING on November 4, a Kimberley correspondent refers to the recent drought and consequent famine, which has proved very serious to the entire country. He says: "By agreement between our Governor (Sir H. Robinson) and the Presidents of the Transvaal and Orange Free States, yesterday was observed as a Day of Humiliation and Prayer. Truly it was needed. We had a few drops of rain on Friday, but otherwise it is many months since we had any, and we have to be very careful and saving of our supplies, for the rivers are low and wells mostly dry. To show you how seriously the heat is affecting us, we are having large grass fires all around, which at night look very weird and strange."

In a letter dated Nov. 11, the correspondent says: "At last we have had much-needed rain. Two nights last week we had rain nearly all night, and yesterday we had a heavy thunderstorm, which has cleared the air, and to-day is fresh, cool, and pleasant. What we badly want is about a week's continuous downpour, for fruit, vegetables, milk, and even eggs and meat, are all dear, owing to the drought. In Johannesburg many of the mines have been closed for want of water, and we have had to be careful, for it has been in short supply with us."

"Yesterday and Saturday were Hospital Saturday and Sunday, and I should think from appearances there would be large collections. To judge by people going to and coming from the various places of worship, there were apparently large congregations everywhere. The law for closing of all shops, &c., is very rigidly carried out here, and even boarding-house keepers have to be careful, or they find themselves looked after. Specially noticeable is the closing of public-houses during the whole of Sunday, not, as at home, partly only."

"There is nothing reminds one so much of home, and seems to keep one so much in touch with English habits and customs, as the observance (outwardly at least) of the Sunday. But in Johannesburg it is far different, and I cannot but think with many that there must some day be a crash in regard to what is known as 'Kaffirs,' that will be in judgment on some of those who are responsible for a state of society on the Rand, which is worse than in any continental city."

The Farwig Mission.

THE report of this enterprising Mission shows that as the result of fourteen years' labour great changes have been wrought, and many sinners saved. Interesting details are given of the work among the children, the Bible-classes for the young men and young women, the cottage meetings, the lantern services, and the open-air work, through which many who once lived careless, drunken lives, a curse to their wives and children, are now living changed lives, seeking to win others to the Saviour.

A large social work is also going on. During last winter (and this) special efforts were made to aid the unemployed and destitute. The Sunday afternoon teas attract many outsiders. Special papers are given in the report on prayer meetings, Bible studies, Sunday evening services.

In conclusion the secretary says: "For the knowledge of victories won and any good that has come to the souls and bodies of men, women, and children, by the efforts put forth in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, we cannot but be very thankful. We have no desire to exaggerate any part of the work; but thousands of letters—some from friends with us now, others from many now living and working for God in other parts of our beloved land and in distant countries, and even from those who have greatly helped us but who are now in the Homeland with the King—confirm the words that eternity alone will reveal what God has been pleased to do through the many continuous efforts put forth at the Mission so dear to very many."

"The future we leave altogether in his hands. The growth and results of the work impose enlarged responsibilities, with fresh care and anxiety. But this is not the work of men but of God, and He will undertake and guide, sustaining those whom He may lead to labour on at Farwig, raising up others to help in the work as opportunities may arise."

Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

AT the beginning of this year an Association was inaugurated to get in touch with the cabin-boys on the fishing smacks, a large number of whom have no friends or near relations to care for them. Five hundred lady friends are now engaged in regular correspondence with an equal number of lads, with some very encouraging results.

Miss Woodman has completed a year's work at Ymuiden (Holland), a port much frequented by English fishermen, and her services have been greatly appreciated.

The Temple Tate, which is now too old for service on the North Sea, was in active commission during the whole of the Irish mackerel season (March to July), and the services held on board of her were well attended by the Manx and Irish fishermen.

In the North Sea the work has been prosecuted with as much vigour as ever, and seven clergymen and eighteen missionaries have visited the fleets during the summer for mission work. Many of the encouraging reports sent in have been published in Toilers of the Deep. The medical work has been well maintained, and three fully qualified surgeons have been constantly afloat on the North Sea throughout the year.

In Labrador the same staff as in previous years has been actively at work, and, in addition to carrying the Gospel to our fisher brethren in this barren portion of the globe, was the means of alleviating much distress and suffering.

Unhappily the financial position of the society is causing very considerable anxiety at the present time. During the past nine months, while the subscriptions have kept up most encouragingly, there has been a decided falling off in the sum total of collections, and donations and legacies. The finance committee, therefore, appeal most earnestly for prompt and generous aid, to enable them to grapple with arrears, and face their winter liabilities. With a view to relieving the pressing needs, Mr. Henry A. Campbell, chairman of the finance committee, offered £50, provided a sum of £1000 were specially contributed before the end of 1895. It is earnestly hoped that all will do their best to help in the present time of need. The secretary is Mr. Francis H. Wood, 181, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

A Bluejacket's Answered Prayer.

WHILE many Christians are discouraged by the indifference that abounds, and some even despair of ever again doing successful soul-saving work, we do well to encourage ourselves in the Lord, holding "fast the confession of our hope that it waver not; for He is faithful that promised": considering one another to provoke unto love and good works." Again this month I have received some striking illustrations of the power of prayer. A blue-jacket writes from the Mediterranean fleet:—"It seemed for a time after we left Alexandria as though all the powers of evil were let loose to force us back into sin; and alas! we had some cases of sad backsliding, but, praise God, most of us have been kept by the power of God. I have been not only tempted, but weak in body, and some days scarcely knew how to get through my work, but in answer to prayer the Lord has strengthened me, body and soul. There are some who say a man cannot live a Christian life in the Service; but my experience is that it is a glorious training-school to 'out and out' Christian life. This, I know, the Lord does keep me, and has opened a great and effectual door for helping others."

"A shipmate and I were struck with the amount of gambling going on upon the upper deck under the cover of an innocent game of cards, so one night we agreed to go and sit down amongst them with our Bibles; five of us in the midst of 600! We took up our seat under the electric light. First we sang a hymn, then knelt down and prayed aloud, and followed with a Bible reading, when a good number of men left the card table and joined us in singing hymns."

"We were stopped, because we had not permission. During the week we made it a matter of prayer, and on the Saturday requested to see the commanding officer, who granted us permission to sing hymns on the upper deck on Sunday evening from 8 until 10 o'clock. We had a good number of men round us the first Sunday and felt impelled to plead with them to turn from sin to the Lord. The chaplain gave me permission to speak as well as sing, and now for the past seven Sundays we have had a real 'salvation meeting.' The Lord gives us great freedom and boldness to speak for Him; 200 to 300 men to hear his truth, and that not only lower-deck men, but some of the ship's officers also come to listen."

"On one occasion, I felt led to tell them of my conversion and the Lord's dealings with me. The Holy Spirit gave me great freedom and power as I appealed to my shipmates whether God had not given me a power to live before them; what his Word says He will do. If ever men were convicted, they were; pipes dropped from their mouths, and tears from their eyes. To God be all the glory. Pray for us and soon many will be saved."

Confession of Sin.

THE views of a cautious and reverent writer on Evangelical holiness may interest some of your readers. Dr. Upham, in his book, "The Interior or Hidden Life," deals with most of the aspects of sanctification from a calm, philosophic and entirely spiritual point of view.

Speaking in the chapter "on the confession of sin," he says:—"There is a propriety and a practical importance in the confession of sin during the whole course of the present life, because our various infirmities, our defects of judgment, our frequent ignorance of the motives and characters of our fellow-men, and the relatively wrong acts and feelings which originate in these sources, from which no one, in the present period of the history of the Church, can reasonably expect to be free, require an atonement, as well as our wilful or voluntary transgressions."

"Christians, who are well-established in the interior life, whenever they have fallen into such errors and infirmities, experience no true peace of mind until they find a sense of forgiveness. For an error in judgment; for an ill-placed word when there was no evil design or intention of saying what was wrong; for an action, which was undesignedly a mistaken one, either through undue remissness or through undue haste; for any unavoidable blindnesses or ignorances, whatever, which are followed by evil and unhappy results, they find no resource but in an immediate and believing application to the atoning blood."

"Those who give good evidence of being in the possession of the blessing of sanctification, speak of their state in a qualified rather than in an absolute manner. In other words, they generally express themselves (and it is exceedingly proper they should do so) as if they hoped, or had reason to hope, that they had experienced this great blessing, and were kept free from voluntary and known sin. Such a mode of expression seems to be unobjectionable: it is consistent with confession, and corresponds to the precise state of the case."

May I humbly commend these weighty statements to those who appear to write and speak as if they had reached a state of finality in Christian experience, from which there can be no recession, and beyond which no advance worth speaking of, except into glory? If Paul "had not already attained," had to "take heed," had to fear lest having preached to others he himself should become a castaway, does it not much more behoove us to walk softly?

In conclusion, I will add, from personal knowledge and experience that there is great danger in connection with the holiness teaching of to-day, good as much of it unquestionably is, when seekers are led forward to claim a position above their spiritual consciousness, and to expect maturity without the normal processes of growth. Such professions have not infrequently led to disastrous breakdown, and manifest injury to the interests of true religion.

Letters to the Editor.

THE ARMENIAN CRISIS.

DEAR SIR,—While the whole civilised world is compelled by the latest and most defiant outbreak of Turkish devilry to acknowledge that Mohammedanism is hopelessly opposed to all human interest, and yet shrinks from the attempt to bind the demoniacal power, those who see this woe—its character, course, and limit—foretold in Scripture, as part of a grand and consistent chart of history, ought surely to be helping other believers in the Bible to recognise the landmark of the present crisis, and the great events which lie nearest to it in the scheme of the present dispensation.

By no wild guesses at the meaning of hieroglyphics, but by long and sober study on the part of many devout thinkers, the historical interpretation has been arrived at. It exhibits an astonishing correspondence between the points of prophecy, and the chief features of history, by which the interests of Israel and of the Christian Church are affected, and it finds the place of events now transpiring on the very edge of the consummation of all things, of which the supreme incident will be the glorious personal return of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The attitude of most Christians towards these prophecies is that of absolute neglect, which may be referred rather to the influence of confusing and discouraging traditions than to contempt of the prophetic form which God has so largely chosen for the revelation of his will.

If this is in any considerable measure true, surely now is the time for a very special exposition testimony, which could begin nowhere more appropriately than in London. A single great conference is too local and transitory. We want continuous teaching by competent expositors in at least four districts of the metropolis. There should, I submit, be a committee formed in each district, to gather a nucleus of sympathisers and establish relations with the churches. No man has done so much in this generation to promulgate prophetic truth as Dr. Grattan Guinness. Could not his invaluable leadership in this simultaneous study of the times be secured and his knowledge of like-minded thinkers be utilized?—Yours faithfully,

City Road Cong. Church. J. F. B. TINKING.

FROM A GRATEFUL READER.

DEAR SIR,—I have wished to add my testimony to the blessing derived from the "Daily Homily" notes, which are a constant help and refreshment to a weary invalid of many years standing. I thank you also for the benefit derived from THE CHRISTIAN generally; indeed I do not know what I should do without it, shut up as I am, and even when able to worship in the outer courts finding little spiritual food from the growth of Ritualism in our dear old church, sacred to Wycliffe's memory.

May I also endorse your correspondent's view as to "the rush of reports and magazines of charitable work," and which are expected to be paid for even after subscribing. They are certainly a great drawback in many ways. May I venture to suggest one means of escape—sending the donations with initials only through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN?—Yours very gratefully,

M. A.

Mr. and Mrs. Man Sukh Lal.

THOSE of your readers interested in the anti-opium movement will rejoice in the great blessing God is granting to the work of Mr. and Mrs. Man Sukh Lal in Scotland. During the summer months when meetings, as a rule, are difficult to obtain, they addressed over a hundred gatherings. Some of these were remarkable.

Since beginning our winter campaign God has again greatly encouraged us. In Denny, the testimony of the parish minister was that his church had never been so full since it was built. In Kirtcaldy an overflow meeting had to be held, which was larger than the original one; while for the following night the parish church was secured, the hall which had been taken being too small. At Galashiels over 1000 people assembled on the Sabbath afternoon and 800 the following night. Other large and very successful meetings have been held in different places.

Will your readers join in earnest prayer for far greater blessing still? If any would like to aid this work the treasurer is Mr. Forbes Moncrieff, 15, Hill-street, Edinburgh. GRANT JACKSON, Hon. Sec.

Victorian Jottings.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

MUCH annoyance has been caused by the action of the Postal authorities in allowing advertisements for beer and tobacco to appear on the address side of a new issue of postal cards. The public newspapers have united with the religious and teetotal portion of the community in decrying the innovation. A very large deputation has waited upon the Postmaster-General regarding the subject, and the advertisers have written to withdraw from the agreement, so it is expected the obnoxious advertisements will disappear.

In various forms the Mildmay Sisterhood of Deaconesses is being reproduced in this colony. Not only have the Episcopalians their deaconesses, but the Wesleyans are also training young women to take their part in women's ministry in the church. Recently, Rev. W. H. Fitchett, president of the Wesleyan Conference, in the presence of a very crowded audience in Wesley Church, publicly dedicated the first of these sisters—Sister Hannah—for special service in the church, she having already served a probation of four years. Sister Hannah is well known in Melbourne, and her Bible-class for young women is a great power for good.

At a Wesleyan annual gathering in a provincial town not long ago I listened to one of these probationers, Sister Lucy, describing her work in the slums of Melbourne. It reminded me a good deal of the work carried on by Miss Annie Macpherson in years gone by in Flower-and-Dean-street and that neighbourhood.

The New South Wales Presbyterian Fellowship Union, following the example of its Victorian sister, has established a Lay Preachers' Association. Mr. James E. Mathieson, writing some eight years ago, showed the crying necessity for lay preachers amongst the Presbyterians in England. They are required tenfold more in these colonies. Already the Victorian Association has proved a powerful auxiliary to the Church.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Victoria lately held its annual sittings. At the foreign mission meeting the venerable Dr. J. G. Paton was present, and had the pleasure of seeing a second son set apart for work in the New Hebrides.

On Saturday, the 16th inst., the Rev. Albert E. Blackwell sailed, per s.s. Rome, for India in company with a band of returning missionaries of the Baptist Church. Mr. Blackwell has devoted himself to mission work in India. Professor Whitley, of Melbourne, and Rev. Silas Mead, of Adelaide, accompanied the party, intending to visit the Baptist missions in that country.

The condition of things in the country at the present moment is truly lamentable. The winter has been dry and cold, little rain has fallen for months, strong winds have prevailed, and in some places frosts have continued up to the present. In many places the crops have perished altogether; in others, there is little to be reaped, while in many places the cattle are turned out to pick up what they can. The outlook is extremely dreary, for, unless rain comes soon, the dairying industry will also be attacked. The results will be felt in Melbourne in a couple of months; meanwhile the multitude seems bent on pleasure, and carnival after carnival is held.

Requests for Prayer.—For a special mission in St. Mary's, Wimbledon, by Rev. W. Bradbury.—For a mission being held by Mr. W. Thomson in Dublin.—For great blessing on a special mission at Bethany Hall, Caterham, by Mr. Monro Collings, of Gosport, from December 29 to January 5.—For blessing on a mission by W. R. Lane at Aldersgate-street Y.M.C.A., January 6 to 10, in connection with the City Bible-class Union.—For a month's mission at St. Just, by Mr. Clogg.—For a special mission by Mr. James Lovell in the Cage-lane Mission Hall, Plumstead.

Jews and Christmas Eve.—It has long been the custom among "strict" Jews to guard against anything like religious meditation on Christmas Eve, the aim being to show contempt for Christ and the Gospel. Those who work among the Jews see many evidences that old-time prejudices are dying out. Again this year Herr C. T. Lipshytz, of the Barbican Mission to the Jews, held a service on Christmas Eve. The Hall at 33, Finsbury-square, E.C., was crowded on the occasion, and an address on Jesus as the Messiah was listened to with marked attention. Hymns appropriate to the season were sung with vigour by the Jews present, who also paid close attention to the reading of the Holy Scriptures. The director gave an earnest address in Yargon, basing his remarks upon Isaiah ix. 6, which was much appreciated by his Jewish audience.

Temperance Notes.

THE borough licences in England and Wales show an increase in five years of 1524. There is also an increase in Ireland, and a decrease in Scotland.

The medical superintendent of Burghill Asylum states that more people were in that institution through cider-drinking than from any other cause.

The Mayor of Southport will entertain the Good Templar Grand Lodge at an official reception on the occasion of its annual session in that town at Easter.

The reports of police-court missionaries in Belfast and Cork show that upwards of 80 per cent. of the cases brought before the magistrates are connected with drink.

A temperance public-house has been opened at Newtown, Derbyshire. The club will be conducted strictly on temperance lines, and, at the same time, on business principles.

Lord Wolseley, inaugurating a soldiers' and sailors' institute in Norwich, said he could prove that the rank-and-file of our army were the most sober class in the whole country.

Mr. Frederick Williams, who succeeds the late Mr. James A. Birch as conductor of the Temperance Choral Society, is reorganising the choir, which will be confined to total abstainers.

On Sunday evening, Dec. 22, Mr. Tennyson Smith concluded a Gospel temperance mission at Penarth, near Cardiff, resulting in nearly 200 pledges. The lecturer is now resting in Birmingham, having lectured almost every night since the middle of September. He hopes to recommence work on Jan. 4 at Ormskirk, Lancashire.

Under the Massachusetts law which requires the municipalities to pronounce by an annual vote upon the question whether the sale of alcoholic drink shall be licensed during the year ensuing, Cambridge, the seat of Harvard University, has voted for the tenth consecutive time, "No licence." The event was celebrated by the ringing of bells and other demonstrations of joy.

At an annual prize distribution amongst farm servants at Glastonbury market, the first was awarded to a man who had "worked eighteen years without taking any intoxicating drink." The male winners of the other prizes had an average of thirteen years' total abstinence. The first prize for domestics was awarded a female who had been eleven years in service without taking intoxicants.

Personalia.

Rev. William Rogers, the venerable and beloved rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, lies seriously ill and in great weakness. The latest report is by no means favourable.

Mr. R. C. Morgan writes, nearing Madeira on December 10, thanking many friends for letters received before and since sailing. The passage up to the time of despatch had been favourable. It has since been announced that the ss. Moore, on which he sailed, arrived at Cape Town on the 27th ult.

Rev. Daniel Edwards, of Breslau, the veteran Jewish missionary, is about to retire from the post which he has held for fifty-four years. He is Scotland's first ordained missionary to the Jews.

Dr. Latchford, who for seven years has laboured devotedly as superintendent of the London Medical Mission, is leaving, to the deep regret of many who have been blessed through his means. Dr. Henry Soltan, formerly of Burmah and the Islington Medical Mission, has taken charge of the work in St. Giles'.

Mr. W. Harry Dawe, who has held for three years the superintendence of Sermon-lane Mission, Islington (founded and for many years carried on by the late Mr. George Fuller) is obliged to give up residence in London on account of Mrs. Dawe's health. He will be open after the end of February to conduct evangelistic missions in town or country. His address is 54, Liverpool-road, Islington, N.

Rev. C. F. Brown, who has been labouring in the United States for the past eleven years in the Methodist ministry, is now visiting England, chiefly on account of his wife's impaired health. He is well recommended by friends on the other side, as well as by those with whom he formerly worked in London. He will be glad to engage in Gospel work as God may open the way. He may be addressed 12, Manning-grove, The Chase, Nottingham.

Mr. Herbert R. Francis writes from Dehra Doon, N.W.P. India, on Nov. 29:—"I have just returned from a 1000 miles tour, preaching Jesus and the Resurrection. I have been away ten days, holding meetings and speaking to people personally when and where I could. get hold of them. I hope to preach (helped by my wife) from this to Ooty as openings occur, beginning the end of January. I should value the prayers of friends in England who know me, for guidance and to add strength."

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Canning Town and Plaistow Y.M.C.A. held its first anniversary on Thursday week, in the Public Hall. Upwards of 1,500 persons were present. The mayor of West Ham presided.

The annual meeting of the Watford Association was held lately. The report gave an encouraging account of work, and showed that the Association had co-operated with the Y.W.C.A. in Gospel meetings. Addresses were delivered by Canon Garrett, of Ipswich, and others.

The usual Christmas morning breakfast meeting not being held at Aldersgate-street this year, one was organised by the Hackney Y.M.C.A., and proved a thorough success. Mr. H. R. Walker presided. Suitable Christmas hymns were sung, and addresses delivered by Dr. Gritton, Rev. T. Udall, Mr. W. T. Paton, and Mr. Robert Burn.

The Anglo-American Y.M.C.A., 160, rue Monmartre, Paris, have held their twenty-seventh annual meeting in one of the McAll Mission Halls. The chairman was Rev. C. E. Greig, who is now the director of the McAll Mission. In every way the meeting was a success. Several of the clergymen and ministers of the different English and American congregations in Paris and other friends gave addresses, speaking highly of the work of the Association. There is unfortunately a deficit of over 1000 francs (£40), but it is hoped that some kind friends will help in clearing this sum, as Sir George Williams has done. The committee are anxious to emphasise the distinction of this Association as strictly for English-speaking young men, and in no way allied with the excellent work for French young men carried on in this city.

The Y.W.C.A.

A SOCIAL gathering of the members of the Bermondsey branch was held on Tuesday week to take an affectionate farewell of Mrs. Wyatt, the local president, who is leaving London on account of the rector's failing health. This meeting was enthusiastic, and a handsome presentation was made to Mrs. Wyatt. This branch was founded five and a-half years ago, under Mrs. Wyatt's superintendence, and has been a very blessed and successful work, as may be shown from the fact that the juniors number the largest branch in London.—A. C. ELLSON, Hon. Sec.

The motto for 1896 is threefold, "Come unto Me," Matt. xi. 28; "Come with Me," Song of Sol. iv. 8; "Come after Me," Matt. xvi. 24, Mark i. 17. In Go Forward for January, Miss Sophia Nugent, the editor, remarks:—"In the parable passage in which 'Come with me' occurs, it is followed by words which bring a mountain life before us, a perpetual upward life. 'Come with Me,' 'Look from the top of Amana...from the top of Hermon.' Companionship with the Lord Jesus means an upward life; it means a climb, it means new vigour, fresh air, uncontaminated with the miasma of the world (Greek of pollutions in 1 Peter ii. 20), a life in a region where the atmosphere is clear, and where the view is far and wide. 'Come with me, and look from the top of Hermon'—said to be possibly the Mount of Transfiguration—look around at all from God's point of view. Oh, what breadth and wisdom would characterise our work if we always looked 'from the top,' if our standard were, 'How does it look in God's sight?' " The motto texts are printed on a tastefully-designed card to be had at the bookstall, 316, Regent-street, W.

The Women of the East.

THE Society for the Promotion of Female Education in the East states that one hundred and twenty-four agents, English and native, are at work in its stations. Many schools are maintained by it, and many other schools assisted, thereby instructing some thousands of girls, many of whom become earnest Christians. Hundreds of zenanas are visited, and it is estimated that about 2500 women, otherwise unreached, are thus brought to the knowledge of the Gospel. In the Medical Missions, also, many thousands are cared for in body and soul. China, Japan, Persia, India, and the Holy Land form the sphere of the Society's present work.

It is with much regret we find that the funds of this valuable society has seriously fallen off, and there is danger that some of the work must be abandoned. Communications to be sent to the Secretary, Miss Webb, 267, Vauxhall Bridge-road, S.W.

Christmas Feasts.—We have received detailed accounts of various Christmas festive gatherings in London and elsewhere, but have not space for them. In all cases the glad Gospel message was told out in speech or in song, as well as the relief of physical needs.

Christian Endeavour.

A NOTABLE gathering, of far-reaching influence, was the meeting of the Board of Trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavour in Detroit, Dec. 11, 12. The position of Christian Endeavour in regard to the true brotherhood of man was emphasised by the election of two coloured members to the Board of trustees—Bishop B. W. Arnatt, D.D., of Wilberforce, Ohio, representing the African M. E. Church, and Bishop Alexander Walters, D.D., of Jersey City, N.J., representing the African M. E. Zion Church. This makes the board an inter-racial as well as an inter-denominational body.

The subject of the International Conventions was brought up before the Board, with results of no small moment. Belief in the great value of these conventions as times of genuine fellowship and untold inspiration to tens of thousands of delegates, and to the Church at large as a means of bringing the cause of Christ attractively before the whole world, and as a method of practical evangelisation, was reaffirmed at Detroit.

But the conventions are not without practical difficulties. To meet these it was decided that at Washington next July, the conduct of the meetings should be somewhat changed, and they will be undeleigated Christian Endeavour mass meetings, open to all Endeavourers as heretofore. Their chief purpose will remain as fellowship and inspiration, and the most carefully arranged programmes will be provided. Instead of the conventions being confined to mass meetings, many of the sessions will be distributed among a sufficient number of churches in the convention city. The speakers for these meetings will be the best obtainable, and the subjects discussed will deal with practical Christian Endeavour work, and with the interests of the highest Christian life. There still will be mass meetings of the delegates in the three great tents, but there will also be the smaller gatherings, making the whole a convention of conventions.

Another resolution was adopted to the effect that the Board disclaim any authority to intermeddle with local questions.

"We believe that a clear understanding and development of this idea will make plain our way in the many perplexing paths of the future. It has a bearing upon the character and purpose of all our conventions. It refers every difficult question relating to societies back to the only court of arbitration, the church to which the society belongs. It prescribes the character of our fellowship, which on this basis only, may be as broad as the universal Church of Christ itself. It limits, as they ought to be limited, the functions of the United Society, making it simply a bureau of information and statistics."

Irish Notes.

THE Bishop of Derry, Dr. Alexander, is nearly convalescent again, and intends to return from England and resume his labours about the middle of this month.

A branch of the National Anti-Gambling League has been established in Belfast, and it is not unlikely that a branch of the same organisation will soon be started in Dublin.

A correspondent in the North of Ireland sends to us some interesting extracts from the letters of colporteurs, showing the readiness of the Roman Catholic population to purchase copies of the New Testament, notwithstanding the opposition of the priests.

The Commercial Travellers' Christian Association for the North of Ireland continues to prosper, and is doing a splendid work. During the past year it placed Bibles in several of the hotels of Ulster, and it has now libraries in twenty-seven towns, and has eighty-one members.

Rev. Dr. Bernard, who is at present delivering the Donnellan Lectures in Trinity College, Dublin, has chosen for his subject the Pastoral Epistles. It is remarkable that during the hundred years which have elapsed since this lectureship was founded, a New Testament book was never before discussed, although Old Testament ones have been frequently chosen, a notable instance being Dean Graves's famous lectures on the Pentateuch.

On Active Service, is a very attractively got up book by Mr. Sydney Watson, giving the story of the Soldiers' Home, Winchester. It is prefaced by Gen. Sir Robt. Phayre; and is well illustrated, while the narratives of conversion it contains are of themselves worth the book, and combine with the recital of how the men are followed up abroad, to make most interesting reading. It will be sent free to applicants by Miss Perks, at the Home.

Scottish Notes.

THE semi-jubilee of Rev. W. Shearer, Free Church, Swinton, Berwickshire, has been celebrated.

Dr. Marshall Lang, of the Barony Church, Glasgow, has been appointed next Duff lecturer on foreign missions.

Rev. Hugh Black, of Sherwood Church, Paisley, has decided to accept the unanimous call from Free St. George's, Edinburgh.

The fourteenth annual meeting of the Ayrshire Christian Union was recently held in Kilmarnock, when a year of good work was brought to a close.

Dr. Millar, Principal of the Training College, Madras, has signified his acceptance of the Moderatorship of the General Assembly of the Free Church.

Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh, has received a cordial invitation to the pastorate of the Carver Memorial Church, Windermere. He has also been offered the pastorate of the Queen's Park Congregational Church, Manchester.

The "Swan Memorial" building in connection with the Kirkcaldy Y.M.C.A. was opened last week. The late Provost Swan was the first hon. president of the local Association, and in many other ways encouraged movements with the highest aims. The new building will enable the work of the Association to be vigorously maintained.

Dr. J. H. Wilson, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church, has, by the instructions of the Assembly Arrangements Committee, issued a letter to all the ministers of the Church, bringing under their notice the distressing state of the Armenian population in various parts of the Turkish empire, suggesting that prayer should be offered in all the congregations for the speedy relief of the sufferers, and that collections should be made in the congregations towards the relief fund now being raised.

The local committees of the different Presbyterian Churches in the West of Scotland are already beginning to make arrangements for offering the members of the Pan-Presbyterian Council a cordial reception when it meets in Glasgow in June next. It is expected that at the meeting in Glasgow there will be representatives of the churches in America, Asia, Africa, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bohemia, France, Greece, Hungary, Moravia, Spain, and Switzerland. The English and Irish Assemblies will send delegates, and the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland will also be represented.

A year ago, Mr. James Anderson was led of God to commence independent Christian work in Glasgow, in the Waterloo Rooms. After labouring there for some months, not without some tokens of Divine approval, it was thought expedient for the work to remove to a more suitable building. The Assembly Rooms on the south side of the river were secured, and there the work has been carried on, attended with marked blessing in the salvation of souls. The people of the congregation being desirous of forming themselves into a church, presented a call to Mr. Anderson to become their pastor, and he was formally ordained to the ministry in December.

Mr. George Aitken, after five and a-half years' service at Livingstonia, has returned to Scotland on furlough. In an address at Aberdeen he spoke of the difficulties and encouragements of mission enterprise in Central Africa. Many of these difficulties were of such a nature that the home Church could do much to remove them, as, for instance, the importation of firearms and drink. They also needed men of principle and Christian character as traders, who would not stand in the way of progress with mission work. Mr. Aitken spoke very hopefully of work among the young at Bandawe and Karonga. At the former station they had about 1000 pupils, with 150 native teachers.

Texts in Waiting Rooms.

A MOVEMENT for placing illuminated texts in railway waiting rooms in Scotland has been inaugurated. Some have been already hung up by permission in the Edinburgh stations. Any friends willing to help throughout Scotland are asked to communicate with Mrs. Macrae, 45, Moray-place, Edinburgh.

Kolar Mission.—In a recent letter Mr. J. B. Buttrick, in charge of the Boys' Orphanage connected with the Mission, says: "In addition to our two orphanages for native boys and girls, we have now a third, located here in Bowringpet, eleven miles south of Kolar, for orphan and needy Eurasian boys."

Mr. Easton's Fund.—For twenty years Mr. S. Wigney's class at the Metropolitan Tabernacle has been supporting Mr. G. F. Easton in China. The committee of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Sunday School have now adopted the fund, which will henceforth be carried on under their auspices, while Mr. Wigney will retain the management as heretofore.

The Book World.

DR. KINNS' WORKS.

THE name of Dr. Samuel Kinns has for a number of years symbolised an intelligent and firm conviction that Holy Scripture is divine in origin and true in detail.

Moses and Geology; or, the Harmony of the Bible with Science, is now in its fourteenth thousand. Not many works of such a character have circulated at the rate of a thousand per annum during a period of fourteen years. The new issue has been carefully revised up to date, especially in the astronomical and Assyrian portions, in which subjects great progress has lately been made. Handsomely bound, with gilt top, it forms a Library Edition (10s. 6d.), the exterior of which admirably befits the fascinating contents.

The companion volume, Graven in the Rock; or, the Historical Accuracy of the Bible confirmed by reference to Assyrian and Egyptian Monuments, is making headway at an equal pace, being already in its fourth thousand. The Library Edition (15s.) is in two volumes. It summarises, in a form highly convenient for Bible students and teachers, a vast amount of valuable information.

These works are singularly free from technical language, and may be commended to all thoughtful readers. The more confidently may this be done because well-known experts have testified to the correctness of the author's statements, which, moreover, are supported by engravings in lavish abundance. Both volumes afford evidence of wide research, and are calculated to enable many to withstand the attacks of a fashionable scepticism. Many a minister of the Gospel would find these works of great service, and the set constitutes a beautiful and useful presentation. (Cassell & Co.)

The Tool Basket, for preachers, Sunday-school teachers, and open-air workers, is a little volume of thought germs and sermon outlines. Gathered from various sources, these "tools" will prove of real service to good workmen. (1s. H. R. Allenson.)

Footsteps of Truth, Vol. XIII. (Shaw & Co.) Mr. C. Russell Hurditch keeps his little monthly full of useful and varied matter—brief papers on scriptural subjects and pointed Bible notes for preachers and teachers, who cannot fail to find the volume a mine of helpful and suggestive thought.

Lancelot Andrewes and his Private Devotions; A Biography, a Transcript, and an Interpretation. By Alexander Whyte. (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrie.) The minister of St. George's Free Church, Edinburgh, lays many under a distinct obligation to him for this volume. The biography is candid; the transcript striking; and the interpretation full of thought. In many hearts these devotions will awaken unutterable responses.

Life and Work, Vol. XVII. (R. & R. Clark, Edinburgh.) As the recognised organ of the Church of Scotland, this paper is admirably conducted, and full of readable articles and intelligence of work in the home and foreign field. The same firm publish the Year Book of the Church of Scotland (6d.), giving in compact and well-ordered form, full information as to the personnel and operations of the Church and its missionaries.

Down to the Sea: Sixteen Sea Sermons, by Thomas Spurgeon (3s. 6d. Passmore & Alabaster. "Son Tom," who is holding his own so well at the Tabernacle, has issued another volume of sermons. These, as the title shows, are on nautical themes, but each of them presses home the Gospel in sturdy fashion. The preacher is no slavish imitator, yet it is easy to discern something of his father's fire and force in his utterances. Pictures are a novelty in a collection of sermons, but they are likely to win fresh readers for these readable discourses.

Sermons, Homiletical Expositions, and Leading Thoughts on Texts of Scripture.—By Thomas Davies, M.A., Ph.D. This is the second of three series of discourses by Dr. Davies. The Sermons are forty in number, based on texts from all parts of the Old and New Testaments. The Homiletical Notes cover the Second and Third Epistles of St. John and the Epistle of Jude. The Thoughts deal with over a score themes of applied theology. Preachers will find in these ample pages much to help them in their work. (R. D. Dickinson.)

The Bible and the Prayer-book, by B. Homer Dixon, is the work of an English Churchman who speaks his mind. He has no patience with fictitious hagiography, and he detests ecclesiastical arrogance. When criticising the Prayer-book he appeals to Scripture; and his searching eye detects Paganism in many a Romish institution. He compares the Book of Common Prayer with its counterparts in Canada and the United States, and with various other revisions. What his book lacks in literary form it makes up in earnestness; and doubtless many loyal Anglicans at home will go more than half way with the aged author, and second his demand for a revised Prayer-book. (Toronto Willard Tract Depository, corner of Yonge and Temperance streets, Toronto, Canada.)

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Sunday has a coloured frontispiece, and its contents include pleasant readings admirably illustrated. (3d. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

Our Heritage.—The second issue of this quarterly seems likely to serve well its purpose of propagating sound views in regard to Sunday travelling. (1d. Partridge.)

In Young England, serial stories are begun by G. A. Henty and Reginald Horsley. The general contents are such as boys like to read. (Sunday School Union.)

The Congregational Magazine (1d. Alexander & Shepherd) begins well, under the new editorship of Rev. D. B. Hooke. There is a splendid portrait of Rev. J. Morlais Jones and a brief sketch.

David's Sling, the organ of the Bible class Movement and Prayer Union, begins a new series. It gives suggestive notes on the International Lessons as well as other useful matter. (Marshall Bros.)

The Gospel Magazine gives a portrait and some particulars of the late Rev. F. W. Baines, incumbent of Trinity Church, Torquay, and the other contents are sound and stirring. (6d. Collingridge.)

The Expository Times affords much information and stimulus to those who follow theological thought. Its writers occupy various standpoints, some of them being eminently reliable teachers. (6d. T. & T. Clark.)

The Fireside has an attractive list of contents. Edward Garrett opens a story, "Angus Gilchrist," and Emma Marshall one entitled "A Publisher's Romance." Among other illustrated sketches is one of Dr. J. E. Blakeney. (6d. "Home Words" Office.)

The Sword and Trowel has some stirring articles, with a sound Evangelical ring about them. With this issue is presented a picture of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, which many will frame and preserve alongside the portraits of its past and present pastors. (3d. Passmore & Alabaster.)

The Sunday-school Teacher begins a new series. It should not be overlooked by those for whom it is specially prepared. (2d. S. S. U.) A similar monthly, more special in its sphere, is The Church Sunday-school Magazine, which contains a number of articles of practical utility. (4d. S. S. Institute.)

The Church Missionary Intelligencer (6d.) is one of the most valuable organs of missionary work. There is in the latest issue a large amount of information regarding Central Africa, including letters from Bishop Tucker, of Uganda. The Church Missionary Gleaner (1d.) gives an illustrated letter from Bishop Ridley, of Metlakahla, and communications from Mr. Eugene Stock, describing his Canadian tour.

The Sunday Friend begins the year with a coloured picture. So also does Home Words, in which Agnes Giberne is writing a new tale "Everybody's Business." In The Day of Days, Rev. R. Pigott opens a series entitled "The Martyr Crown; or, the Seed of the Church." Another excellent little monthly is Hand and Heart, in which Rev. P. B. Power writes, "Tight; a Temperance Tale."

The Young Woman (3d.) has quite a galaxy of gifted writers this month, and enchains the interest of the reader throughout. The same may be said of The Young Man, with special emphasis on Dr. Guinness Rogers' "Reminiscences of Mr. Gladstone." The little penny monthly The Home Messenger has a marvellous amount of good reading within its covers. We hope the last article on "Food and Drink," by Dr. Stables, will not be overlooked.

The Sunday Magazine (6d.) has an illustrated interview with "Ian Maclaren," besides an article from his pen. The "Autograph Mottos" for 1896, given in facsimile, and contributed by ten persons of mark, including Mr. Gladstone, form an excellent feature. One of the most notable and readable papers in Good Words (6d.) is that by Mrs. Haweis, on "The Soft Sex." "A Chat About Sponges" is finely illustrated and full of information. A series of papers on Bishop Butler, by Mr. Gladstone, is promised in succeeding issues. (Isbister & Co.)

The Missionary Review of the World gives as a frontispiece an excellent portrait of Rev. F. B. Meyer, who has become one of its associate editors, and contributes a stirring paper on "The Motive Force of Missions." The editor-in-chief, Dr. Pierson, writes on "Some Signs of the Times," and Dr. George Smith begins a series of articles on Captain James Wilson, the First Volunteer of the London Missionary Society. The general contents of this monthly are quite up to the mark, and its enlarging influence is a good sign for the Church and the world. (1s. Funk & Wagnalls.)

Messrs. Partridge's smaller publications include our old friends The Infants' Magazine and The Children's Friend, both of which begin the New Year with coloured pictures, and the latter with fresh serials. In The Mothers' Companion, Jennie Chappell opens a story entitled "Mistress of the Situation," and there are some useful and interesting articles. "A Stormy Dawn," by W. J. Lacey, and "Helen's Secret," by L. T. Meade, are stories begun in The Family Friend. Always popular, The British Workman (1d.) is specially so this month, with a detailed and illustrated account of how it is produced. There is a facsimile letter by Mr. Gladstone on hand labour versus head labour, and among other good things a pathetic story by Rev. S. Baring Gould. The Band of Hope Review (3d.) tells in poem and picture of the heroic courage of a teetotal drummer-boy. Our Own Gazette (1d.) is excellent throughout. The services rendered by the Kinnaid family to the Y.M.C.A. are warmly recorded, with six portraits. The story, "Cousin Amanda's Conscience," is admirable.

In The Sunday at Home (6d.) Rev. John Watson ("Ian Maclaren") has a short and striking sermon, "The Appreciation of the Evangel." Mr. Watson seems to be the most popular contributor of the hour. In the same number Miss Gurney begins some interesting "Leaves from My Journal," by telling about the police of Japan. The Leisure Hour (6d.) opens with a new story by Miss E. B. Baily, and has a full table of varied contents. The Girl's Own Paper (6d.) has many good papers besides its abundant store of stories, "How to Manage a Band of Hope," and the account of Messrs. Bryant and May's match girls, are of special interest. The Boy's Own Paper (6d.) opens with a large coloured frontispiece, "Though Storms be Sudden." A very interesting article gives the results of a prize competition for the best maps of Robinson Crusoe's Island. Several of the maps are reproduced. Our Little Dots and The Child's Companion, begin with coloured plates. In The Cottager and Artisan Mr. Edward Whymper writes on Polar Exploration. Friendly Greetings is as wholesome and bright as ever. (Religious Tract Society.)

"AND AT NOON," by Captain Baring. (3d. Baldwin, Tunbridge Wells). An earnest plea for noonday prayer, as well as morning and evening, based on Psa. lv. 17.

A cogent booklet on a subject of urgent importance is THE SABBATH AND THE LORD'S DAY, by John Cox. (1d. Houlston & Sons.) There is spiritual stimulus in Wise or Foolish, by Rev. Francis Paynter, M.A., rector of Stoke-next-Guildford. (1d. Marshall Brothers.)

BOOKS RECEIVED.

From Hodder & Stoughton.—THE FOUR TEMPERAMENTS. By Alexander Whyte, D.D. THE VISIONS OF A PROPHET. By Marcus Dods, D.D. THE UPPER ROOM. By Rev. John Watson. ("Little Books on Religion" series, 1s. 6d. each.)

Thonon Mission.—This work continues to be quietly conducted by Misses Larritt and Wilson. The new report says: "The lady who came out to us as nurse last year proved herself most efficient, and it is to our very great regret that she does not return this winter. We have not yet supplied her place, and are very anxious to meet with a lady who has had nursing training, and does not expect to find missionary life a bed of roses. We cannot speak much of the meetings last winter, as through our illness they were greatly interrupted, and the session was very short. But the way in which the people are now coming to us is very encouraging. We had a visit the other day from a man living about seven miles from here, begging for a weekly meeting in their village this winter. This we could not undertake, but have promised a fortnightly one, which will be held alternate weeks with that in the village of Sciez begun last year." Communications to Misses Larritt and Wilson should be addressed Mission Evangélique, Thonon, Haute Savoie, France.

A Sailor's Yule.—On Saturday the twelfth annual "Yule feast" and "Unloading of the Christian Boat" in connection with Miss Child's "Welcome Home," 173, St. George's-street, Ratchiff-highway, took place. The great event of the year at the Home is the unloading of the lifeboat, and on Saturday some 400 sailors were present at the ceremony. The boat—a four-masted schooner—occupied one end of the dining-hall. After supper the unloading was commenced. The schooner contained no fewer than 1,800 presents, consisting of serviceable shirts, woollen cuffs, caps, work-boxes, etc. At a meeting held after the distribution of the presents special reference was made to the recent shipwrecks on the Irish coast. Captain Conker, his wife, and the chief mate, Martin Love, of the Liverpool schooner, Moresby, which was lost with nearly all her hands on the Irish coast, were members of the Welcome Home lifeboat crew, and only left the Home, where they had been staying, to join their ship. They had been connected with the work for many years.

Obituary.

MISS RACHEL WRIGHT.

THE only surviving sister of Mr. James Wright, of the Bristol Orphan Houses, fell asleep in Jesus on Dec. 26. She attended a meeting at Bethesda Chapel on Christmas Day and retired to rest, apparently in her usual health. Next morning, however, she was found dead in bed. The home-call had evidently been quite peaceful.

MR. GEORGE CLEGG, HALIFAX.

Wesleyans in Yorkshire have suffered a heavy loss in the sudden death through apoplexy of Mr. George Clegg, leading partner in the well-known firm of Messrs. Hollingrakes and Clegg, worsted spinners, Halifax. Mr. Clegg, who was a borough magistrate, a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and for many years associated with the Halifax Town Council, was generally esteemed for uprightness and integrity of character. Among the Free Churches he was a tower of strength. He devoted large sums and took deep interest in the training of women for Christian service, and was a liberal giver to the work of God generally.

MISS MARY GRAHAM.

On Sunday, Dec. 2, there died at Brantford, Ont., Miss Mary Graham, matron of the John H. Stratford Hospital, surrounded by her staff of nurses, and after a lingering illness of many months, borne with Christian fortitude. She has left a record behind her that may well be emulated by the many she has been instrumental, as the head of the hospital nursing school, in training for the profession of nursing. She went to Canada in 1869 as one of the girls sent out from Miss Rye's Emigration Home at Peckham. Unselfish, kindly, gentle, with a splendid nerve, tempered by experience, she went about her work night and day with a steady, firm hand. She will be sorely missed.

REV. W. EVANS HURNDALL.

Many will hear with sorrow that this able and earnest minister of the Gospel has succumbed to the accident we mentioned a fortnight ago. It will be remembered that he and his wife were found unconscious, having been nearly suffocated. For some days he lay insensible, but on his regaining consciousness it was hoped he would eventually recover. Towards the end of last week things began to look serious; he slowly sank, and passed away on Tuesday morning. So has closed a career which many regarded with expectancy and hopes. His devoted and useful labours in the East End led to a call to the historic chapel in Westminster. Accepting this, he threw himself into the work with an enthusiasm which soon begun to tell. Now that the servant has been called hence, the great Master, whose work it is, will surely raise up one to carry it on. We regret to learn that Mrs. Hurndall is still in a very critical condition.

REV. NILKANTHA GOREH.

There has recently passed away in India one who at the height of his reputation as a philosophical Brahman, joined the Christian Church. Nilkantha Goreh Shastri was something like father confessor of the notorious Nana Sahib. After the Mutiny he spent years in preparing a work for the refutation of Christianity. When searching the Bible, in order to disprove its revelation, he felt himself compelled to give up his pride of caste, and to seek admission to the C.M.S. divinity school. Having been made tutor to the late Maharaja Duleep Singh, he accompanied him to London, but returned to the influence of John Wilson, in Bombay, where he also met Dr. Duff. He spent the rest of his long life in mission work, at first among the Brahmans, who were in consternation at his desertion of the order, and then among the casteless labourers of Chanda, in Central India. He did much to influence the woman who most resembles him, Pundita Ramabai. His own child, Ellen Lakshmi Goreh, is known as the writer of "In the Secret of his Presence," No. 565, in Mr. Sankey's Songs and Solos.

MRS. BORLASE SLIDSTON.

This honoured servant of God, known to hundreds as "The Prisoners' Friend," lately passed away to her rest at the age of seventy-three. She was the daughter of the late George Freen, of Plymouth, and in very early life became a decided Christian and earnest worker. While yet in her teens she met Elizabeth Fry in London, and was taken by her through Newgate Gaol. After many years of happy married life with the late Mr. John Slidston, of Plymouth, her children being settled in life, Mrs. Slidston was able to devote herself entirely to the congenial work of visiting the convicts. For many years Mrs. Slidston was the only woman receiving permission of the Home Office for this work. Her great aim was to bring the outcast and helpless to the Friend of Sinners. She established a branch of the Prisoners' Aid Society in Plymouth. Her boys' class was one of the sights of the town, where a number of the roughest lads and young men were brought under Christian influence. Only the last day will show how much good she has been the means of doing. She leaves three sons and two daughters to lament her.

REV. WILLIAM MOORE, D.D.

We deeply regret to hear of the death of Rev. William Moore, D.D., so well-known for his long and devoted service at Puerto Santa Maria, Spain, as a missionary of the Irish Presbyterian Church. The news, though sudden, was not altogether unexpected. Dr. Moore's health has for a considerable time been far from robust, and early in the past year the Mission Board appointed Rev. W. P. Douglas, as his assistant. Notwithstanding this relief, Dr. Moore felt constrained to ask permission to retire from the active duties of his office. The leave sought was cordially granted, and it was hoped that, after a few months' residence in the mountain air of Switzerland, Dr. Moore's health might be so far restored as to enable him to discharge his duties as Principal of the Mission College at Puerto. This was in part fulfilled. Dr. Moore was married during his residence in Spain to a grand-daughter of the late Archbishop Whately. His wife, in whom he found a zealous co-worker in all that pertained to the advancement of the mission cause, survives him, as do also six children, one of whom is now studying for the ministry.

Evangelistic Notes.

Blackpool.—An eight days' mission, attended with much blessing, has been held at Revue Mission Church here, by Mr. A. Hanson, of the Church Army.

Donegal.—Rev. Henry Ball, Methodist Conference evangelist, has conducted a series of evangelistic services at Donegal, which were well attended, and at which several professed to have been led to decision for Christ.

Mr. Bray, of the Evangelisation Society, has for the past three months been preaching in Fording-bridge and the neighbourhood with great success and blessing. Many have sought and found the Saviour, while Christians of all denominations have been cheered, helped, and strengthened.

Praze, Cornwall.—A month's mission has been conducted at the Free Methodist Church, Praze, Cornwall, by Mr. Clegg, evangelist, Camborne. There has been a glorious work among the young men of the village. The power of the Holy Spirit has been displayed night after night by souls seeking salvation.

Haslingden.—A twelve days' united mission in the Public Hall has been brought to a close. Rev. Thomas Waugh was the missionary, and right earnestly and skillfully he prosecuted his work. Great spiritual power accompanied the services. Many persons have given in their names as inquirers. These belong pretty equally to the several churches and Sunday-schools of the town and neighbourhood.

Cullingworth, Yorks.—This manufacturing village has been the scene of a cheering revival. Some Christians have lately been stirred to earnest prayer by reason of evil in the place. The first drops of the coming shower appeared a few weeks ago in the Wesleyan chapel. Since then special prayer-meetings have been held, and a spirit of expectancy was aroused. This led to a special mission by Mr. Oldmedow, which God has greatly blessed to the saving of many souls.

Whyteleaf, Surrey.—Mr. E. C. Newbery, of San Remo, has concluded a six days' mission in the mission hall in this village, which has been used of God to the salvation of souls, and the building up of Christians. One young lady rejoiced the hearts of all present, at the close of the mission, by her surrender to the Master. An old man of eighty-six years of age confessed that he was now so happy in Jesus. Many others have expressed themselves to the same effect. Mr. Newbery is shortly returning to San Remo, and we pray that the Lord will make him a blessing to many Italians.

JOHN SPRINGHILL.

Huddersfield.—Messrs. Weaver Brothers have conducted a fortnight's mission in the Primitive Methodist Church here, and it has been a "time of refreshing." The first week was devoted to the church, which rose to the fuller blessing to which Mr. Bewley Weaver called it. During the second week his stirring appeals told mightily on the unconverted, especially on the Sunday nights, and on the Monday, when the "Story of the Conversion of Bendigo, the champion prize-fighter of the world," was given. Old pugilists were seen wiping away their tears. One of the best results was the number of young men that consecrated themselves to Christ. The last Sunday night was a stirring time; over fifty names were taken of those who were converted or restored to lost blessing.

Appeals.

OLD CALENDARS.—Readers who have old calendars to spare for use in hospitals are asked to send them to Miss E. Alice Puckle, The Hollands, Langton, Tunbridge Wells.

NORTH-EAST LONDON MISSIONS ask help in giving "Christmas" tracts during the next week to our 1500 poor children and older people.—WM. CHOLEY, 6, Clephane-road, Canonbury, N.

POOR JACK ABROAD.—Allow me to appeal for newspapers, periodicals, or books. I ask this for the benefit of the many English seamen who visit this port. Parcels may be addressed, ALFRED A. GRACE, Gran Dock, La Plata, South America.

JUBILEE MISSION.—Last winter through we were enabled to give 20,000 free meals to the starving poor of Hoxton and Shoreditch. In order that a similar work may be done this year we earnestly appeal for help.—REV. ERNEST BRETT, East-road, Hoxton, N.

THE STRANGERS' FRIEND SOCIETY, aiding and supplementing efforts amongst the poor in all parts of London. Upwards of 188 Christian men and women are engaged as voluntary visitors to the sick and suffering and desolate. Help is greatly needed.—B. H. GERRANS, Sec., 52, Finsbury-pavement, E.C.

MISS MEREDITH BROWN pleads the cause of the hungry slum children, the mothers of our crèche, the factory girls, the dust-heap women, the apple and flower women, the street-hawkers who sleep nightly under our roof, and the lodging-house men in connection with the Shaftesbury Institute Mission, Lisson-grove, N.W.

THE ARTILLERY-LANE MISSION asks help for the work connected with this Mission, for the past twenty-three years, chiefly in the common lodging houses, and giving a free breakfast on Sundays during the winter. We are almost helpless to meet the great need. Funds are so low.—(Mrs.) S. FINN, 23, St. Ann's-road, South Tottenham, N.

ST. THOMAS, LAMBETH, one of the poorest parishes in London, seeks help towards the relief of the aged, sick, and needy, including maternity cases, blankets, and flannel. Soup and bread for poor and deserving families. Gifts of meat, grocery, and bread for the poor.—Rev. J. B. BARRACLOUGH, M.A., The Vicarage, Westminster Bridge-road, S.E.

MR. E. M. GORDON, working among peasants in and around Mungeli, C.P. India, is desirous of getting a dozen magic lantern slides, showing different scenes in the life of Joseph or relating to the Prodigal Son. If any reader can respond, the slides may be sent to the care of Messrs. William Watson and Co., 27, Leadenhall-street, London, E.C.

THE BESSBROOK HOMES FOR SANDWICH MEN continue to prosper. Besides providing a Christmas dinner for the 105 men in the Homes, we are again anxious to reach those outside, and to provide, as last year, a dinner for 500 or 1000 sandwich-board men from the street about the middle of January. Contributions towards the expense will be welcome.—G. MAYNARD, 33, Queen's-square, W.C.

PICTURES FOR FORECASTLES.—Commander Dawson, of the Missions to Seamen, suggests that coloured texts and pictures would be most acceptable to brighten some of the dark, dingy, comfortless forecastles in which merchant sailors spend a large portion of their hazardous lives. They might be sent to The Missions to Seamen Institute, at any of the larger seaports in England or South Wales.

SOUTH LONDON ASSOCIATION FOR ASSISTING THE BLIND.—Our people look forward with keen anticipation to the return of this happy season, and our bright and happy treat amongst them. We have upwards of 150 very poor persons, all of whom are blind, and they, with their guides, number more than 300 persons, who are provided with a substantial repast, and our poor blind people also receive (if funds allow) 2s. 6d. and a warm article of clothing.—J. T. EDMONDSON, Hon. Sec., 155, Brixton-road, S.W.

WATERCHESSE AND FLOWER GIRLS' MISSION.—Winter in its ordinary course is a terrible experience for the poor flower girls, but this year it is worse than usual, as, owing to the terrible effects of the great frost of last winter, most of them are ill-prepared to battle through the months of cold which are upon us. If flowers were plentiful it would be a great struggle, but being scarce and dear, many of these poor creatures are deprived of the means of livelihood.—JOHN A. GROOM, 8, Sekford-street, Clerkenwell, E.C.

AGED CABDRIVERS.—Help is asked for a New Year's dinner to the pensioners of the Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association. Since the death of her brother, in 1893, Miss H. Stormont Murphy has continued to give the summer and winter treats to the annuitants. The New Year's dinner will take place on Friday, Jan. 17, at St. James's Hall, Regent-street, at 1 p.m., the chair being taken by the Archbishop of London. Cards of admission may be had of Miss H. STORMONT MURPHY, 18, Upper George-street, Hyde Park, who will be thankful for help in the matter.

THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY has rescued large numbers of children from criminal and vicious surroundings. During the past year alone, 1230 children have come within the beneficent operations of the Society. And it was recently ascertained that of the children rescued by the society and placed in industrial schools during the last twelve years, nearly ninety per cent. were known to be doing well, and only 5.1 per cent. are found to be not doing well. Help is urgently needed if the good work of this society is to be continued, and it ought surely not to be sought in vain.—HERSCHELL, 46, Grosvenor-gardens, S.W.

THE PROTESTANT GOVERNESSES' FUND AND HOME provides a small free temporary home at the seaside for distressed Protestant governesses and gentlemen, who require change and rest, or waiting for engagements, to give pecuniary help and clothing. Through want of funds the work is quite crippled. The distress is very great, gentlemen are so silent under their heavy trouble and shrink from making their circumstances known that people do not think perhaps they are foodless and homeless, which is too frequently the case. I should be glad of orders for fancy or plain needlework. Many of our distressed sisters (some of whom are slightly invalided) are glad to earn money that way.—CLEMENTINA KINGDON, Superintendent, 23, Chatham-place, Brighton.

Prayer for Peace.—In view of the strained relations between this country and the United States, the council of the British Evangelical Alliance have agreed with the United States council to urge Christians in both countries to pray for peace. The subject on Wednesday (January 8) in the week of prayer being "Nations and Rulers," it has been decided to devote that day to special prayer that the calamity of war may be averted.

Notes and Comments.

WILL those of our readers who receive THE CHRISTIAN direct from our Postal Agents, and who have not recently communicated with us, kindly send their present full postal address; especially missionaries and others in foreign countries?

We commence to-day a series of articles on the "Psalms of David," from the pen of a Continental scholar who has devoted many years to the subject. For a good while it has been the fashion to question the Davidic authorship of Psalms bearing the superscription of the Shepherd-King, and at length in certain critical circles it has been held that few, if any, of the entire collection date from earlier than Maccabean days.

Pastor Storjohann aims at showing the historical setting of David's Psalms, and in Germany and Norway he has impressed many with his views. Those views come to the help of Old Testament Scripture as it was understood in the days of our Lord, and as it has been interpreted all down the ages, until the Higher Critics developed their destructive speculations. We bespeak a thoughtful perusal for the articles of our esteemed contributor, and believe that in thus following closely the historical aspect, our readers will be helped in their devotional use of the Psalms.

It will be noticed that our column of notes on the International S.S. Lessons is transferred to a later page than hitherto, in order to give more space for the growing demands of our "Children's Column."

The Student's missionary conference at Liverpool last week, has come as a bright spot in the dark horizon of the opening year. From east and west and south, we are receiving ample proof that the real betterment of mankind cannot come through political channels. It is only by bringing the peoples into the light and experience of the Christian faith, that the true brotherhood of men can be established. We hope for much in this direction from the students' movement. The conference at Liverpool was in all respects a great success.

Seldom has the New Year brought more anxiety and depression with it than has 1896. The relation of our country to the United States, is, for the moment, a good deal overshadowed, but we shall fail in our duty if we do not continue to work and pray for peace. The trouble in the East still drags its blood-stained course. Then on New Year's Day came tidings of Dr. Jameson's raid on the Transvaal, which has ended in a defeat for him and his filibustering company. The serious thing to our minds is, that his company is said to have contained several British officers and representatives of high families at home.

These troubles in the Transvaal illustrate the dangers of government by "chartered companies," and the cry is swelling on all hands for the revocation of the South African Company's charter. It seems a reversal of all true notions of government to administer a vast tract of country through a body of men whose sole aim is money-making. Such a state of things tends to corruption and rapacity; higher responsibilities are made subordinate to self-interest of the meanest kind, and there is no adequate check on the action of those in power. Dr. Jameson's deplorable raid, which has brought such disaster in its train, would have been impossible except under the present conditions; and it is time a severe lesson is taught to such men that they cannot be allowed to endanger vast interests by their precipitate and misguided actions. The severe defeat inflicted by the Boers on these filibusters is not enough. Such freebooting should be made for ever impossible in the higher interests of the whole world.

In his "New Year's greeting" Dr. Waller, President of the Wesleyan Conference, refers with great satisfaction to the success which has attended the great missions in the large centres of the population; they mark a new development in modern church work; they have strengthened faith in the power and adaptation of the Gospel to the needs of fallen humanity; and they still continue to receive warm sympathy and liberal support. This kind of agency in connection with all kinds of denominations is beginning to be understood and appreciated, but still it has a hard battle to fight against the apathy and class pride of numbers who call themselves Christians. Once let the Churches be thoroughly converted to God, thoroughly imbued with the mind of Him who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor, and the evangelisation of the world will soon follow.

Strange relics of paganism and of positive savagery come to light now and again in this "Christian" country. The condition of our gipsies is a scandal to us. The late George Smith's work for them needs to be carried forward to its proper results, as is evidenced by an inquest held at Portsmouth on New Year's Day on a child who was born two days previously. Its home was a tent eighteen feet square, curtained off into a kitchen and two bedrooms, and contained seven occupants, one of whom was a girl of nineteen, who has never been to school, and has a child eight months old.

Those persons who would dissuade us from evangelising countries possessing an ancient civilisation get no sympathy from Sir Charles Elliott, who has been forty years in India, and has just retired from the post of Lieut.

tenant-Governor of Bengal. He affirms that it is "impossible to shirk or conceal the feeling that the Christian religion is the one pre-eminently excellent, and that the morality of the Christian faith is what is most desirable for India." As we hold that the morality is based upon the facts and truths of the Gospel we have here a striking testimony to the fitness of the Gospel to one of the greatest nations under heaven. What would India be if she were thoroughly permeated with these truths and this morality? The gratification also expressed by Sir Charles at the thought of being able to aid missionary work at home will be shared by all lovers of our great missionary societies.

Rev. Thomas Evans raises a warning note on a matter which may, in time, assume serious proportions; he points out that the mango tree of India, which affords a beautiful shade from the sun and yields a valuable fruit, is being largely cut down to make boxes for the export of opium. As many as from twenty to thirty thousand of them have been cut down in recent years. The wholesale felling of trees is the surest way to diminish the rainfall of a country and cause sterility. Has the Woods and Forests Department of the Indian Service nothing to say about a practice which may one day cause or greatly intensify a famine?

"Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord negligently" (Jer. lviii. 10, R.V.) is a tremendous utterance for anyone to face, but it only expresses the same judgment as is pronounced in every part of the Scriptures against spiritual indolence or carelessness, which amounts to positive disobedience. No one can be "negligent" who has the love of Christ shed abroad in his heart, and lives under the powers of the world to come. Paul said: "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." He felt the pressure of a solemn "necessity" to abound in labours and sufferings. He who is "negligent" in work is the unprofitable servant who hid his Lord's money in a napkin. Whatsoever we do this year, let us do it with our might.

The problem how far, and on what occasions, we should make religion a direct topic of conversation is a difficult one. We are persuaded, however, that the present neglect into which it has fallen is a serious evil. Professedly Christian men and women are morbidly afraid of being suspected of sanctimoniousness, and they accordingly hide their deepest feelings behind a mask, and their intercourse tends to become trivial and unprofitable. This may be partly a revulsion from that ostentation of pietism which is a still greater evil. There are many who, like Cordelia, cannot "heave their heart into their mouth," and talk with glib verbosity of their inner life. But there are many opportunities given to all of us of sharing this with others that are not taken through a false sense of shame. Surely our religion should become vocal on other than public occasions. We miss one of the highest privileges of the Christian life when our love and adoration are always dumb. We do not honour ourselves nor our Master by being so confidential about trifles, and so silent on that which is the mainspring of our whole life.

The world is suffering from amateur Christians, who have not the courage of their convictions, and live on the edge of the kingdom, when they should revel in its profound privileges and busy service. They have only enough religion to make them miserable, when a larger grasp of it would make them happy d great. They skirt the shore and live along the breakers, afraid to take the deep water, where their only safety lies. Christ's word to his disciples is, "Launch out into the deep." There is no danger a true sailor finds more than those of a lee shore. When storms come he beats out into the open sea, knowing there is less peril there than nearer the land. It would be well if we learnt this lesson, and swept out of the shallows in which so many suffer shipwreck into the deep waters of truth and faith and love, where storms may roar, but where we are safe from the dangers of sunken reefs and a rock-bound shore on which fretful waves are ever breaking.

The telegraph is becoming more and more dangerous as a factor in human life. It has transformed the world into a whispering gallery, in which rumours and lies seem to play not a small part in the personal relations of men. The earth is so covered with this intricate system of sensitive pathways for news, real and pretended, that it seems almost like a living thing, with a hundred centres of intelligence, and connected by "nerves of emotion as well as pain," that quiver into complicated human passions in all directions. So swift is the transit of information, so difficult is it to sift the true from the false, that in troubled times such as these, the whole world is kept in a fever of unhealthy excitement from day to day, and precipitate action on the part of Governments as well as individuals is one of our pressing dangers.

How futile is the expectation that the world will ever be "made better" by physical discoveries and the extension of man's lordship over nature. The world of forces is becoming more and more plastic in the hands of man. But as each new extension of his dominion takes place, we are brought face to face with the solemn fact that so long as he remains as he is, he extends the power of evil as well as the power of good. In an unregenerate world every new aptitude becomes a doubtful endowment. It is only when he is a little lower than the angels that his lordship is a blessing and a benefit. The lower he sinks towards the devil, the more terrible his knowledge and his energy become. It is only in "the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness" that man's sovereignty over nature will become his true charter of liberty. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

The present striking isolation of England and the councils of the world has recently been painfully emphasised, and it would be well for us to consider the reason. It is not sufficient to put it all down to international jealousy of her power, or to say that it is the penalty of so vast an empire. We are in many ways only reaping the sins of past years. We have gone too much on the assumption that the uncivilised world is ours by a kind of natural right. We have shown a callous disregard for the rights of native races wherever our hunger and thirst for gold has brought us into conflict with them, that a profound distrust of our motives and principles has spread among the nations of the earth. Granting that we have the genius of "developing" new countries, and that as a colonising people we are without a rival, that is no reason why we should override the rights and interests of weaker races in the way we have done. We have sown the wind, and we must be prepared to reap the whirlwind, or repent our evil ways, and bring forth fruits meet for repentance.

Before conscription was made obligatory on all young Frenchmen, including those who purposed becoming priests, it is said that thousands of young men quite unfitted for the work of priests entered the priesthood, in order to avoid military duty. Now the complaint is that young priests are ruined in the army. Thus it seems impossible to work a bad thing for a good end. Another instance of degradation following upon the adoption of the military idea as the dominant idea of life, is given by Miss Balfour in her book "Twelve Hundred Miles in a Waggon." She says that at the capital of German East Africa, there were numbers of native women working on the roads, and "being driven to their work by a white man carrying a large raw-hide whip." The number of convicts astonished her. "Everywhere you came upon gangs of four or eight—often women—chained together by the necks, and hounded along by a black policeman or soldier."

The Society for the Protection of Birds issues an urgent appeal to ladies to desist from wearing birds' feathers as an adornment. "Fresh orders are being sent to various points on our coasts where sea-birds are known to gather, and to distant parts of the earth," to continue the work of destroying birds for the sake of their wings and feathers. The cruelties which are inflicted upon birds to gratify this taste are horrible in the extreme. When only the wings of sea-birds are wanted, they are wrenched off, and the living mutilated birds are thrown upon the water to die. The feathers of the white egret are obtained at the time when the bird is breeding, and thousands of young birds die of starvation, while the parent birds, which have been shot, lie festering in the sun. There is something peculiarly repulsive in seeing a woman adorned with feathers which were the beauty of a bird in the love-season of the year. If the feathered woman was put down as a cruel woman and avoided, this degrading trade would cease. It is not enough say she is "not so much cruel as thoughtless"; she ought not to be either.

Stranger's Rest.—At the special meeting for workers and friends of the Strangers' Rest for Sailors, 163, St. George's-street, Ratcliff Highway, Rev. J. G. Train (Norwood) delivered a powerful and practical New Year's address, taking for his subject, "Let the Fire Burn." After the address several workers and friends testified as to the very successful Christmas gatherings at the Rest. Boxing night especially was referred to as a time of special blessing, several sailors seeking to be saved.

Southwark and Lambeth Mission.—On New Year's Day a very interesting meeting was held in Christ Church, Westminster Bridge-road, the occasion being the completion of twenty years' service in the Mission of Mr. Benson, the evangelist. The chair was taken by Rev. F. B. Meyer. A record of mission work was given by the evangelist. Several testimonies were borne by those who had been led to decision. Earnest addresses were given by the chairman and Rev. J. Fleming on the deepening of spiritual life. The meeting was preceded by a tea in Hawkstone Hall.

Bethesda Mission Hall, Dalston, N.E.—The seventh annual meeting of this Mission was held on Thursday, January 2. The speakers were Revs. W. Miall and Owen Thomas, Mr. Budd, Mr. Trevelton, and Mrs. Holliday. The addresses were of a most encouraging character. The report (read by Mr. S. J. Alexander) showed good work done indoors and in the open-air. Reference was made to the seven years' work, and to many scores of sinners who had been led to the Saviour. Praise was given to God for much blessing bestowed in connection with the evangelistic work of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander during 1895 in various parts of the country. Their address is Bethesda, 45, Gayhurst-road, Dalston, N.E.

Gloria Armeniæ.

WHAT dreadful voices fill the air!
Voices of woe and wild despair,
The infant's terror-stricken cry,
The mother's shriek of agony;
The tortured martyr's labouring breath,
The groans of men who meet their death,
And death of such inhuman name,
Descriptive pens revolt in shame;
These sounds are heard by Christian lands,
What fear or weakness ties their hands?

The world to-day has witnessed crimes
As black as in its darkest times,
The rifle fire, the butcher's knife,
The sword hacks in onesided strife;
When savage Kurd and fiendish Turk,
Combine to do the Prophet's work,
By forcing Islam or the sword
On those who love another Lord.
These sights are seen by Christian lands,
What fear or weakness ties their hands?

A Christian people bleeding lies
Before our hesitating eyes!
The spirit of crusade is dead,
Though even that, by some 'tis said,
Were better than the selfish ease
That nought will stir unless it please.
Have self-indulgence, gold and shares,
So undermined us unawares,
That fortitude and love of right
Have fled like visions of the night?

No hero in the days gone by,
Met death with greater constancy;
No martyr e'er made braver stand
Than Christians in Armenian land.
A native pastor, firm and true,
(A faithful English churchman, too,)—
When offered death or Islam, chose
A cruel death among his foes.
Slow torture was his sentence dire,
But Christ was with him in the fire.

One glorious instance more we cite
From hundreds that have come to light:
As game, before the blows and cries
Of closing beaters, madly flies
A Christian flock, with fear distraught,
Within their church a refuge sought,
But frenzied crowds surround them there,
No shelter is their house of prayer.
"Islam or death," the murderers cry;
An honoured band elects to die.

Out from that church march fifty-two,
They come from pulpit and from pew;
Resolved to steadfast stand and leal,
They sink beneath the Moslem steel.
But rise the martyr's crown to wear,
Reserved for those who nobly dare
To count their lives and all things loss
For Him who bought them on his cross.
On this, our blessed British ground,
Where open Bibles most abound,
How many churches—What say you?—
Would furnish martyrs fifty-two?

HERBERT R. FRANCIS.

Whom God Calls He Qualifies.

By REV. W. CROSBIE, M.A., LL.B.

EXPOUNDING recently to my Sunday-school class the International Lesson for the day (1 Samuel xvi.), the 13th verse of the chapter became suddenly luminous, flashing upon me as the living message of God. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward."

We immediately, the class and myself, set ourselves to search the Scriptures for passages of similar import, and were surprised at the number found lying scattered through the sacred volume, and associated with the great names of Bible story.

The lesson we drew was this: When God calls to any post, or duty, or service, or mission, no matter how high and difficult, He qualifies those whom He sends, fitting them with the requisite equipment, making the grace sufficient for, and adapted, to the need, raising his called and commissioned servants to the height and level of their tasks.

No one goes a warfare for God at his own charges. And it is seldom, perhaps never, just an equal match of duty and grace, but the grace "abounds," that there may be an "abounding also unto every good work."

David was a shepherd-youth when summoned to the position and duties of kingship; a native of the village of Bethlehem; the youngest son of his father; unacquainted with the ways of the world; untrained in the arts of government and war. And yet, what a destiny was that at the threshold of which he stood! What tremendous tasks awaited him! And how unequal he seemed to be to what lay before him! A fair-countenanced, ruddy stripling, fresh from the hills and sheep-folds—is that the future king of Israel? Is the hand now holding a rude shepherd's crook to wield the sceptre of earth's greatest sovereignty? It is even so. And he stands on no conventional or hereditary rights, nor as the elected of the people; but chosen of God, a ruler by Divine right. And He who has chosen him fits him for the august station, makes him the wisest, ablest, and most renowned of monarchs; and honours him as the progenitor, and also as the type, of the world's Messiah, the true King and Ruler of men.

The great secret of the matter is in the words: "The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward." There was other subordinate training—tributary influences not a few; but the main and all-conditioning secret lay in that endowment. By it the disparity between David's former position and his new responsibilities was annihilated. He was pre-eminently a God-made king. The anointing oil poured by Samuel upon his head symbolised another consecration; and in it was David's special equipment for the royal state to which he was raised, and for the manifold and arduous duties involved in it.

So also was it with the twelve disciples of our Lord. Out of peasants and fishermen of Galilee God made the greatest apostles, and teachers, and leaders of his Church; and the process in their case was similar. They were distinctively God-made. The holy anointing came upon them; they were all filled with the Holy Ghost; and by that Pentecostal baptism those poor, unknown, unlettered, and very ordinary men were made the seers and prophets and kings of the ages in spiritual things: they were raised to the supreme rank in the new and Divine order introduced by Jesus Christ, and destined to "sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

Applying the subject to ourselves, we said we have all a work to do for God. We are saved, not merely for our own sakes, but for the sake of others—for some redemptive work in the world. And for that work, whatever its nature, there is the qualification; the path to be trodden is gloriously provisioned; the sphere of duty is covered with all-sufficient and adapted grace.

Rallying Points.

II.—PRAISE.

"LET US COME before his presence with thanksgiving."—Ps. xcvi. 2.

BACKWARD though we are to pray, yet we are still more backward to praise. Perhaps there is no spiritual exercise for which the average Christian is as strangely unready as for praise.

How few of us there are who habitually and practically carry out the resolve of the Psalmist, "I will bless the Lord at all times, his praise shall continually be in my mouth" (Ps. xxxiv. 1). And yet that resolution was the most natural thing possible for David, and is just as certainly the natural resolve of every one of us who considers what great things God hath done for us.

In view of the "horrible pit" from which He has delivered us; in view of the "eternal glory" to which He has called us; in view of the unchanging love which spans the entire distance between the two, how shall we restrain the song of praise? "He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." The Lord is said to "inhabit" the praises of his people (Ps. xxii. 3). Let us make that habitation broader and deeper and higher by lives of perpetual thanksgiving. "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High" (Ps. xcii. 1).

"My days of praise shall ne'er be past,
While life and thought and being last,
Or immortality endures."

It is not only a good thing but a most reasonable thing to praise the Lord. And shall we withhold that which He values so much?

It is not enough that we join the great congregation in singing, "Crown Him Lord of all." It is not enough that holy angels veil their faces while they cry, "Worthy is the Lamb." Nay, but He misses the note of thanksgiving which should rise from your heart and mine if we neglect to swell the chorus of inanimate nature, and of all the creatures He has made.

"Let us," then, "come before his presence with thanksgiving." Praise is an errand which brings us very near to the throne. It gives us audience of the King, and detains us there in his holy presence, for our praise is never done. We shall never come to an end of the things for which we have to thank Him.

"Shall I give you my life-history in a few words?" asked a happy old saint of over eighty years.

"I should like very much to hear it," was his friend's reply.

"It is just this," said the other—

"Mercy, mercy, all the way,
Mercy by night, and mercy by day;
Mercy here, and mercy there,
Mercy, mercy everywhere."

Another deeply tried Christian writes, "He keeps me constantly thanking Him, He gives so much."

And is there a single child of God who will not say that these simple words also describe his or her history? Truly He is a God "who is worthy to be praised" (2 Sam. xxii. 4).

"Deny not a song to Him who hath answered thy prayer, and given thee the desire of thy heart. To be silent over God's mercies, is to incur the guilt of ingratitude; it is to act as basely as the nine lepers, who, after they had been cured of their leprosy, returned not to give thanks unto the healing Lord. To forget to praise God is to refuse to benefit ourselves; for praise, like prayer, is one great means of promoting the growth of the spiritual life. . . . Praise is the most heavenly of Christian duties" (Spurgeon).

For the sake of others, too, "let us come into his presence with thanksgiving." Praise is infectious, and those who never yet have praised God may learn snatches of our song, and may be attracted to enquire, "What is thy Beloved more than another beloved?"—a challenge which the redeemed soul loves to accept, and to answer with reiterated praise of Him who is "Chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely."

It is scarcely necessary to say that for the exercise of true praise it is the heart that must be engaged, even more than the tongue. The most musical "Hallelujah" will not rise higher than the roof unless it is the expression of the heart's true worship. The most brilliant performance of the most praiseful anthem must surely fail of acceptance unless it is fragrant with adoration.

And, indeed, delightful and natural as the singing of God's praises must ever be to a redeemed soul, yet, after all, it is by actually speaking well of his name, and telling the things He has done for us, that we most exalt and glorify Him.

To laud, in general terms, the Great Physician, is less likely to attract the sin-stricken to his healing power than is the simple, honest confession, "I was brought low, and He helped me."

But, anyway and every way, let us testify to his goodness and grace, rejoicing to offer the sacrifice of praise, and calling upon others to join us in this blessed service. "Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving. . . . O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." Eternity only will reveal how many have been constrained to join the song

"Wherefore, with my utmost art
I will sing Thee,
And the cream of all my heart
I will bring Thee.

Seven whole days, not one in seven,
I will praise Thee;
In my heart, though not in heaven,
I can raise Thee.—Herbert.

LUCY A. BENNETT.

Countess Schimmelmänn.

WE recently announced the arrival in London of the Countess Schimmelmänn, a Danish lady of whom it may be said, "her praise is in all the churches" of her own country. The Countess has come in her yacht from the Baltic, in the ports of which she has during the summer been engaged preaching the Gospel and advocating temperance principles. In German cities, where such effort on the part of a lady is very unconventional, she succeeded in getting a ready hearing, thousands gathering to hear her. Among the working classes her message was specially well received. The Countess travels with hearty good wishes of all sections of the Christian Church in Denmark. She has invitations to speak in several cities and towns in Great Britain, and while still in London will be glad to hear from ladies and others who can organise meetings for her. On the Continent she has addressed Socialists and other classes not easy of approach. Communications may be addressed for the present to our care.

The Countess has consented to give an address at the Aldersgate-street Noon Prayer Meeting on Monday next, on mission work in the Baltic.

THE STUDENTS' MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

[BY OUR SPECIAL REPORTER.]

THE Missionary Conference at Liverpool, fore-shadowed in an article in our last issue, may be said to have fulfilled all the high expectations formed with respect to it. The proceedings were marked, from beginning to end, by a continually rising tide of public interest. The young friends at the helm of affairs were distinctly guided and helped in the conduct of it, so that human agency was not unduly magnified, and the simple but supreme aim of God's glory, in the advancement of his kingdom on the earth, was kept constantly in view. The teaching submitted to the assembled students was at once varied, thoroughly practical, and well suited to the ends designed. There was an excellent admixture of fact, of spiritual stimulus, and of the presentation of Divine claims on the whole-hearted service of every redeemed soul.

THE RECEPTION MEETING

at the Y.M.C.A., on Wednesday evening, was a crowded and most enthusiastic one. The audience was probably unique in its cosmopolitan character, as will appear by the statements of several of the speakers. If not gathered from every nation under heaven, the area of representation was large enough to entitle it to be called a World's Convention on a subject of world-wide import.

In his presidential remarks the good Bishop of LIVERPOOL showed a truly brotherly and catholic spirit. The Church of Christ to-day, he said, is often taunted with its divisions, and sometimes there is too much reason for the taunt. How delightful, then, to find an assemblage like this, representing so many lands, and so many varied sections of the Christian Church, all united in the one aim of advancing the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour in the distant parts of the world. After some remarks from Principal Rendall, a genial and much enjoyed address was delivered by that Liverpool veteran, Rev. CHARLES GARRETT. Under the spell of his glowing speech, the audience became electric, and broke into frequent applause. His theme was the essential unity of the Christian Church in the midst of manifold outward variety. He drew from the domains of nature and of society many telling illustrations of his point. To a child, he said, all the stars may look alike, but astronomers know well that one star differs from another star in glory. Look at the human face divine. In that, as in every department, God is always original; He never makes a copy. You will hear a fond mother say of her boy, "There never was such a child;" and she is right. There never was, and there never will be. And that is one reason why all the churches should unite in saving all the children, because each child is the only one that God has ever made or will make of that exact type. If the Church is God's workmanship we must look for the same characteristics in it that we find elsewhere. The gardener with his shears can trim dead trees to make them all look exactly alike. Let the trees be alive and he will have his work cut out for him if he would preserve their uniformity. The day after to-morrow the likeness will be gone. Mr. Garrett, referring to his ten children, said he rejoiced in the diversity of form and character among them; the one supplied what the other lacked; so with the Church of Christ.

As the spokesman of the student volunteers, Mr. DONALD FRASER, of Glasgow University, conveyed the hearty thanks of their Missionary Union to all the friends who had helped in preparing the way for the Conference. He said that in the subsequent proceedings they would be so occupied with the Master and the things that pertain to his kingdom that they would not be thinking very much of their fellow servants, so he wanted to thank everybody now.

He referred to the Missionary Conference in Liverpool in 1888, when 150 representatives from British societies came together to receive reports of past work, and lay plans for the future. The composition of the present Conference was much wider. There are thirteen nationalities represented, while forty-two British societies have sent official delegates. The students are but "volunteers," but these workers are veterans straight from the field. Their best contribution will be that they go forth from the conference to spread the fire which the Spirit will kindle, amongst the home congregations and the missionary stations when they return to their distant fields. Turning to his fellow students, Mr. Fraser urged them to make the most and best of the holy influences and impulses that would be generated during the days of Conference, by communion with God and one another. Let them wait for God, not for man, not for crowds, nor for eloquence. Our hope is in the living God; we wait with hushed spirits to hear what He will say, and, in obedience, to fulfil his commands.

The final speaker was Dr. A. T. PIERSON, just arrived from the States. In introducing him the Chairman expressed the hope that when in due time he returned to his native shores he would take back the assurance that between the English-speaking peoples, who read the same Bible, there may be peace as long as the world lasts. In the beginning of his speech our American visitor reciprocated to the full these sentiments of amity as to the peaceful relations of the sister lands. If two such closely-related nations should be found embroiled in warlike conflict, there would be a jubilee nowhere but in hell. As a visible and tangible expression of his feelings on this point, and as representing the Christianity of the United States, Dr. Pierson invited the venerable bishop in the chair to shake hands with him; and this dramatic little episode was endorsed by the heartiest cheers of the audience.

As to the specific business of the Convention, Dr. Pierson proceeded to pass in review "the plan of God in the ages" of which he had long been a student. We find in the Epistle to the Hebrews the magnificent conception that as God took matter and constructed the world, so He has taken time and is building it up into ages. There are ages of preparation, of experiment, and of transition; by and by, there will be ages of completion and consummation. As Christ is the corner-stone of the ages, He is yet to be the touch-stone of the whole structure. With respect to the world's evangelisation, we have three features specially exhibited in connection with it. First of all there is a double universality, as to the objects of it—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." Another side to this universality relates to the subjects addressed—"Go ye." Not a man, woman, or child who believes in Jesus Christ as a Saviour, is exempted from the responsibility of proclaiming that Saviour to a dying world.

The second feature in this plan of the ages is celerity. The King's business requires haste. In his last command, Jesus Christ manifestly contemplated that each generation of believers, while on earth, should undertake the evangelizing of the generation of which they formed a part. And in the primitive, apostolic day, the work was more nearly accomplished than in any subsequent generation from that time to this. As to the work to be done by our own generation, Dr. Pierson went on to note and expatiate impressively on (1) the marvellous modern multiplication of facilities for carrying the Gospel to the ends of the earth; (2) the remarkable multiplication of instrumentalities and agencies, such as the epiphany of woman in the service of the Church, the work of the Y.M.C.A., the rise and growth of that marvellous if mixed movement, the Salvation Army, and this Student Volunteer movement. It seems as if in these last days there is an intensification and a condensation of history, so that centuries are compacted into years, years into days, and days into hours.

Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Doth his successive journeys run, having been sung, the company dispersed, and the Conference was hopefully inaugurated.

THURSDAY FORENOON.

In the forenoons of Thursday, Friday, and Saturday the Conference broke up into sections, for the consideration of topics that might have a special interest and attraction for different groups of delegates.

On Thursday forenoon the arrangement was by countries. One company in Gordon Hall were instructed in the claims of India, and in another room of the same building South America and its needs were the important theme of address. At the Y.M.C.A. rooms there were different gatherings for considering the condition of China and Japan, of the great African continent, and of work among the Jews. At each meeting those having intimate knowledge and experience of the special field, gave information as to past work done, as to present needs and future prospects. Space will not allow of our giving detailed accounts of these sectional gatherings, but all were full of inspiration stimulus, and guidance for students purposing in due time to go forth.

THE MINISTERS' MEETING

on Thursday midday was not the least important of the day's engagements. It was convened in one of the rooms of the Y.M.C.A., and was attended by some sixty or seventy ministers of the Gospel. Mr. EUGENE STOCK, who presided, said he became more and more deeply impressed with the conviction that on the clergy and ministers in our churches there lies a responsibility which the great majority of them have as yet failed to realise. In most cases it is anything else first, and the advancement of Christ's Kingdom last. The churches exist, not that they may have splendid singing, beautiful services, and such like, but that they may evangelise the world. We call this a great missionary epoch, but there will have to be a much wider awakening of missionary interest in the churches than we have yet seen. One despairs of the older men, but our hope lies in the fact that the youngest of our ministers are the most alive. Every pastor who cuts loose from home-ties and goes abroad is a grand example to the others, but those who remain at home may be great channels of blessing to the churches and to the work of missions. Mr. Stock referred to a late visitation of his diocese by the Bishop of London, during which he urged each clergyman to preach at least twenty missionary sermons a year in his own church.

Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON, secretary of the L.M.S. did not think that ministers generally were backward in missionary interest, but they were so immersed in the multifarious and minute duties attaching to the pastoral office, that neither time nor strength was left for missionary effort. They ought, as leaders in the work of the church, to hand over the smaller matters to others, keeping themselves fresh and strong for the greater matters; and this missionary question is certainly one of the great matters that ought to be attended to. People may differ about many aspects of missionary work, but the thought that it is possible for the men of this generation to make Christ known to all in the world at present ignorant of Him, ought to kindle enthusiasm in the most sluggish heart. If that thought were to get into the hearts and minds of all ministers of the Gospel, the life and zeal of the churches would be mightily quickened. The more spiritual propulsion we put into our efforts the further they will go, and the more effectually they will accomplish the desired ends. Ministers can best discharge their responsibility in this matter by constantly keeping the subject before the people. That would involve much new study and research, but the reflex influence on their own life and preaching would be wonderful, not to speak of the direct effects on the congregations. It would be the grandest thing that ministers could do if they would go through the study required for preaching twenty missionary sermons a year to their own people.

In the course of a very interesting little address, Rev. W. E. BURROUGHS, of the C.M.S., said he believed that not one in ten of the ministers in his own denomination could tell offhand what were the last recorded words of the Lord Jesus Christ. He had often asked the question over the tea-table; directing the question, of course, to some juvenile member of the household, but really aiming it at the clergyman, who generally could not tell that the words were "the uttermost parts of the earth." Mr. Burroughs held up to his fellow ministers the Apostle Paul as a model in his missionary interest and zeal. Dr. GEORGE ROBINSON, of Perth, gave some interesting leaves from his own pastoral experience—how he had been prevented from going to the mission-field thirty years ago; how his interest in missions became focussed and intensified through the great missionary conference in London, seven years ago; and how that awakened interest had affected his influence on those under his pastoral care, so that their gifts to missions largely increased, and some gave themselves to work abroad. Dr. A. T. PIERSON, in a brief closing exhortation, urged ministers to study four books—the Holy Scripture, the book of Nature, the book of Divine Providence, and the book of God's energy in transforming human lives, carried on among mankind. We talk about apologetics; the energetics of God are the greatest apologetics in the world.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

The proceedings this afternoon were of sustained interest and importance. The first speaker to the great company gathered in the fine Philharmonic Hall was Dr. GILLISON, of Hankow. His appointed theme was the desirability of a full medical curriculum for those who were purposing to engage in medical mission work. He maintained that the work of the foreign field demanded the very best and ablest of our Christian men and women. No one can be too good to go, and very few are good enough. The man who neglects intellectual training is using only five out of ten talents with which God has entrusted him. The speaker strongly advised the cultivation of methodical habits of life and work; these would stand the student in good stead when he reached the foreign field. While he would not say a word against partial medical training, if more could not be had, he was very strong in advocating the full course. The medical missionary has to undertake many things in the mission field that he would not be called on to do at home, where the aid of the specialist may be invoked. People in heathen lands cannot discriminate, and they judge the whole profession by the failures or successes of those who are labouring among them. It would be far better, in the long run, for a man to wait at home the extra two or three years needed for the full course of study, than to go out earlier only partially qualified. Missionary societies ought to have it laid on them as a burden to give the medical missionary full support, and to see to it that a hospital is put at his disposal wherever possible.

Some plain, practical words followed from Mr. EUGENE STOCK on the training of character. Besides the kind of training to which the previous speaker had referred, and even more important, was the building up of personal character. That cannot be done in the mission-field. Three considerations were submitted by Mr. Stock to his student hearers, as of supreme import—"I and my work; I and my comrades; I and my Lord." As to the first, the student must recognise that there are diversities of operation; and while he believes thoroughly in the special sphere to which God may have called him, he must not belittle the work of others. The second point was driven home by an exposition of the apostolic dictum, "in honour preferring over another." As to the third consideration, it was urged that while the work is God's and not the missionary's, there is room for the play of his personality. We are to speak and work as if the whole depended on us. Faith and fatalism are not the same thing. Above all it is to be borne in mind that every worker is to be absolutely at God's disposal, and that He is entitled to loving, loyal, continuous service.

After some striking references to the unique composition of the student delegations to the Conference, and the future possibilities involved in such a gathering, Dr. PIERSON appealed to the churches to support the Student Volunteer Movement by the power of earnest, sympathetic, and importunate prayer. It seemed to him that Apostolic prayer was almost a lost art in the churches. He believed that the day was coming when Christian parents would rear up their children for God and his service as distinctly as the husbandman grows a crop of wheat for the people's bread. Let family life be so hallowed that parental aim and endeavour shall have reference to the proclamation of the Gospel to the ends of the earth, and not to the amassing of fortunes, or the securing of social distinction and titular dignities.

THURSDAY EVENING.

Another splendid congregation filled the Philharmonic Hall on Thursday evening; the proceedings were again under the presidency of Mr. DONALD FRASER, of Glasgow. In the early part of the meeting he intimated that a telegraphic dispatch had come from Mr. L. D. Wishard, now in Athens—"Let us make the colleges in all lands mission stations." Mr. Wishard had hoped to be at the Conference, but was prevented. Another telegram was from five old members of the Union now working in India, and was to this effect:—"India claims a thousand volunteers." After two brethren had engaged in prayer, there followed three addresses—varied in matter and manner, but all of them marked by deep interest, and showing the wonderful working power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Rev. EGERTON YOUNG asked the audience to go with him across the sea to the land of the Red Indians of North America. It was a striking fact, he observed, that the first Protestant Mission (in the time of Cromwell) was to these Indians. Some deeply interesting memories of Elliot and Brainerd, and their work among the redskins, were recalled. Those to whom they preached have all vanished, and so have their descendants, but their work and testimony remain. Brainerd's journal fell into the hands of Carey, Henry Martyn, and John Wesley, and its contents thrilled these men, whose names will never be forgotten in the records of missionary effort. Mr. Young humorously described his first call to the work in the North-West, while he was a city pastor in Hamilton, Ontario. He counselled the young missionaries to give much attention to the acquisition of the language so as to be independent of interpreters. The advantage to the missionary of having even a little medical knowledge was well illustrated by some of Mr. Young's experiences among the Indians. His diocese, he said, was larger than all England, and he had many rough experiences in travel; but the joy of harvest in seeing these sons of the chase led to Christ was an ample reward. The power of Christ's Gospel was seen in its uplift of woman. In the old days the Indian men's treatment of the squaws was cruel and terrible indeed. But a change came in the course of years, through the blessed influence of Gospel preaching. Mr. Young moved and thrilled the meeting by his vivid narration of the wondrous changes thus wrought in the hearts of those Indians.

Mrs. DUNCAN McLAREN, of Edinburgh, addressed herself to the consideration of the subject, "How the Nations Pray." In language of great beauty and eloquence she described the ardent but blind devotions of faithful Mohammedans, Hindus, Chinese, Buddhists in Japan—all worshippers of false gods, that see and hear not, and can neither answer nor understand. How dark would be the outlook if we could look only on such scenes as these; but many of these very heathens have seen the light of the Gospel, and have come to its rising. How earnestly the native Christians pray! How they understand the value of intercessory prayer; and they call on us who have long known the Saviour, to bear them up in our prayers unto God. Their idols have all been abolished, and prayers to these are a thing of the past. Many of us in Christian lands might take a humble place beside those native witnesses for the Gospel. Most of the converts in Manchuria are the fruit of the labours of the native converts themselves. Another pathetic tribute came from Mrs. McLaren's lips to the elevating power of Christ's Gospel among the women and the children of heathen lands. God is using even the children to confound the things that are mighty. Does anyone ask if missions pay? From far and near the answer comes from lives that have been redeemed, and hearts that have been transformed. It is too late to ask such a question. Let our earnest endeavour be to make them pay better in the years to come than they have in the days that are past. If we are faithful his promise is sure—the light shall arise, and the darkness shall flee away.

Last of all came Mr. CHARLES T. STUDD, who received a very cordial welcome. Before he spoke, however, prayer was offered by Professor Simpson, of Edinburgh, in whose rooms it was that Messrs Stanley Smith and Studd united in prayer when they spoke to Edinburgh students nine years ago. It was out of that time of revival among Scottish students that the British student movement arose. Mr. STUDD said his word to his young friends was, "Do it." It means something—loss, sacrifice, far more than we anticipate; but if we are not prepared to do it, we must give up saying that we love the Lord Jesus. The sight of so many young men and women stirs one's heart. Let them hear the words of the Apostle, "I write unto you young men, because ye are strong, and have overcome the wicked one." We must get to know that we can do nothing of ourselves; then the Lord will make his life and power to be manifest in and through us. Mr. Studd described the spiritual destitution of vast regions in China, with its teeming millions of population. "God is love;" but there is no love anywhere else. There is no love among the Chinese, without the Gospel. Think of 400,000,000 souls ignorant of God and Christ; and then think of 40,000,000 of Britishers who would be insulted if they were thought to be ignorant of these things. What a disproportion in the workers! For all China only 2000 workers, and half of them women; for our own forty millions we have at least fifty thousand specially appointed workers, not to speak of private Christians. Think of the cruelty to animals in China; worse than that, of the child murders!

Still more terrible, perhaps, is the foot-binding, which is the occasion of such unimaginable cruelty. Notwithstanding these deformed feet, the Chinese women, when they get interested in the Gospel, will walk twenty miles with a child on their back to a mission service, being ill-treated and neglected all the way. How their lives should shame us!

Turning to the brighter side of the question, Mr. Studd told something of the wonderful changes that take place through the power of the Gospel. This is seen very much at the Communion, where you see the people utterly broken down at the fresh view they have received of God's love. I have been asked (said the speaker) if I thought the communion was to the Chinese a means of grace when administered by unordained hands; my only answer was, "Rather!" and the audience cheered to the echo. God search our British hearts as we think of the devotion and self-sacrifice of these Chinese converts. The sacrifices, losses, and persecutions that have to be endured by those who come out wholly for Christ in a Chinese community, were graphically portrayed by Mr. Studd. His whole soul seemed to go into his closing words as he entreated his young hearers to obey the Lord's last command—to go and do no more.

FRIDAY FORENOON.

The sectional gatherings this forenoon were arranged with the view to a setting forth of the different phases of mission-work—evangelistic, medical, educational, etc. The speakers on the first-named department included such experienced friends as Rev. Egerton Young, Rev. G. L. Pilkington, and Mr. Eugene Stock. In the medical section addresses were given by Professor Simpson (Edinburgh), Dr. Maxwell, Dr. Sargood Fry, and Dr. Battersby. The educational aspects of missionary effort were ably presented by Dr. George Smith (Edinburgh), Rev. J. F. Gardner (Bombay), Mr. Pittendrigh (Madras), and Rev. P. Begg (Bengal); while Miss Stowell, of the British Syrian Mission, very earnestly advocated the school and other work of that Society in the northern parts of Palestine. The work of the Bombay Missionary Settlement for women, which has lately been established, was graphically described in a lengthy but interesting statement by Miss Gollock and others.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

There was no falling off either in attendance or the interest shown. Mr. DONALD FRASER, the president, announced that a telegram had come from Messrs. R. G. Wilder and J. R. Mott, in attendance on a conference of Indian students at Colombo. The message was as follows:—"Asia's crisis demands thousands of mountain-removing volunteers."

"The Holy Spirit and His Work," was the specially selected topic of the afternoon, and the speakers were Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor and Rev. F. B. Meyer. Mr. MACGREGOR chose for his text Paul's question to some disciples at Ephesus, "Have ye received the Holy Spirit since ye believed?" We ought, he said, to expect a wonderful work of the Spirit in our hearts and lives as Christians, even after conversion. Various incidents in the history of the early church, as recorded in the Acts, were recounted to illustrate the point advanced. Wherever the lot of a missionary may be cast there cannot be an adequate blessing on his labours unless he or she knows experimentally the fulness of the Holy Spirit. This experience is one that is possible for all believers; it is the birthright of all. Further it is imperative. God's command is, "Be filled with the Spirit," and the command is as binding on a Christian as any other. Do we not need to ask forgiveness from God for the sin of not being thus filled? It is our risen and exalted Lord who bestows this blessing. It comes only to the believing, obedient, and surrendered soul. What hinders? Self-will.

If we knew in their fulness the meaning of the two words, "absolute surrender," most of our difficulties in the spiritual life would vanish. This experience may come to us suddenly, though not necessarily so. But God can bestow on us an amazingly big blessing in a very short time.

One of the effects of this bestowment will be an enlargement of our knowledge of the character and purpose of God. The heart blessing of joy is another result. Love one to another, a different relation to the will of God, and to worldly possessions, would also result from this surrender to the fulness of the Holy Spirit. Then it would not be possible for men who had offered their lives to the work of missions, to be rejected for want of means to send them forth.

In following up the subject Rev. F. B. MEYER said that the instruction of the previous address must now be applied. To any present who might yet be unregenerate he addressed an earnest appeal for instant submission to God. To those who had an intellectual conception, but not a conscious personal experience, of the endowment of the Holy Ghost power, there was a further invitation to a humble, but definite, reception of that power. Some hindrances were pointed out—lack of tenderness in life, powerlessness in prayer or in testimony. Before Pentecost there must come Calvary. We must have our share in the death of Christ before we are ready to be anointed with the Holy Ghost. Step by step the speaker led on the hushed assembly to a full renunciation of all that would keep back the soul from claiming and possessing by faith this ineffable blessing of the indwelling, the inworking, and the outgoing of the power of God's mighty Spirit. Take, reckon, and act faith, and as the soul believes so it will be done. It was a deeply solemn and impressive time, and doubtless many a soul had a silent transaction with God that will colour and influence the whole future life.

FRIDAY EVENING.

A truly grand and inspiring assemblage filled the Philharmonic Hall this evening. After a hymn, earnest prayer by two friends, and the reading of Scripture by the chairman, Mr. D. Fraser, Dr. GEORGE SMITH, of Edinburgh, gave the opening address. It was a historic survey of new departures in missions, during the past century, as following on critical periods of shaking among the nations of Europe, America, and India. It was perhaps the most masterly utterance of the whole Convention, and we purpose to give a full report of it in our next week's issue.

Miss GOLLOCK, referring to the applause that followed her rising to speak, said that what we want to see is the students' feet set in motion rather than their hands. She spent last winter in India, with its many peoples and its great needs, but since she returned she had seldom been able to speak of it, because she felt that missionary inspiration comes more from the personal claims of Christ on the soul, than from the needs of any particular country. Paul in his time of imprisonment, with only his pen free to work, thus summed up his life aspiration: "To me to live is Christ." That was the secret of his service; and it forms the deepest consecration text in all the Bible. Those who can underline the text, and write their names against it in solemn covenant, have learned something of what it is to live. Too many Christians have not realised their right relation to their Lord. If they had, that would settle their relations to work abroad. Not service or success, but Christ, should be the keynote of the Christian life. Christ and the student, hand in hand and heart to heart—that relation lies at the basis of the evangelisation of the world. Let every soul face it and see that the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, says:—"My son, give me thy heart." Before your service He claims yourself.

How may this exclusive relationship be manifested in daily life and service, as a preparation for work abroad? There is no mantle of grace which falls on an outgoing missionary. He has only what he had before, with many new and strong temptations to be fought. If there has been failure at home there will be failure abroad. If there be not daily and deep communion at home the habit will not be formed abroad. Give the preparatory years to the deepening of the inner life. Seek to know and walk with Christ by the light and teaching of the Holy Ghost. Then, when the time comes, the student and his Lord will go forth together.

As to life in the colleges—speaking specially to women students—Miss Gollock said that some principals and tutors in the colleges would be in sympathy with spiritual things, and others would not. In contact with others let them remember that Jesus Christ is full of sympathy with everything in formation—far more so than our human teachers. When in doubt on many points, and when seas of thought surge around, remember that Jesus Christ remains ever the same. Put Him honestly and loyally into the centre of the life, and He will lead the trusting soul into all truth. When everything else is shaky hold fast to the Rock of Ages. In the college itself there is a work to do for Christ, beyond and apart from any mental and intellectual calls on the student. From the centre Christ we can look out fearlessly in any direction. Returning from India this verse, "To me to live is Christ," came with peculiar power to her when in Egypt. The Spirit of God pressed it home time after time, and it was marked in her Bible. A succeeding visit to Italy, with its artistic seductions, revealed the need of this pledge to look at every phase of life solely from the standpoint of Jesus Christ. College work is not easy work. It may mean reproach, difficulty, and often rebuff, but whoever has said "To me to live is Christ," will go straight on and never mind; not in self-strength, but in dependence on the guidance of the Holy Ghost, looking alone at the glory of Christ.

This also comes as the motto while working in the church at home. There is a definite responsibility towards pastor and church organisation, and the student who is given up to Christ, will seek to manifest Him in all home work. As to the great work of the future, unless Christ is the Life, far better not go abroad at all; but if He is the centre of the life at home He will choose the station and the life work. He yearns over heathendom, and there are many posts, which only students can properly fill. And the very best equipment is needed. In looking around for a sphere, the well-equipped lady student will perhaps be tempted to think that no post offered is good enough for her capacities! Can we forget that our great Master, with all his powers, human and divine, "threw Himself away" on Galilean peasants? If God has touched our hearts by his Spirit we cannot do better than throw ourselves away like that.

The third speaker, Dr. PIERSON, said this had been a day of the Holy Spirit. He would change his subject, and speak of the relation of the Holy Spirit to the character and service of the missionary. We are now pre-eminently in the dispensation of the Holy Ghost; yet the personality, the presiding presence, and administrative work, of the Spirit are very largely ignored. In John xiv.-xvi. our Lord tells of the character and province of the Spirit of God. In these chapters we have the foundation of the teaching given in the Acts and the Epistles. He is at once the Spirit of life, of love, and of order. As to character, we are absolutely dependent on the Spirit for all attainments in holiness. Behind all intellectual accomplishment lies character. Holy living is as much the product of supernatural power as was Peter's walking on the water. We are taught in Rom. viii. that the Holy Spirit is the element in which the child of God can alone live, and grow, and prosper. As any element is greater than the being that lives in it, so the Holy Spirit is vaster than any believer who lives in the Spirit. There may be a transition from one element to the other, but the life of the Spirit cannot be lived in the element of the flesh. "He that abideth in Him sinneth not." All the great questions about holiness are solved here. There can only be defeat when we walk in the energy of the flesh; but when we walk and live and pray in the Spirit conquest comes out of defeat.

As to the service of Christ in the work of Missions, we find that the Spirit of God is the channel of Divine activity. He is the organiser of the Church, the edifier of the Church, and the multiplier of the Church. But the Holy Spirit also condescends to guide individuals. As a mother has a care for each member of her family, so the Holy Ghost, the nursing-mother of souls, has a regard for the feeblest babe in Christ. He brings together the seeker and the servant who can give guidance to the enquiring soul. He opens the eyes of the blasphemer, and turns a Saul into a Paul. The Holy Ghost separates every worker to his special work, and sends him forth with a personal authority. He restrains a Paul from taking one course, and directs him to Macedonia in answer to a special call. Coming to modern times, He restrained Carey from going to the South Seas, and directed him to India. So it was with Adoniram Judson, when he was sent to Burmah; and with Livingstone when God shut the door of China, where he essayed at first to go, and thrust him into the neglected continent. If we are wholly given up to the Spirit of God He will bend the heavens and come down and guide the individual worker to his work. Then seeming failures will be turned into successes, and we can praise Him through all our diversified pathway. Another thought is that the Spirit gives utterance to the consecrated worker. The God who made man's mouth can take out of it any obstacle to the fullest witness-bearing. There is also the demonstration of the Spirit," by which the apostle claimed to speak. The Spirit's logical processes are wonderful. He reveals God to the unbeliever, and uncovers hell to the accusing conscience. If we have not learned to depend on the Spirit, let us tarry till we do, or our work, whether at home or abroad, will be in vain.

Bible Reading and Prayer Union.

THE members of this organisation are invited to enter in order that they may be encouraged and helped to read definite portions of Scripture daily in fellowship with others. The readings are from the more doctrinal and devotional books of the Bible; and from each of these daily portions one verse is selected as the golden text of the day, upon which the mind may rest. In addition, for those who desire it, there is the I.B.R. card, with the International Bible readings, so that those who enter the Union may be in touch with our Sunday schools, and with the Bible reading of our young people.

Along with this communion in Bible reading there is also union in prayer; one prayer being brief and personal, to which the mind may recur throughout the day in quiet moments. The petitions of the other prayer express a sense of the responsibility and delight of membership in Christ's church, and seek that Divine grace through which the life of each member of Christ's Church, and the manifold services of his Church in the world, may be inspired and fulfilled.

The card of daily readings may be had from the secretaries of the Union, 22, Forest-road West, Nottingham, and 710, Avenue-road, Syracuse, New York, U.S.A., who will be glad to correspond with any who wish to join or to increase the membership.

Mr. Radcliffe in Russia.*

IN JANUARY, 1884, we started for far-away Russia. Passing through London, we spent a night or two at Garden House, Mildmay, with our loved friends Mr. and Mrs. James E. Mathieson. Special prayer was made for us at the Conference Hall, and also at the noon prayer-meeting in Aldersgate Street. Dr. Baedeker was to be our leader, as he had often visited Russia before; and on the sixth of February, we left Berlin in company with himself and Mrs. Baedeker, and travelling straight on for two nights and two days, we arrived at St. Petersburg. It was like entering a new world; all was so white. Everything was covered with snow, and so noiseless, save for the call of the coachman in Russian, "Beware! Beware!" to warn any one passing before his sledge.

After a week's sojourn in St. Petersburg, Mr. Radcliffe wrote:—"We are fully engaged in English, Russian, Swedish, and German; and we have been cheered with signs following. The kindness of the friends here, and their true sympathy, prayer, devotion, and boldness, were very refreshing and very instructive. We learnt much from them."

In going to Finland we needed fresh strength and wisdom and tact from our Father in heaven. "Day by day our daily bread." Our chief meetings in Helsingfors were in a large hall in the hotel Societäts-hus. In one case the interpretation was into Swedish; and as it came forth, another whispered it into Finnish; and the Finn who whispered the Finnish interpretation, after conversation at the close of the service, was one of those who professed to be set at liberty. After Mr. Radcliffe had spoken in the hall, he invited men to come to one side of the platform, and women to the other side, to be spoken to. He talked to the men, and I to the women, Froken Sahlberg interpreting for me.

Miss Sahlberg had a large ladies' school in Helsingfors; and this dear lady opened her school-rooms for smaller meetings, herself interpreting with great ability and joy. Miss Sahlberg had previously received blessing through Lord Radstock's words, when he came so suddenly to Finland after leaving us at Stockholm. One night a big man professed to get saved, and then he spoke to his wife, and she got saved; they then spoke to their daughter, and all three went home rejoicing. Many stood up at Helsingfors and professed to have taken Christ as their Saviour.

April, 1884, found us once more in St. Petersburg. It was intensely interesting to stand in the Greek Church near midnight, in the midst of a great congregation waiting for the Easter morn. There were ladies on one side of the church, and men on the other—all in evening dress, and each holding a lighted candle. A coffin was there, as if it contained the body of the Saviour. Many walked round it, and some seemed to shed tears; at last a number of priests lifted it reverently and bore it away. Then came a burst of song from the choir. The words, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him," were repeated in Russian again and again. At last the choir marched down the aisle, went out of the building, and walked round it, singing sadly as they went. Suddenly this dirge ceased, and immediately many voices burst forth chanting with joy, "The Lord is risen indeed!" Candles were blown out; everyone fell upon his neighbour's neck, and kissed him; and the anniversary of the glad Easter morn was brought in with rejoicing.

Arriving in Finland, we parted with our dear companions, Dr. and Mrs. Baedeker, at Wiborg. The large Lutheran Church at Wiborg was opened for Mr. Radcliffe's services, and the Navigation School for the ladies' meetings and inquirers. We were told that no meetings like these were held at Wiborg before. The ladies came up with tears in their eyes, and pressed our hands. The military and the clergy, and all sorts of people, came to listen.

Kyrkoherden Forsten, the Canon, gave Mr. Radcliffe a warm welcome; and his dear daughter Anna Forsten was a charming helper in smaller meetings. After leaving Wiborg, we returned to Helsingfors; then on to Borga and Abo; and from thence to Tammerfors, the Manchester of Finland. The proprietor of the cotton-mill, Mr. William Von-Nottbeck, placed the factory church at Mr. Radcliffe's disposal, and also obtained permission for him to preach on Sunday in the great State Church.

Mr. Radcliffe engaged a Finnish interpreter, Mr. McKinnon, a student from the institution of Dr. Grattan Guinness, London, to join us at Tammerfors. This is the third town in Finland, where we have seen the natives crowd out as an awakened people. Mr. Radcliffe wrote to a friend, "In the midst of the crowds we remind one another that the command is upon us—standing up without a sentence of their language—'Give ye them to eat!' That multitude in Palestine only were fed because the Lord Jesus was present; and we know He is present with us, and so our joy is in God."

England and America.

WE reproduce, with our heartiest endorsement, the following wise and Christian words from our influential contemporary the New York Independent:—

"War? No! a thousand times, no! God forbid! It is a thought too monstrous to be seriously entertained. War means slaughter, frightful slaughter. It means the killing of men in untold numbers. It means the making of widows and orphans by the thousand and the breaking up of families. It means destruction of property, great injury to commerce, and the wasting of millions of treasure. It is not a gay naval parade, nor a grand military review, but a deliberate, vindictive, and remorseless duel to death. The greater the combatants the more fierce and terrible the war.

"War with England? Impossible. She is our mother country. We are of one blood, one race, one language, and one civilisation. Our frequent expressions of jealous impatience with her only prove the sincere attachment that exists at bottom. War with England? Far be it from us. War with the United States, her own kin, with whom the bonds of peace have so long remained unbroken? England cannot tolerate the thought. It ought to be impossible.

"We are too advanced in Christian civilisation to think of war as the solution of our difficulty. We have a difficulty; but God has given us reason, and have we cultivated reason during all the centuries since we left the shades of barbarism, to dethrone it now for an appeal to the sword? Those who welcome war, talk like fools; those who grow hilarious over the prospect of it are merry with insanity.

"War is the very last thing any nation ought to think of. It is the dernier ressort. When diplomacy utterly fails; when reason and common-sense become useless; when peace is no longer possible, and it is either war or dishonour—then only is fighting justifiable.

"We have peace with England; we expect to maintain it. We are not beyond the province of diplomacy. It is not cowardly on our part to refuse to precipitate a conflict. It is moral cowardice not to persist in peaceful negotiations. Let us have faith that honourable peace will be secured, and let the hot-heads on both sides of the Atlantic who are conjuring up the spectre of war be treated as chattering magpies."

"HE THAT HANGETH IS ACCURSED OF GOD"

Deut. xxi. 23.

THIS LAW on the Jewish statute-book hastened the awful tragedy of Calvary. No body must be left to rot on the cross on which it had been impaled. The corpse of the malefactor must be taken down at nightfall. But how little did the Pharisees and Scribes realise that the remainder of this verse had so pertinent a reference, and was having so remarkable a fulfilment. The Apostle quotes this verse as giving the inner rationale or meaning of the death of our blessed Lord (Gal. iii. 13). "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree." On Jesus fell the reduplicated curses, that were deserved by the race, and by each.

The curse of the broken law.—"Cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things written in the Book of the Law." None had kept, all had broken that law. None was righteous, no, not one. Man's lot was cast under Mount Ebal. The race was guilty and silent before the bar of infinite justice. But Jesus, by virtue of his relationship with the entire human family, was able to stand before God charged with that sin, bearing that curse, and put them away for ever. There is no barrier, therefore, now to the outflow of God's free grace.

The curse due to individual transgression.—The whole race had broken away from God, and was under the curse; so that each of us shared in the solemn accountability to God, for the whole and for our part. But he became sin for us; cursed that we might be blessed; cast out that we might be for ever welcomed; naked that we might be clothed; hungry that we might feed on his flesh; poor that we might be enriched; dying that we might live beyond the range of the curse for evermore.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13.

"THOU SHALT MAKE A BATTLEMENT FOR THY ROOF"

Deut. xxii. 8.

The householder was not to be content with what would be safe for himself; he must see to it that the undefended roof of his house should not be a source of danger to little children, the weak, or the careless. He might be able to walk on the roof of his house with so sure a foot as not to need the parapet or trellis-work, warning him from the edge; but what he could do might be impossible for feet less sure than his. Hence the need of the battlement! Each new house must have its battlement around the margin of its roof.

This should be the law for each new home.—Wherever a household is constituted, battlements should be built to protect, as far as possible, the weak and tempted. The pace of the household should be that of the feeblest of its members. You are careful to have the balustrade and the little swing gate, not that the grown-up require them, but for the protection and safety of young and feeble life. Similarly build the battlement of total abstinence, of the discountenance of worldly amusement, of the habit of family worship. Guard against exposure to needless temptation, and occasions for falling.

This should be the law in older households.—It becomes the master of the home sometimes to go around his household, above all his own character, to inspect the condition of the battlements. Is there laxity, inconsistency, need of precaution? Let us search our hearts and lives, our habits, and the ordering of our homes, that the battlements may be strengthened where they are weak, or erected where they are wanting. "Look every man upon the things of others."

"THE LORD THY GOD WALKETH IN THE MIDST OF THY CAMP TO DELIVER THEE: THEREFORE SHALL THY CAMP BE HOLY."—Deut. xliii. 14.

At all times Israel needed to keep from evil, but especially when her embattled hosts went forth to war, for in the conception of her prophets and saints her battles were not to be fought or won by herself. The Lord God of Hosts was there. It was a joint campaign. This was specially revealed to Joshua, when he beheld the captain of the Lord's host, with a drawn sword, beside him. So, Christian soul, remember, in thy war against the evil of the world, and the solicitations of thine own wicked heart, that the battle is not yours, but God's. He is in the midst of thee, thou needest not be moved! He has sworn to deliver thee by his own right hand, and by his holy arm, and to give up thine enemies before thee.

There was one condition, however, on which the presence of God amongst his people was possible—the camp must be holy. No unclean thing might be seen in any of its borders. The veil of mother-earth must cover all impurity. Thus, as God went up and down the long avenues of the tents, He would see nothing to offend his gaze and make Him turn away. How deep a lesson! God is ever patrolling the avenues of our life. The most secret processes of our daily existence, our innermost relationships, the thoughts and intents of our heart, are all manifest to Him. There must be nothing to make Him turn away in holy abhorrence, else we cannot count on Him to deliver us, to give up our enemies before us. "Search me, O God!"

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15.

"THOU SHALT STAND WITHOUT, AND THE MAN TO WHOM THOU DOST LEND SHALL BRING FORTH THE PLEDGE WITHOUT UNTO THEE."—Deut. xxiv. 11.

What courtesy and respect for the feelings of another prompted this injunction! The poor man needs a loan, and for this purpose goes to his rich neighbour. It would be possible for the latter, in the pride of his purse and position, to go ruthlessly across the threshold of the poor man's house, look contemptuously around its penury, and lay his hand with indelicate haste on the treasures of the poor man's family life. This, which had been dear to his father! That, associated with happier, better days! Such conduct might not be, said the divine precept. If the poor man asked a loan, he must choose his own pledge, and fetch it from his house with his own hand; it must be his act.

God respects the nature with which He has endowed us.—He will not force an entrance on any man. Though He made us, He waits for us to give Him right of entrance. He stands at the door and knocks. He asks for our consecration, that we should give Him our whole being in pledge, and in return for the loan of infinite grace; but He will not take till we give, or count on ought belonging to us as his property, until we have surrendered, spirit, soul, and body, at his invitation.

God expects us to respect the nature of others.—Let us reverence that wonderful soul-life which is the perquisite of each individual. We have no right to break in with the mailed foot of the politician, or the furtive tread of the priest. The father-confessor has no right to stand within the sacred precincts of conscience. No man has a claim on his brother save that which love supplies.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16.

"THOU SHALT NOT MUZZLE THE OX WHEN HE TREADETH OUT THE CORN."—Deut. xxv. 4.

"God taketh care of oxen," is Paul's comment on this text, and so God did. These pages are filled with tokens of his thought, for the ass that might not be overtaxed by being set to plough with an ox, for the ass or ox which were to be helped up if they had sunk on the road overpowered with their burdens, or for the bird sitting on her nest. Here the ox, as it went around the monotonous tread of the mill, was to be allowed to take a chance mouthful of corn.

The care for dumb creatures is part of our religious duty. It is one of the elements of religion to think for the dumb creatures, who are not able to speak for themselves, but suffer so patiently the accumulated wrongs heaped on them by man. Oh, when will the travail of creation cease! Man's sin has indeed worked woe for the lower orders of creation.

The apostle used this injunction to remind his converts of the necessity of caring for their spiritual teachers. Some are called to plough, others to thresh, but each should receive his maintenance. They that serve the altar should live by the altar, and those which proclaim the Gospel should live of the Gospel.

But there is sweet encouragement here for those who are anxious about their daily bread. God takes care for oxen; will He not for you? Shall the oxen browse on the wolds and pasture-lands, and be nourished to fatness, and will He leave to starve the soul that really trusts and serves Him?

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17.

"THOU SHALT REJOICE IN ALL THE GOOD THE LORD THY GOD HATH GIVEN UNTO THEE."—Deut. xxvi. 11.

Do not be afraid of joy! There are some who only sip of the sweet draughts which God puts to their lips, afraid of drinking long and deeply. When good things come into their lives, they are always thinking of some bitter make-weight, possibly some impending trouble. This is a mistake. We must be prepared to learn the lessons of dark hours when God sends them, but we need not hesitate to learn those of bright and happy ones, when they, too, are meted out to us. As we give ourselves up to sorrow, we should give ourselves up to joy! As the soul descends into the grave, it should have its resurrection and ascension! If the soul-planet must travel to a wintry distance, let us hail those halcyon hours when it returns to stand in the summer spheres of joy!

We cannot always be on the strain. It is not possible to live on one side of our nature without impairing the health of all. David must bring his harp, and play in the presence of the soul, when its fits of depression return. There is necessity that we should cultivate tracks of our soul that lie towards a southern aspect, filling them with flowers, and fruits, and beehives, and things that children love.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18.

"THOU SHALT BUILD THE ALTAR OF THE LORD THY GOD OF UNHEWN STONES."—Deut. xxvii. 6.

The obvious intention of this precept was to prevent idolatry, lest the people should think more of the altar than of Jehovah who was worshipped there. Beware of anything that would divert men's thoughts from God.

Build your addresses of unhewn stones. When speaking to men, Paul determined to erect structures of unhewn stones, eschewing worldly wisdom, that the power of God might burn more conspicuously on the altar of his words. The distinction between the artificial and the unhewn is especially patent in comparing his address on Mars' Hill with the opening chapters of the Corinthians. If you spend too much time in cutting the stones of your address, people will be more occupied with their artistic grace than with the Divine fire that should burn upon them.

Build your prayers of unhewn stones. The expressions of some men in prayer are so exquisitely chiselled that you keep wondering what they will say next, and how. Their prayers stand as beautiful altars on which there is no fire. Oh, for the strong cryings and tears of a Spirit-taught man, rather than the exquisite beauty of an oration to God!

Build your inner life of unhewn stones. Do not keep looking to see how you are performing the acts of consecration, confession, devotion. The least you think of these the better, that your entire thought may be consecrated on the great God and his Presence. One inch of rising flame is better than yards of chiselled stone!

A SUNDAY EVENING AT HOME.

LET us gather round the table, each with Bible and hymn-book, for a little service together. We will commence with a hymn; one of you can choose your favourite. Then read in turn Psalm cxix. 1—24. After that let us sing another favourite hymn. And now for a chat

ABOUT THE BIBLE.

It would be impossible in a single hour to find out all that God has said of the Scriptures which He has Himself dictated; but we will, at any rate, turn up some of the passages in which the Word of God is referred to, and I trust that this book will be more precious to each of us after our study to-day. You will all try and find each passage, and the one who finds it first will read aloud.

Psalm xix. 10. This verse says that the Scriptures are more to be desired than Gold, and sweeter than Honey! What will not men do to get gold! Why, strange to say, some will sacrifice respect, affection, friends, home, and, in some cases, even their own bodies in order to possess gold! But God's Word is more to be desired than gold! It is priceless beyond measure. It has done so much for us and for all mankind that we cannot estimate its worth.

And it is sweeter than honey! Why, we each have our favourite sweetmeat; and we sometimes think that if we had ever so much money we would spend it all in that particular confection. But honey is sweeter and more wholesome than the purest sweetmeat, and God's Word is sweeter than that! Have you tasted its sweetness? The Psalmist had; and if you read, and obey God's commands, and practise its precepts, you will find that he was right when he said this of the Scriptures.

Psalm cxix. 105. How beautifully this passage describes what the Bible is—a Lamp unto my feet, and a Light unto my path. You country children who sometimes go through the lanes in the dark evenings understand better than our little town children what this means, for in the towns are numerous gaslights along the path, and it is easy to avoid stumbling or falling. But there are times in our life when the road is dark before us, and we know not where to tread. Then if we are acquainted with the Word of God it will shine upon the way just like a bright lamp or lantern would do on a dark road. And the more we read and pay heed to the Scriptures, the better we shall know the right path to take.

Deut. xxxii. 2 and Isaiah lv. 10. These passages ABOUT THE BIBLE. poetically liken the Word of God to the Rain the Snow, the Dew, and the Showers.

These passages have a very musical ring about them, and tell us that just as the clouds send down their moisture to refresh the land, and cause nature to produce the fruits of the earth, so God's Word has been sent down from heaven to refresh our hearts, and make us bring forth the fruits of righteousness. Of course, this is particularly true also of the Lord Jesus, the living Word of God.

Joshua i. 8. This verse presents God's Word as a Key to prosperity. Oh, this is just what we want! The schoolboy, the apprentice, the clerk, the workman—all alike want to succeed in life. This is the royal road to success—to obey the commands of God. "Then thou shalt make thy way prosperous; then thou shalt have good success."

Proverbs vi. 20-22 and Psalm cix. 11. Here we see that God's Word will act as a Charm. "A charm!" you say, "surely you don't believe in charms?" Now, do not judge me too hastily. I read one day that some white rats had been discovered in a railway carriage at a suburban station, and some officials tried to capture them, and could not until the train arrived at the terminus. A few days afterwards someone wrote to the papers saying that he had been travelling one day when some sailors entered the carriage, and each drew a white rat from his bosom or his sleeve, and let it loose in the carriage, assuring his fellow-passengers that they were perfectly harmless. It appears that some sailors carry them wherever they go to guard them against ill-luck. No, I am not superstitious; but I do know that the Word of God is able to keep us. As the Psalmist said, "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against Thee." I have proved the truth of these words; and you may do the same, if you treasure up the Word of God and ponder it in your heart.

Ephesians vi. 17. Here Paul tells us that the Word of God is

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

It was the sword our Saviour used when He was tempted in the wilderness. His answer, "It is written," baffled the Tempter; and if we become acquainted with the Scriptures we shall be able to overcome Satan in the same way. Hebrews iv. 12 describes the Word of God as being sharper than any two edged sword; it pierces right to the very heart. If we are equipped with this weapon, as young soldiers of Jesus Christ, we shall certainly use it with success.

Let us remember what we have learned about the Bible, and let us read and obey, that it may become increasingly precious to us as the years go by.

Before we part we will sing another children's hymn; and I shall be very pleased to hear how you have enjoyed this hour together. Perhaps you can write it at the same time that you send your answer to "The Bible Searcher," and address it to UNCLE TOM. F. T. W.

"BY LOVE SERVE ONE ANOTHER."

(Gal. v. 13.)

A NEW YEAR'S MESSAGE.

ONCE AGAIN A New Year's Message

Comes to greet us as we stand

On the borders of the New Year,

Still to us an unknown land.

This—"By love serve one another"

Is the message loud and clear,

Let us heed it, let us take it

As our rule throughout the year,

In the home, or school, or business,

Wherever we may be

Opportunities will meet us

For this loving ministry.

Someone wanting help or comfort,

Someone needing love or care,

Some who need what we can give them,

Loving deed, or word, or prayer.

Little things have wondrous power

Lives to brighten, hearts to cheer—

Let us try to bring the sunshine

Into other lives this year.

Writing letters to the lonely,

Sympathising with the sad,

Cheering those who seem discouraged,

And rejoicing with the glad.

Gladly going on our errand,

Just to save our weary feet—

Brightening lives oppressed and dreary

In all need that we can meet.

Taking thought for others' comfort,

Quickly seeing what they need,

Taking thought for others' feelings,

Lest we wound by word or deed.

Hearing patiently the story

Of another's pain or grief,

For the very telling often

Gives a burdened heart relief.

Warning faithfully the careless,

Who in danger seem to stand—

Stooping down to raise the fallen

With a strong and loving hand.

So in happy, willing service,

Pressing forward day by day,

Let us seek to help each other

All along the New Year's way.

Love to God and love to others,

Growing daily side by side,

As we take this New Year's message

For our motto and our guide.

MISSION SCHOOL, TANGIER.

MISS JENNIE JAY writes from Tangier, Morocco:—The Mission School is going on well. I have over thirty little Moorish maidens coming regularly—the first girls in Morocco ever taught to read. They are making rapid progress, and learning also a good deal of Scripture. I have also a large mother's meeting, but many of my Moorish friends died from the cholera. You will have heard what a sad summer and autumn we have had; the Moors suffered terribly, in many parts there was death in every family, and for weeks my whole time was given to nursing cholera patients. The school had to be closed, and has not long been reopened. The Spaniards and Jews also suffered, but very slightly compared to the Moors. We have been in quarantine ever since September, and it has ruined all trade, and kept hundreds out of work. I have never known anything like the poverty and distress there is now amongst the Moors; we try to help as far as we can, but I long for the power to do more.

FROM TWO LITTLE GIRLS.

I am much pleased that so many have answered last week's "Bible Searcher." It is nice to find the boys doing it too, because of course the Bible is just as much for them as for their sisters, and as you grow up you will find it so useful to know where to find well-known texts. But a friend of yours and mine has given you a little talk about the Bible, so I will not write more about it here.

King David and His Psalms.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, B.D., CHRISTIANA.

I.—INTRODUCTION.

NO part of the Old Testament is so thoroughly understood and appreciated as the Psalms. All those who suffer themselves to be guided by the Spirit of God may in them study and learn the pulsations and impulses of their own hearts, otherwise incomprehensible, and in them perceive their own perplexities, worries, and sorrows, the answering of their own prayers, and, most of all, their salvation.

But, on the other hand, there is no portion of God's Word that, in its entirety, is so little understood as the Psalms; for, as almost all these compositions have sprung from the realities of life, from circumstances which are also embodied in them, the greater part must often be obscure where the knowledge of the historical background is wanting. It is, mainly, the most impressive, the choicest passages to which personal experience must cling.* Now assuredly, this practical knowledge, by which the Spirit discloses the Word, and reveals the truth to the simple-minded Bible reader, is of great value and importance. It is marvellous how the believer, as if endowed with a holy instinct, and without the aid of the historical basis, makes the Word food for the soul, and grasps the main points without being able to master the supporting and enlightening details.

If this taste for God's good Word should be prevented by the advancement of the historical interpretation, or the mind thereby be diverted from the practical application of the Word, the historical basis might not only be dispensed with, but might, so far as the general reader is concerned, be eschewed, or, in any case, be regarded as immaterial. And it often happens that one does meet with a certain disregard or contempt for history. "It was mostly historical," is a common saying, and this corresponds to "It was not edifying." It is partly on such an assumption that even Spurgeon, in the seven volumes of his admirable, thoroughly practical, and edifying commentary on the Psalms, sometimes disregards the historical facts. When he, for instance, in respect to the twentieth Psalm, raises the question as to what war David was about to enter upon, he replies: "It would be folly to ask this, for Israel in David's time was almost continually at war."†

But the time has now surely come in which a great advance should be made in the edifying interpretation of God's Word on the whole, and not least of the Psalms, by giving due weight to historic matter. The historical view is kept much to the front in the theological discussions of these days. We see the purely historical side of the Word, as represented in the Evangelists and the life of Christ, employed by Mr. Moody, for instance, in all the power of its great simplicity, and that with an instructive force hitherto undreamed of.

In no part, possibly, more than in the Psalms would a complete historical interpretation loose the words which bind the comprehension, and give a grand stimulus to further and deeper reading. "In thy light shall we see light," says David (Psalm xxxvi. 9). It is just this very light, shining out of the life and history of David, as recorded for us in the Bible in a double relation, which shall give us light, more light, in understanding the Psalms. Scripture shall explain Scripture. The words of history shall explain the words of prayer. The latter is but a radiation of the former, and both combined can alone give the full comprehension.

The question to be solved, then, is, first and foremost, this, viz., on the basis of David's life, to show the close connection between his career and his psalmody. The first part of the task is to spin the thread of David's life, out of its double portrayal in the two Books of Samuel, and the First Book of Chronicles, into one historical representation—that thread broken by his fall, but by his repentance and reformation made stronger than ever. The second part of the problem is to arrange the holy Psalms, those pearls of his life, in their proper order and relationship, so as to form a jewelled chain, sparkling in the full rays of Divine providence and grace directing David's actions.

I have been surprised to find that this task has not only not been effected, but that it does not appear ever to have been seriously attempted, or the solution of the problem even put forward as an imperative claim on theology. In expositions of the Psalms, attempts have certainly been made, in the case of each psalm, to refer to history, but not similarly starting from history, to encompass the entire collection of the Psalms, and thus embrace the whole in a girdle of history.

One principal reason for this arises, assuredly, from the idea having apparently gained credence that all the psalms ascribed to David by their headings, even if they for the greater part be regarded as David's, cannot be recognised as coming within, or finding an appropriate place within, the scope of David's life. But of late, matters in this respect have gone so far that David's authorship is denied, thus depriving the celebrated king of the crown of lyric poetry. It will, therefore, appear bold of me to come forward with the statement that my studies have led me precisely to this, seemingly, abandoned result; and provided it should appear that I really have succeeded, I must ascribe it, next to the gracious assistance of the Lord, to my having carried on the work in the full and firm assurance that such a goal would be attained.

Fourteen years ago I commenced to hold Biblical lectures on the Life of David and his Psalms, and some astonishing observations in respect to the proper and clear position of one or other obscure psalm, suddenly raised it above the misunderstanding of even positive criticism, and enabled me to see land. My position as teacher at a theological college in Christiania, for the training of clergy for the Norwegians in America, led me to take up the subject in its entirety.

One observation, that David, to a far greater extent than hitherto presumed, composed sets of companion psalms, threw a remarkable light upon several psalms that could not be attributed to his authorship, or, in any case, could not be assigned any definite place in his history. What was requisite here was to examine with one's own eye, this remarkably little-cultivated field, so that the sight, assisted by the glass of history, should be extended, seeking and inquiring until it found; confident that harmony existed, struggling onwards for the precious truth, begging and praying for the guidance of God's Spirit in finding out the way, and reaching that land which could be faintly discerned from the very first.* And lo, it did succeed! I dare not say it succeeded beyond

* I may besides, in respect to my work in this field, mention what an English surgeon, Dr. J. Mason Good, has stated in respect to David's Psalms: "I save every quarter of an hour for it, because my heart is in it."

expectation, as it was a presumption certain of being attained, but it was successful in accordance with that expectation. And not only did all those seventy-three psalms, headed by David's name, find their place, but also the seven psalms without headings, introduced in the first two collections of Davidic Psalms, were found to fill those gaps in the historical sequence which would, otherwise, have remained open, and a way was shown of proving the reasons for their having been left without a heading.

Everything became so gloriously clear that I dared not doubt that the expectation, the certain expectation that all was right, and in full accordance with the precious Book of Psalms, would be completely confirmed; and that it would, therefore, be proved that the double historical portrayal, and the Psalms themselves, dovetail and agree.

I thus find myself in the happy position of being able to bring forward, and that with confidence, the entire series of David's Psalms—his eighty Psalms—in their historical relationship, as the homogeneous work of the Spirit of God. I cherish the hope that in such a collected, arranged, and cohesive exposition there will be found a convincing and instructive power, and that an effort, such as this now mentioned, will be found to be opportune, and may reckon on meeting with sympathy, not only on the part of theologians and teachers, but also from the community at large. Of the indescribable interest and edification that I have enjoyed, the enchanting pleasure of study and research, and the strengthening of reliance in the absolute trustworthiness of God's Word, with which this work has filled my soul, I feel bound, so far as I am able, to make others participators.

What increased interest would not the wondrous life of David gain if it could be viewed by us as the factory of the Spirit, from which we saw his Psalms coming, as if freshly forth from the burning forge of Divine love! The special and justifiable demand of our times is for a representation that seems to create the object before our very eyes. One of the greatest questions of the Bible is here opened, namely, whether all is right in respect to the harmony between the historical books on David's life and the Psalms as being the finest flowers and fruit of his life. Next to the harmony in the writings of the Four Evangelists, there is, certainly, no more burning point in the Bible than this, for the reason, that the Psalms are the most read, most used, and most practically felt of any part of the Word of God. It is the Word that a child of God grasps at, first and foremost, when in necessity and tribulation. Therefore it is of great practical interest to see how the tide of history, when unhindered in its flow, raises psalm after psalm on its breast, and bears them on in the most perfect order, in the full sail of comprehension; and it is then seen that not one of them sails under false colours.

Many a psalm, read over and over again, with a feeling of greater or less obscurity, which proceeds from a want of knowledge of the historical background—an obscurity in which one must painfully acquiesce—will be found, and that in a remarkable manner, to be illuminated by the light of history, and thus be made capable of being easily and positively understood. The individual psalm will, in that case, not only shine in its own independent light, but also in virtue of the constellation in which it stands to the whole of the glittering host. One is then, neither thrown hopelessly into the clutches of critical objections, nor so easily infected by their spirit of suspicion and doubt; and, when faced by the denial of authenticity, one needs but to point to the gap in the development, which is obvious if one or other striking occurrence in the life of David lacks a lyric, or, in a parallel psalm, its twice-repeated echo.

* The German writer Funcke pertinently remarks in his Book of Devotions:—"It has been said of Count Zinzendorf that he has turned the Bible into a collection of a few comforting and admonishing words. We will not decide whether this reproach can rightly hit this pious man; but, in any case, it is true that most Christians only regard their Bible as a collection of some stray, comforting, admonishing, and encouraging statements. There are but few who thoroughly think over and thoroughly study the history of God's kingdom and that of his people in its entirety—few, indeed, who even review the history of Jesus and his Apostles in its entire development from beginning to end. This is a great injury, and it revenges itself with severity; for one only understands the single point as it ought to be understood, when one regards it in the relationship in which it stands to the rest. Thus it is now in respect to the Psalms. One grasps at certain comforting statements, of which there are truly a large supply. One glances over the rest, instead of rightly investigating the object and view of the author in the statements he makes. It is only by doing this, however, that the special points become lucid and clear, and a vast amount of that which appears to us to be exaggerated, perplexing, and strange gains a shrewd and deep meaning."

† I refer especially to Psalm xx., as, from what follows, it will be seen how important a part the historical hypothesis plays in the interpretation of this Psalm.

Mr. Luther D. Wishard.

IN VIEW of the report given in our columns to-day of the great international Missionary Conference of Christian Students, at Liverpool, it is fitting that our portrait should be that of one whom God has largely honoured in connection with the rise and growth of this students' movement. It is generally very difficult to apportion with exactness the place of any individual human instrument in the conception of such far-reaching movements. Their real origin is often hidden away from our view in the specially-inspired devotion of some obscure and humble saint, or little company of saints. Indeed all true beginnings are known alone to God, the great author of life, material or spiritual. It is well that it should be so, that no flesh may glory in his presence. While that is ever to be remembered, we must not forget that God works through instruments, in the development of his plans and purposes towards our race.

Such an instrument Mr. LUTHER D. WISHARD has been, in helping to bring about the rapid and marvellous growth of this uprising of the young Christian intellects of our generation, for the speedy scattering of Gospel light into the lands as yet in spiritual darkness. We have no information as to Mr. Wishard's birth and early up-bringing. But the first fact in his career that we can state will suffice to link on to what follows. While passing through his student course at Princeton University, in the State of New Jersey, he showed an unusual degree of Christian zeal and earnestness. There had been a revival of religion in connection with the university, and as one fruit of it Mr. Wishard was led to write to fellow students in other American colleges on matters relating to the religious life. In the providence of God that effort eventuated in the formation of branches of the Y.M.C.A. in those seats of learning. In due time Mr. Wishard was elected a travelling secretary of the Association, in connection with the universities and colleges of the United States. For some years he filled this office with much ability and success.

It was, we believe, at Mr. Wishard's suggestion that Mr. D. L. Moody invited a body of American students to spend a couple of weeks at Mount Hermon in July, 1896, for a season of Bible study and spiritual intercourse. That was the beginning of the Young Men's Summer School, which is now a settled and much-prized institution, year by year, at Mr. Moody's mountain home. Among the 240 students present at this school there was a little company of twenty or so whose minds had been specially turned towards the spiritual needs of heathen lands. The great outbreak of missionary interest which attended this young men's conference swelled the ranks of the mission band; before the conference closed quite a number of these student volunteers had become pledged to foreign life-service if God should open the way. As may be seen by a reference to the file of this journal for the months of August and September, 1886, Mr. Wishard took a leading part in directing the deliberations which led to these happy results. The missionary addresses of Dr. Pierson and Dr. Ashmore were largely helpful to the same end. Mr. R. G. Wilder, Mr. Mott, and others who have since come into prominence in the American students' movement were among those who caught the fire during those summer days of 1886.

This movement in America was almost exactly contemporaneous in its origin with the similar outbreak of missionary zeal in Edinburgh, through the visit of Mr. Stanley Smith and Mr. C. T. Studd, which has spread in Great Britain pari passu with the development of the students' revival on the other side of the Atlantic. Thus marvellously has God in his providence shown that in both hemispheres the thoughts of Christian young men have been widening "with the process of the suns," so as to embrace in their over-mastering desire the evangelisation of the whole world.

Some two years later, Mr. Wishard, accompanied by his wife, started on a round-the-world tour, at the instance of the American International Y.M.C.A. committee, with the purpose of carrying the student movement into Japan, China, India, as well as less known parts of Asia, and also the European continent, especially Scandinavia. This journey extended over three years, and was highly fruitful in its results. Seeds were sown throughout the great Asiatic continent that are to-day bearing much fruit, with the promise of still greater things to be made manifest in the near future. The growing work of the Y.M.C.A. in India is a very considerable factor in the one campaign, which has for its motto the young men of the world for Christ. Mr. Wishard was present at the Y.M.C.A. jubilee in London the year before last, and few speeches, if any, delivered at that memorable convocation, were more ably expressed, or showed a firmer grasp of the subject in hand, than his eloquent survey of the missionary work of the Association in foreign lands. The views he then uttered have since been expanded into a singularly valuable and stimulating booklet entitled, "The New Programme of Missions" (Allenson & Co. 1s.). Every Christian young man who has the ambition to render to his God and his fellow-men the highest service he can, during the brief span of life, should read its stirring pages.

Mr. Wishard is not now specially a representative of American college work. He fills the post of Foreign Missionary secretary of the American Y.M.C.A. He has in immediate prospect a visit to South Africa with the view of enlisting the students in such colleges as that at Wellington, in the great enterprise of evangelising the many unevangelised regions of the Dark Continent. At present he is in Greece on the same high mission; having recently visited Sweden and other parts of Northern Europe. Mrs. Wishard, who is his travelling and working companion, contributed to a late issue of the New York Independent a most interesting account of the Scandinavian Student Christian Conference held last August at Vadstena, a historical spot in Sweden. In that sketch she chronicles the formal inauguration of the World's Student Christian Federation, "the object of which is to unite the student Christian movements of the world and promote the evangelisation and Christian activity of the student world." This latest outcome of the great student movement was referred to with gratitude at the Liverpool conference last week, and it is evidently designed of God to be an important link in the great chain of events and organisations now operating in a Christian direction on the young intellectual life of the globe.

God's Grindstone.

[Extract from a letter written to one in deep sorrow.]

"I WONDER why I kept seeing last night a hatchet turned the wrong way to a grindstone.

I was half awake, and tried to see it turned the other way, for chips of steel were flying off it distressingly. I knew I was thinking about something, and it straightened out like this:—

The grindstone takes tiny pieces of steel away, so as to give the axe something else—something immaterial, impalpable, called a sharp edge.

The steel exists, in this case, only for the sake of this finer thing. It is there that it may have "an edge."

That it may have a better edge some of it must be refined away.

But if the hatchet holds an attitude of resistance to the sharpening power it loses a great deal more, and only becomes very much blunter.

Shall I go on? Last night I thought I had nothing to say, and this morning I fain would tell my dream and the interpretation thereof to the end.

Suppose the grindstone of affliction keeps on rubbing and rubbing away our natural vitality—the more, we think, for our very submission. Then we cry out in the fear that the grindstone will spoil the block—defeat its own ends.

Grant that it sometimes may take more away than is artistic. "He sitteth as a refiner of silver," and He knows what is enough for his purposes; but it is only fair to admit that things often go further than we can see any plan in.

Well, then, listen. That knife may be most useful as a knife whose blade is worn deep with continued sharpening; and the finest life in the world was apparently wasted when Jesus died for men.

"A Village in Need."—A correspondent draws attention to the lack of any place of worship, other than the parish church, at Milton, near Lymington, Hants. He pleads for the erection of "a plain, simple, strongly-built hall to seat about 150." Perhaps some of our readers living near that district may interest themselves in the scheme, if it is needed.

House of Rest.—The New Year's meeting at the House of Rest took the form of a praise meeting. The friends present, after a short address from Lieut.-Colonel Oldham, who presided, bore many happy testimonies to much blessing, both spiritual and temporal, received during the past year. The evening meeting was also conducted by Colonel Oldham.

The Evangelist.

The Runaway Husband.

AT THE CLOSE of one of Mr. Moody's meetings in a Scotch town of considerable size, a large number of anxious inquirers remained for conversation with the minister of the town and other Christian workers. As there were upwards of 100 of them present, Mr. Moody proposed that the ministers in turn should put the Gospel offer in the way they had found most serviceable to seeking souls. Thereupon followed a series of most interesting addresses, and, at the close of each, Mr. Moody asked those who through it had been led to embrace Christ to rise, and repeat after him the words from Isaiah, "I will trust and not be afraid, for the Lord God is my salvation."

One after another rose, sometimes a good many together; but after nearly all had been on their feet there was one man who kept his seat, and firmly faced the speakers. He was about forty years of age, tall and strong, with a face which expressed great force of character. He was a stranger to us all, but anyone could see that his had been a history in which reckless passion had played a prominent part. As Mr. Moody prayed for him, it was observed that his head was bowed down on the book-board before him, and that he was sobbing as if his heart would break. On being spoken to privately at the close of the meeting, he was led into the light, and then poured into the ear of his spiritual adviser the following story of a wasted life:—

"I was carefully brought up by Christian parents, and served an apprenticeship as an engineer. In the workshop, I became acquainted with those who scoffed at religion and spent all their spare money on drink. As I got more intimate with them my religious principles were gradually undermined, and, by the time I had a journeyman's pay, I could swear and swagger like themselves. My marriage with a good girl led me to give up these associates, and for some years I went regularly with her to church, and had pleasure in hearing my children repeat their simple prayers at my knee. By-and-by, however, the old drinking habits gained upon me, until I made my home so miserable that my wife, with the children, had to take refuge with her parents. After that, I went to America, where I led a wild life. I never wrote home, and when conscience would sting me for my heartless conduct, I got rid of its upbraidings in a fresh debauch. Several years were passed by me in this way, when all at once, I could not tell why, memories of the past came crowding in upon me, and I determined to return to this country. To-day I reached this, my native town, and as I could not summon up courage to call upon my wife, I came to this meeting, as I had heard much of the good work done by Mr. Moody in Chicago, where I was employed for some time. The word spoken by the evangelist to-night touched my heart, and though pride wrestled hard with me to keep me from this inquiry-room, yet something told me that here I would learn what would help me to a brighter and a better life. In this I have not been mistaken, for now with Christ in my heart, the hope of glory, I am anxious to be reconciled to my wife, that I may assure her that she may safely entrust herself and the children to my keeping."

Next day he was introduced to her, and not long afterwards the two once more set up house together. The reconciliation between them was thorough, for they had now in common a living interest in Divine things. His was a genuine conversion, which has been tested by years, in which he has taken an active part in aggressive Christian work, and been instrumental in leading many to give up their drinking habits, from which he had nearly been ruined himself.

The power and love of God are boundless. What He wrought in that man's life He can do for any other who, seeking forgiveness of sin through the atoning work of Christ, will come and yield himself unreservedly to Him.

London Poverty.

The Deserving Industrious Poor.

CONSIDERABLE INTEREST has been manifested in the series of glimpses I have been giving, in recent numbers, of how the poor live. Requests have reached me from many quarters for further information as to the causes of the destitution described. Several correspondents have raised the question of drink. One, for example, writes, "You have made slight reference to intemperance. Is it not the chief cause of this deplorable misery?" Undoubtedly it is; but little needed to be said on this point in my articles, because the main purpose I had in view was to deal with the deserving poor, whose distress arises from

MISFORTUNE RATHER THAN MISDOING, and who may be regarded as having the first claim on Christian sympathy. No mission would be justified in dispensing its funds generally to those who might only waste them in drink. Every effort is used to reclaim men and women who are enslaved by intemperance, but care is taken not to put temptation in their way. It does not, however, follow that the innocent children of drunken parents are left to starve. These have in free meals and similar relief-measures which lighten their sorrow without aggravating the primary cause. This being so, the evils of intemperance—obvious enough in every poor district—did not require exposition in these papers.

Nor, again, am I dealing, at present, with the homeless "dossers," or the unhappy inmates of common lodging-houses, but rather with the pitiful thousands who have still a roof over their head, and whose despairing effort is to keep one little room, which—however noisome and squalid—they call "home."

Amid a bewildering variety of circumstances these may be grouped into four classes. First there are

THE UNEMPLOYED.

There are plenty of loafers who would not work if they could, who have never been guilty of doing a day's hard work in their lives; but there are also hosts of honest, industrious men—not usually the most skilled—who cannot find work. These, in many cases, spend the day tramping all over London in search of work, leaving the poor wife to hush the hungry little ones as best she can. It is pitiful to see them come in at night

WHITE, FAINT, AND HOPELESS.

Things in such case go from bad to worse, and unless the mother can earn a little somehow, the family are soon absolutely starving. In cases of this kind, relief which tides them over the pinch, and enables them to drag on till work is found, is well bestowed. All workers among the poor seek to aid such, so long as funds permit.

A second and very pitiful class are those who are

IMPOVERISHED BY ILLNESS.

When the bread-winner is laid up there are no resources to fall back upon. There ought to be, prudence exclaims; but the earnings are often so scanty that saving seems impossible. This suggests the question of "sweating" and "under payment," but on such wide themes one may not enter here. Even where there has been prudence and foresight the little board soon vanishes, and the children cry for bread.

Take one case in point. In a neat little house in Bethnal Green I found a couple with a young family. Well-doing and industrious, they went on nicely until the husband took ill with what proved to be creeping paralysis. He is now blind and helpless; but his brave young wife goes out every morning to a busy corner with a barrow and earns a little. The light of life has entered the man's soul during his affection, and spiritually it is a joy to sit by his bedside; but temporally the family is in a deplorable condition.

This sad story has its parallel in many, many homes—the father lies ill, the children are starving, the mother is doing what she can to keep the wolf from the door; but a weak woman with the care of the wee ones can earn so little, and the unhappy family suffers lack, while the helpless man is deprived of necessary nourishment, unless some kindly and timely aid reach them. Every Christian worker knows of many similar cases.

A third and very numerous class are

THE WIDOWS.

I have given several illustrative cases in preceding articles, and kindly aid has been called forth—but besides those mentioned there are many struggling hard and sore, thinly clad, in weak health, and pressed by care, to whom a little help is of untold value. Some have seen better days, while others have led a life of hardship. Few, but those closely familiar with the poor, know the sore sad struggle which many of these widows meet so bravely for the sake of their children.

Then, lastly, there are the aged poor. Everywhere in courts and alleys, mostly in tiny (and cheap) rooms, one comes upon who have fought the long battle, and can do so no more. Why do they not go into the work-house? They will not; they have, in most cases, an unconquerable aversion. They will starve and die rather than go in. How do they exist? Some old employer, some son or daughter, some poor friend, allows them a shilling or two, and they make it do. Few are their wants. Many live on sixpence a week. If they can pay the rent, and keep the little room, they are content. Many are bright, happy Christians, a joy to the Christian worker, who in a weary day finds true help in visiting their little chamber. Others are far from God, but in ministering to them opportunity is found to tell of Christ. Lately, in a tiny corner room, about 8ft. square, I found an aged woman, unable to leave her chair, and alone in the world. A lady at Highgate sends her 2s. a week, paying her rent, but the Bible woman found her foodless. A little tea was all she craved for. When first discovered she was as ignorant of salvation as a heathen, but the visitor who brought relief brought also the good tidings which, told again and again, won her heart. Now it is all peace, and she is waiting for the call. All workers know there are many such in out-of-the-way corners in the slums; and in aiding the poor they are careful not to forget the aged and the widow.

Apart altogether from the children—to which the Ragged School Union, through its local missions, devotes itself—these are the four grand phases of London poverty with which Christian workers are dealing. This week I have mentioned no special society, for all true missions are labouring to relieve such. Those who feel led to aid in lightening the load of care may send to any genuine mission, or to the care of the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN, who will see it goes into the hands of those who can be trusted to use it to the best account.

PEARL FISHER.

How to Build a Home.

By REV. ARTHUR LITTLE, D.D., NEW YORK.

"And when she was baptized and her household, she besought us saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house and abide there; and she constrained us" (Acts xvi. 15).

IT IS ONE THING to promise, another to perform; one thing to begin, another to continue; one thing to enter the race, another to touch the goal. In a single moment oftentimes words are spoken which it will require the utmost thought, patience, and assiduity of a lifetime to make good.

Marriage, like many other things, is more or less tentative and experimental. The assured outcome no one can possibly predict; it is a life, and all life is conditioned by environments. Well envired, it expands, and comes to beautiful fruition; badly envired, it dwarfs, withers, and dies. Young married people ought to make careful study of the environment. Everything depends on it. "What?" "Where?" "How?" should be the questions asked. Directly from the marriage-altar to the home ought the shining path to lead, along which the bridegroom and bride find their gladsome way. This is the land of Beulah for wedded hearts.

Marriage implies a home, and cannot well subsist without one. Between the assumption of the solemn vows wherein the troth is plighted, and the safe sheltering of the young hearts in this sacred retreat, not too much time should be permitted to elapse. Let the wedding tour be brief, the stay at hotels and boarding-houses be as short as possible. It ought to be the honourable aspiration of young hearts to build for themselves a home, sacred to them—their castle—whose key they shall hold, with power to loose and to bind, to admit and to exclude, to make and enforce needed regulations—a home which shall be the rallying-place of affection, the centre, nursery, training-school, and conservatory of all highest, purest, holiest love.

If there be any moment or occasion upon which the pure and spotless angels look down with solicitude and interest, it must be those when two young people, having left their own homes, fathers, and mothers, are about to inaugurate a new home, a new centre of joy or sorrow, of blessing or cursing, of weal or woe.

Memories of the old days are fresh and strong, visions of the new ones bright and hopeful. Hitherto life has been largely a theory, now it is to be a practice. Hitherto dependent, now independent. The young hearts are set to the task of learning by doing.

How shall they begin? What shall their ideal be? for they will build according to their ideal. What are the essentials of a home? What is the material to be wrought into the structure? Let us see. Note some things that are not necessary. A big house does not make a home; nor is it essential to one. It sometimes almost destroys one. It is said that the reason why young people are now so often disinclined to marry is because they cannot begin where their fathers are almost ready to end.

Said a daughter in an elegant New England home, "Why should I marry?" A great house, elegantly finished, furnished, provided with servants, and all else that wealth can bestow, is sometimes a prison-house whose victims are held in close confinement, or a sepulchre which incloses within its massive and splendid walls little else than buried hopes and affections.

The elegant mansions, just as often as any others, contain aching hearts, hearts that ache so hard; lives from which the light, the song, the joy, have somehow taken their flight. It has been the regretful testimony of more than one, upon exchanging the humble dwelling of earlier years for the costly mansion of later, affluent life, that in some unaccountable way, there has been lost a certain flavour, fragrance, sweetness, nameless peace and joy of the former home, in the transfer. The echo of marble halls sounds so empty and full of mockery. The oriental tapestry of richest hue somehow wearies the eye that looks upon it. The very servants seem to have a certain freedom, lightness of heart, that makes them objects of envy.

Somehow happiness—that shy nymph—has not entered the palatial dwelling. It is a mistake to suppose that a great house makes a home. It may unmake it. Behind those brown stone fronts, amid the splendours of the glittering chandeliers, there may be fitting, as unwelcome guests, the ghastly shadows of hopes and loves and devotions that have died as the morning dies, as the early dew disappears; and there is no enchantment, no diviner's spell, by which they can be summoned back. An establishment is not a home.

Nor are high social standing and a large society following needful for the building of a happy home. To aspire to this, is to pave the way almost certainly to chagrin, if not defeat. It is one of the blessings of home that it shelters its inmates from those wasting exactions, if they so desire. In this respect, a home may be ordered according to one's tastes, means, and surroundings. One is not to be unneighbourly, nor yet is one to be obtrusively aspiring. In so far as this country has been saved and developed, the potential factor has been quiet, restful homes, outside the exhausting and depleting social centres, which, like furnaces at white heat, consume so rapidly the life.

Nor does that competency which comes as the result of industry and frugality, though desirable, necessarily make a home. The conception many seem to have of a home is that it is simply a place to live in, to be sheltered from storms, and kept from hunger, and weariness, a place to sleep and eat in. What a travesty this upon the very name! Home is a word of far holier import than this. It is a heart word. It cannot be separated from the character of its inmates.

In building a home, the first thing is an agreeing purpose. Home begins in a steadfast, mutual resolve, a determination to inaugurate a new centre of influence and power, which shall, at least, perpetuate the blessedness of the remembered homes which have been left behind. And there is a little dash of heroism in this purpose of loving hearts, who have little other capital than good character and perseverance, to build a home, beginning small, with everything to earn and save, and frugally expend, studying to make the most of the limited resources, supplying with good taste, skill, ingenuity, the lack of means. This, young people, is the thing to do. These are so often the halcyon days, the years which memory delights to recall and dwell upon.

It is admirable to see those who have neither wealth, nor reputation, nor high family connection, nor any of the greatly assisting advantages, attain unto these things by a slow, quiet, patient, loving struggle with adversity. The path to success is not along the way of least resistance.

When the wind is blowing fair,
Any ship to port may steer;
Prows that head seas bravely dare
Master fate and conquer fear,
Sails that, freed from prison bars,
Struck the blows themselves that won,
Grappling with their evil stars,
Stand, like Uriel, in the sun.

There is something almost painful in the other picture of a young couple who have everything that wealth and family can bestow, ushered suddenly, with mirth and laughter, song and roses, every wish anticipated, into a palatial mansion, everything ready to hand, completed, done; and they there left to wonder, admire, occupy, entertain, adorn, but with little incentive to do or to be.

God never meant perfection to be attained without struggle. Exhilaration, joy, satisfaction, come with the feeling that we are gradually rising, until at last our feet shall touch the golden pavement, and our eyes look upon the splendour of the sapphire walls.

Light, literal light. Build towards the south. Let God's pure sunlight in from every side. If flowers and plants must needs have a southern exposure, how much more the soul. This is an emblem of the light of love. The essence of home is in the hearts which there abide. Loving hearts make beautiful the lowliest home. "Love in a cottage" is not mere sentiment or poetry. It is the presiding genius of the household. Pictures you may have, and works of art, bric-a-brac, and song, flowers and birds, thoughtful friends and generous kindred, beautiful frescoes above your heads, and richest tapestry beneath your feet; but if love be wanting, it is all vinegar upon nitre, a song of mirth to a breaking heart. Love, grounded in principle, and nurtured by real worth, lightens all burdens, scatters all darkness, holds back the harsh words, checks hasty judgments, prevents misinterpretations, suffers no disguises or deceptions, bears, hopes, believes all things, gives patience in sickness, courage in disappointment, draws into closer affinity, unites ever more strongly, transfigures and beautifies even the humblest home. Love will abate no whit of the thoughtfulness, consideration, and affection exhibited before marriage.

A mistake is often made in not more frequently showing affection—declaring it. The failure is often misinterpreted. Love, unuttered, is apt to die. Silence breaks many a heart. Let eye meet eye, let hand clasp hand, let heart answer to heart in vocal utterance.

Since it is not the house, but those who dwell in it that make the home, it should be the purpose of those who wish a happy home, to be in it as much as possible. So much absence from home is one of the infelicities, if not absolute perils, of modern home life. With some the home is closed a considerable part of the year, while the inmates seek recreation or health elsewhere. The facilities for travel, and the exigencies of business, as now conducted, take active business men much away from the cities where they live.

Then the still more pressing exigencies of daily attention to business hold men away from their homes through the hours of the day, and sometimes evening. Add to this the various meetings, religious, political, literary, social, educational, and there is little time with many for the quiet enjoyment of home life. Husband and wife, parents and children, hardly know each other.

The multiplication of clubs, too, is a source of peril to the home, furnishing an attractive place for men, destitute of the domestic habit, to spend their evenings. The restless, migratory spirit of our people militates against the building of homes.

One element of a good home is permanence. It seems to me, if I were not a public servant, dependent upon the will of others, I should desire to plan for a life-long abode in a chosen locality. In this way, it seems to me, the home becomes a power. It relates itself to other homes, to society, and stands for very much. The instinct for localization is gratified, and associations, tender and precious multiply around the spot. It becomes, at length, a little Zion or Bethel, toward which the heart turns like that of the exile Jew towards Jerusalem.

But one more thing, transcending in importance all others, must be built into any best home. The places where food for the body is prepared and eaten are not likely to be forgotten; the drawing-room, parlour, library, nursery, conservatory, sleeping apartments, are sure to be remembered; all that ministers to the wants of this earthly life will have its appropriate place; this is right. But "man shall not live by bread alone." In building the home, there is one room that must be by all means provided for—the oratory—the place for prayer, the room with its windows open towards Jerusalem, containing an inner sanctuary, a holy of holies, where secret prayer may find utterance. In other words, the youthful couple ought to go immediately from the bridal altar to the home or family altar. Not a day should intervene. Begin the married life with the reading of the Word and prayer. It will be at the mercy-seat that hearts will grow like-minded and sympathetic. Bring to this consecrated spot, hallowed above all else in the home, every joy, every sorrow, every doubt, every fear. Here sing and praise and pray.

I tremble for the peace, stability, and blessedness of any home, however much it may seem to have, if it omit the family altar. This is the source, centre, secret of happiness and power. Lydia and her household were baptized, and then she invited the Apostles in.

Not all along the way in which the groom and bride must walk, will roses be strewn. Sharp sorrows will come—disappointments, defeats—and then the throne of grace is the only refuge. Have it ready, be familiar with its approaches, and with Him who waits to hear. Begin at once to pray with hour set apart. Then guests who come will know the ordering of your home, and accept it gratefully. Let the atmosphere of the home be thoroughly, pervasively Christian from the start. Homes thus begun, thus continued, would end in happy marriages, transform the church, and evangelise the world.

Carrubbers Close Mission.

THE work of the Carrubbers Close Mission in Edinburgh goes on with increasing vigour. At this New Year season the special meetings as well as the ordinary meetings have been marked by tokens of much blessing. There are in connection with the mission upwards of 100 meetings each week, and in the various sections some 600 voluntary workers.

Among the sections that make a special effort to reach the lapsed and lapsing, and to provide counter-attractions to the public house, the Gospel Temperance Association takes a leading place. During the past year its ordinary Saturday night meetings have almost every night attracted audiences that crowded the large hall.

The Hogmanay Re-union and Watchnight Service, the last night of the old year, lasting from 8 p.m. till after the advent of the new year, was a meeting of great interest. Almost all Evangelical churches co-operated. Mr. T. R. Marshall presided, and evoked warm applause as he spoke with love of the American people and deprecated even the mention of strife. Mr. G. A. Barclay reported that the progress during the year had been of a gratifying character. Inspiring addresses by Revs. Rowland Ellis, Professor Orr, J. T. Forbes, Jas. Robertson, A. R. Henderson, Robt. Craig, Mr. Jas. Guthrie, and Ex-Bailie Lewis followed—the whole being interspersed with effective sacred selections by the choir and orchestra of the mission.

The New Year was ushered in with silent prayer, and the first item of the year in a hall built through the efforts of Mr. D. L. Moody was the sending to him of a telegram conveying through him to the Christians of America the love of their fellow British Christians; and seeking that both should unite in fervent prayer to prevent strife between the two nations, who more than any others are interested in the evangelisation of the world.

As a counter-attraction to the public-house, on Jan. 2 a great meeting was held in the Synod Hall. Beautiful sacred musical selections were rendered, and Dr. D. A. Moxey gave readings, with lime-light illustrations. Rev. Dr. J. H. Wilson, Moderator of the F.C. Assembly, presided, and appealed for decision for God. A largely-attended meeting of the general workers of the Mission was held in the Mission Hall on Jan. 1, Mr. Wm. Robertson presiding, and when some remarkable testimonies were given of God's power to save. All the public-houses in Edinburgh were, by the recommendation of the magistrates, closed on New Year's Day with the most gratifying results. Many other efforts in Edinburgh were made for special classes. A tea-meeting for the showmen was held in Darling's Hotel, and there were other meetings in halls and churches.

"When Jesus Tells Her."

By MRS. HARVEY-JELLIE.

"THAT is the house, up there on the hill, and as I see it again after twenty years it seems as yesterday. Oh, Holland, the place where such a consecrated soul lives is next door to heaven; the influence of one good life is beyond all reckoning." Thus spoke Captain Verle to his friend, who was asking about his work abroad.

"I wondered at your wish to come so far out here, Verle, but I want to hear what led to your marvellous work."

"It started there, where lived one called Florence Trubel. The house is empty I see now, and she has gone from her pain and weakness to her reward. Her brother was a retired officer, and, visiting him, I met his sister. She could not walk a step, yet she walked with God in realms of peaceful intercourse. Her body suffered constantly, but her soul was in full health truly, and that house was filled with the odour of her saintly life."

The two men walked to and fro near the gates as they talked. Major Holland and he had been friends from early days, and although taking no decided stand as a Christian, he admired the zeal and heroism of his companion.

"It was in that room overlooking the garden where I first saw her reclining on her couch. I spoke of her weary state, and wished better days for her. She gave me a reproving look as she said, 'Captain, I may hear my Master say "She hath done what she could," and you can expect no greater commendation.' 'I fear I am not aiming at so great an honour,' I said. 'You are prompt to do your duty to your sovereign,' she replied. 'Will you not be loyal to the King of kings, and carry his message where you go?' She looked so earnestly at me, and her suffering, pleading face touched my very heart to respond with a promise. 'My brother thinks you will grant me my request,' she added, 'and I want you to invite some of your fellow officers to gather here. God will show us what is his will, but I am under a conviction I must ask this.'

"Who could refuse? I could not; and four, including her brother, were there the next evening. Verily the hand of the Lord was upon us, a solemn expectancy seemed to hold us waiting as we sat there. One spoke to Florence of our wonder that she could forget her pain enough to think of asking us to meet thus. Her heavenly countenance shone as she answered, 'Let us all forget we have any self, and lose ourselves in Christ, who is our all, and in all. I lie here to suffer and to pray, but I hear the cry of souls; and it seems they say everywhere, We would see Jesus. You are strong and able to go and speak of his love. My part is to tell you this, yours is to go and work.'

"We listened, and I tell you, Holland, it was as if a voice from heaven spoke to us, and every man of us was spell-bound as she pleaded with persuasive earnestness. At last I ventured to say, 'This is a great responsibility. How can we carry it out, or bring to pass what you wish?' 'Go,' she said, 'baptized with the Spirit of God. "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass."' At her request we knelt, and then it was I felt the power of prayer, and knew that earth and heaven could meet."

"But, Verle, such rapturous experiences must unfit one for the roughness of daily life. Can they be harmonised?"

"Ah, Holland, my friend, it is the squaring of things that becomes the Christian's duty. What had appeared right to me after that looked out of proportion, and I measured by the line of eternity, for I had seen the Cross and felt its power. We had many times in that room, and on the last evening it was soul-stirring. Each one stood beside that woman and dedicated himself to the great Redeemer. Her sufferings were intense; she was very prostrate. But as we left her, she said, 'God be praised for this. You will gather in the sheaves for the living harvest; and tell me when we meet beyond the shadows.'

"She was near the city where pain is forgotten, and I was to go to a city where sin reigned; but I felt 'strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.' Need I tell you of how souls out there were led to the Saviour? It followed as day on night, for the sunlight of God's everlasting love dispels the darkness and brings in the dawn of saving grace. If Florence Trubel could know the fruit that has sprung from the seed sown by her inspiring influence, she would rejoice. What a story it will make at last, when Jesus tells her, and sowers and reapers together join a song of praise."

They parted for the night, but the story of her influence has not finished, for Major Holland has to supply a beautiful chapter yet, as he came under its power and knew it was the Christ who called him.

Next day they met to say good-bye, one to resume his service in a distant land, the other to witness for the same Master at home.

One day, the one who could not go or speak beyond the limits of her room shall, it may be, exclaim in wonder: "Then shall the righteous answer Him, saying, Lord, when saw I thee an hungred, and fed Thee? or thirsty, and gave Thee drink?" (Matt. xxv. 37), and her joy shall be full when Jesus tells her.

Oh, then what rich reward and sweet,
To lay the harvest at his feet.

Chinese Colportage.

THE Book-Lending and Evangelistic Society of Canton Province, China, is a union organisation, started in 1890 by several faithful native Christian preachers. The object was to give the Gospel to the literary class in Southern China. We had noticed from time to time that this class were ashamed to come to our preaching chapels and listen to the story of the crucified Christ. This was partly because they regarded it as the doctrine of outside barbarians, and partly because our preachers were not as literary as they were. But the deepest reason was because they are ignorant of the power and beauty of the Gospel, and never had a chance to reach Christian literature. Yet if we could once get hold of this class the great mass of the people would be comparatively easily reached.

There are now six colporteurs at work in different districts around Canton. These carry books to the village schools, and ask the teachers to borrow them free of charge, or, if they are willing, to buy them. There are now about £300 worth of books in use. These books are furnished by the different Bible and Tract Societies, while the native Christians furnish the men, and manage the whole work. Already about twenty most hopeful converts have joined with the different churches in China.

Two years ago one of the High School teachers in Yan Tuck, who borrowed books from one of our colporteurs, was converted and joined the Wesleyan church last winter. This was accomplished directly through the reading of our books. He afterwards gave one of his houses for worship, and was the means of leading eight of his friends and pupils to join with the same church. There are still in the same place several other inquirers.

The work is going on well, and native subscriptions for its support increasing every year. Each member of the society in China is required to give one "cash" a day al the year round. Chinese members in California give ten cents a month. Chinese Presbyterians are among the most liberal givers. We want to get more men for this great work, and to place one as soon as we can in each of the eighty districts of Canton Province. To reach this important end we need more money. The whole cost of the support of a colporteur for a year is £9. I am agent of the society in this country (United States) and will be glad of any gifts of this object.

The Week of Prayer, 1896.

DURING the past week united meetings for special and definite prayer have been held in all lands, and thus God's children associated with various denominations have been brought together on a common platform of faith and love. Rich as this week of united prayer, at the dawn of the New Year, has proved in the past, the present public anxieties have contributed an intensified interest to these gatherings. The hearts of many are full of grave thought, and they are thankful for such opportunities of calling upon God in fellowship with brethren in the Lord with whom they seldom otherwise meet.

Amongst the numerous London gatherings, the West-end meetings, being held this year in St. Martin's Town Hall, Trafalgar-square, come first. On Monday morning the hall was well filled. The chairman, Mr. Donald Matheson, read the subject for the day:—

Praise and thanksgiving: For all temporal and spiritual mercies in the past year; to individuals and families, as known only to themselves; to nations, in the very general prevalence of peace and the close of the great Eastern struggle; to the Church of Christ, in the continued spread of the Gospel. Humiliation and confession of sins: Of omission and commission; of heart-sins. Prayer for forgiveness and for growth in grace and in the experimental knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

In opening he called attention to the present critical state of affairs, to the spirit of unrest characterising the nations, and to the need for united waiting on God that He would still the passions of men, and give peace in our time. Amongst those who followed in prayer were Bishop Taylor, Mr. Bruce, late of Persia, Lord Radstock, and Rev. R. Cavalier. Attention was called to the following request issued by the Alliance:—

"In view of the strained relations between our country and the United States at the present time, the council of the British Evangelical Alliance have agreed with the Evangelical Alliance of the United States, to urge Christians in both countries, during the Week of Prayer, and especially on Wednesday, Jan. 8, to make fervent supplication to God, that peace may be preserved, that Christ-like counsels may prevail, and that all difficulties may be removed. While this subject is most appropriate for Wednesday, it is earnestly hoped that at all meetings throughout the week, this matter may be specially remembered, and that Christians who are unable to take part in any meetings may remember the subject in their private and family devotions."

The following is a copy of the telegram sent from the council in London to the United States Alliance:—

"Urge Christians throughout States to join British Christians in fervent prayer: next week, specially Wednesday, that Christ-like counsels may prevail in present crisis."

The reply received by cable is as follows:—

"Alliance joins Wednesday prayers."

Canon McCormick dwelt briefly on the thought that "It is a good thing to give thanks," remarking that one of the best ways to get blessing is to be thankful for what has been received. Our Lord has emphatically the "Man of sorrows," yet again and again He gave thanks, while, as we read in 1 Chron. xvi. 7 (see margin R.V.), "David made it his chief work to give thanks unto the Lord." It is indeed a good and profitable thing to give thanks. Amongst many illustrations of this profitableness we find Paul's declaration "I give thanks" (1 Tim. i. 12.). What for? That he was at into this ministry, although he was beforetime blasphemer and persecutor. This leads to a recital of God's grace and a grand declaration of his whole-souled devotion to the service of God. It well then for the individual and the family to earn the value of praise; but still more is it for the Church—the praiseful Church is the victorious Church. Undoubtedly there are many difficulties, dangers, and anxieties at the present moment; but let us praise God for what He has done, and resting assured He will cause the very wrath of man to praise Him, and out of seeming ill bring good.

At the Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate-street, E.C., meetings are being held under the auspices of the committee of the Central Y.M.C.A. from one to two o'clock daily. On Monday the attendance was small. The chair was occupied by Mr. H. M. Matheson, who read 1 Peter i. 3-9, and in a short address exhorted to earnest prayer and thanksgiving. Rev. Henry Norwell, of Islington, followed with some helpful words on Psalm cvii. 1: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." He enforced the truth that our lives are made up of mercies received at the hands of God. We do well to pray with Elisha, "Lord open our eyes," in order that we may recognise the mercies which are so bountifully showered upon us. Alike in his providential dealings with us and in the forgiveness of our sins, God is good to us. Several friends engaged in prayer, thanksgiving and humiliation being the burden of their utterances.

The subject on Tuesday was the Church Universal.

Prayer for the whole Church of Christ, that she may be evermore rooted and grounded in Him, and thus attain more fully to a perfect unity of faith and knowledge through the indwelling power of his Spirit, and thus be separate from the world which lieth in the Wicked One; that the rationalism and superstition now so prevalent may be arrested, and the Church be prepared to welcome her returning Lord.

Mr. Edward Rawlings, who presided, read Eph. iii. 14-19, and Gal. v. 22. Prayer followed by Dr. Gritton and Pastor du Pontet-de La Harpe.

Pastor THOMAS SPURGEON, in the course of a plain and practical address on separation from the world, as the secret of the Church's power in witnessing for Christ, insisted on the imperative necessity of having a clear, broad, prominent line of demarcation between the Church and the world. Is it not a fact that there is often a great difficulty in knowing which is which? The Church becomes worldly, and instead of winning men to Christ she repels them. Full often men of the world will say, "If these be Christians, we are better as we are." Thus the most deadly enemies are not always found outside, but, alas! often within. It is not too much to say that worldliness is at the root of half the difficulties and dangers of the day; and worldliness is but another name for weakness.

What is the remedy? "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." He had small respect for those who seek to effect an alliance with the world; and he had observed that the world had the least possible respect for such. Men who are thorough in their sin despise those who seek to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. As for any notion that by such double-dealing we may gain an influence for good, it is pure absurdity. Any influence exerted is for evil and not for good. If we would have power with men for God, we must live as those who while in the world are not of it, those who hate sin while loving the sinner; those who by God's grace "keep themselves unspotted from the world." Oh, that we might see the rising of a great tidal wave of desire after God, of whole-hearted surrender to Him and his service; then would the Church of God be seen "clear as the sun, fair as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners."

The Destitute Armenians.—The Duke of Westminster has received the following communication from Sir P. Currie, the British Ambassador at Constantinople:—"Her Majesty's Consul at Aleppo reports to me that there is urgent need of money for the relief of the destitute in his district, especially at Marash. He states that grain can be purchased if money is forthcoming, and that warm clothing is imperatively needed. He adds that the suffering is already great, and will become appalling as the winter advances."

New Year's Prayer Meeting.

ACCORDING to custom for many past years a united missionary prayer meeting was held on New Year's Day in the Library of the Baptist Mission House, Furnival-street, E.C. Amongst those who were present and took part were Rev. H. E. Fox (C.M.S.), Mr. A. H. Baynes, and other officials of the Baptist Missionary Society, Rev. G. Cousins (L.M.S.), Revs. H. Anderson, of Calcutta, and J. H. Weeks, of the Upper Congo. After a season of prayer for foreign missions an address was given by the chairman—

Rev. W. J. HENDERSON, who said that at this season nothing could be more natural than that Christians at home should ask questions concerning the labours of our missionaries, who have been inspired by the great Missionary. Are they sustained in their faith and hope, their love and fervour? Are they blessed in turning many to righteousness? Are they fountains in desert places, lights shining in a dark night? And are disciples at home sympathising with the brethren far away—exercising generosity, and searching out for God-equipped men and women who may reinforce the little band who are fighting the Lord's battle against countless hosts, entrenched within evil customs and doctrines which long centuries have been digging. We have now entered upon another New Year. May God give renewed thankfulness, determination, and all other gifts required by the great missionary enterprise, the most daring enterprise that has ever occupied the human mind. All the best blessings have in them an impulse to make others share them. There is nothing that tests our faith so much as this missionary enterprise. We need to be a very thorough Christian, both in creed and feeling, in order to care much for this. We need to be mindful of the greatness of Jesus Christ. Jesus must so win our reverent, ardent love that there can be no contentment while his authority is unknown anywhere in the whole world? And how can we be wishful for men to see God if we ourselves are blind? or how can we seek to publish the Gospel if it be of little significance to ourselves? But it is within Christ's power to answer my questions, to give me power over temptation; and so the missionary enterprise must always be rooted in a noble Christology, and a noble Christian experience. Examine yourselves, brethren, and your resources; survey your tasks, and learn that, as you yourselves cannot be Christians without God's grace, and neither can you make others Christians except by his Spirit; therefore, you must "pray"—and pray earnestly. Further, if you would promote the unity of the various Christian churches, the most effectual method is the engaging in a common task great enough to find scope for thought and feeling, and all the various gifts which God's Spirit bestows.

Quiet Days.

Ex. xxxiii. 18-23.

"THERE is a place by Me"—a place of hiding, Where sin-toss'd souls may find a haven-rest; Where hearts that mourn, may, in God's love confiding,

Be comforted and blest.

"There is a place by Me"—O Rock of Ages, Beneath the shelter of thy shadowing height, We learn to read e'en life's dark, tear-stained pages, As by a rainbow light.

"There is a place by Me"—a place most holy, Within the veil, a Mercy-seat of gold, Sprinkled with blood, where those "surrendered wholly" Visions of God behold.

"There is a place by Me"—there God revealeth Love's hidden treasures of redeeming grace, And glory deepens, till the whisper stealeth, Come thou and see his face.

O God, if here on earth such peace is given, Such joy in Thee, such radiance from above, What must the fulness be, the bliss of heaven, The sunlight of thy love!

Now thro' the night, while storms around are sweeping,

Safe in the Rock, by Thee, we calm abide, Trusting thy will, our hearts thy peace is keeping, In Jesus satisfied.

Aggressive Work.—18.

DURING a sojourn at a fashionable watering-place lately, my experiences in the Lord's work were, as usual, of a varied character. In a month's time I had the privilege of speaking individually to about 1000 people, chiefly of the better-to-do class.

They are more difficult to approach, and consequently are less dealt with than the poor. I do not know that I ever met with more resistance—of course universal approval cannot be expected in aggressive Christian work,—taking men as you may happen to meet them; but much more sympathy is met with amongst the poor, and decidedly more converted people. It is still true that “to the poor the Gospel is preached.”

I have not found it desirable to change my old methods of thirty years' standing, so that, as a rule, I continue to offer politely one of the booklets I have written, and to ask whether I may be allowed to present it.

The individual may be walking or lounging about, or two or three together may be approached. Usually the paper is accepted with thanks, and then comes the opportunity for asking some such question as “Do you love the Saviour, sir? Is your soul saved?” or “Have you an interest in these Gospel truths?” Many accept the booklet, and pass on, a few give a sharp answer, while others, again, stop and converse with apparent good results. But altogether the work is most interesting and encouraging.

When offence is taken it is not at the worker nor the manner in which the work is done, but at the question itself. I don't, therefore, consider the question is a mistake, for I feel that the power of the work, humanly speaking, is in it. Most people will take your paper and likely never read it, but the primary object is the personal question, and everything must be endured to effect this. Some men, both lay and clerical, get very angry at it, which usually is the sign of a weak place having been touched, and consequently good done. In fact, I begin to feel that there may possibly be a relation between resistance and blessing. The greater the resistance the more likelihood of blessing. There is much satisfaction in putting the question, as many are unmistakably got at who are outside all Christian agencies, and intentionally evade them. Besides, something has been done for the Lord, and results are in his hands.

Since returning home from this watering-place I have received a letter from a young man there to whom I had spoken, saying that he will ever be grateful for having met me and for the question I had asked him as to his soul's salvation, for it had been made a great blessing to him. He felt he now had an interest in the Saviour, and that the Lord had taken him under his charge, causing him to cling closely to the Master.

Whilst walking in the outskirts I met a policeman, and after handing him a tract had a very interesting conversation with him. He said he feared he was a backslider, for he once knew the love of God and experienced joy and peace in believing, but the world had drawn him away. He remarked how strange it was that we should have met, for he had just lately been married, and had a presentiment in the morning that something unusual would happen during the day, and now he believed it was our meeting. He was much affected, and promised, with the Lord's help, to commence at once the Christian life again.

D. M. DRYSDALE.

Tract Distribution is going forward in Berlin. At the instigation of Count Douglas, who has himself given 50,000 marks for the purpose, an association has been formed to send religious booklets to persons who have lost near relatives. In connection with the Berlin City Mission, 110,000 sermons are distributed every Sunday. The German Evangelical Book and Tract Society issues weekly sermons for soldiers, written by a soldier in active service.

Light in Darkest England.

THE REPORT of the social operations of the Salvation Army during the past year is a sad commentary on the state of things existing under the ægis of our modern civilisation. Its opening pages are devoted to a description (plain-spoken, but not exaggerated) of the appalling condition of the homeless—“a constant menace to the health of the community.” To meet this state of things the S.A. Shelters exist, and it is claimed that “to the extent of our opportunity the shelters do meet these great wants, and that to thousands of lone and suffering wanderers they have been as doorways of hope to a better and happier life.” Twenty-two such Shelters are open, with accommodation for 5250. As may be expected, recent criticisms on these Shelters are vigorously and fully replied to.

The workless form the theme of several chapters, and it is stated that “Fourteen hundred men and women are now employed daily in connection with the scheme. These are all of the workless class we are seeking to benefit. They are drawn from every station of social life, and among them are generally to be found the representatives of every trade. In addition to a considerable proportion of unskilled labourers, there are men who have been doctors, lawyers, ministers of the Gospel, merchants, shopkeepers, collectors, accountants, clerks, skilled mechanics, and artisans generally. Numbers of them seem to have been the victims of misfortune, while others are, of course, in their present want owing to their own folly. The histories of those fourteen hundred! What an accumulation of anguish, of privation, of hope deferred, of misery it would represent. No one who visits these industrial factories or Elevators can fail to mark the deep furrows left by hardship and misery on the faces of a large proportion of the colonists.”

The details given of the Elevators and the farm colony show a large amount of work done in the rescue of men who had fallen into the lowest condition.

The slum-work is graphically sketched. “The slum sisters generally occupy one of the tenement rooms either in or immediately on the outskirts of the slum centre, and so far as possible they conform to the habits of the population amongst whom they work. Every slum post is in reality a ‘settlement.’ It is the sisters' duty to work as both spiritual and temporal advisers, holding small meetings in the streets and cottages, visiting the sick and dying, caring for those who, as the result of bouts of drunkenness or quarrelling, are temporarily disabled, and are largely left alone in their misery. The dying and the little children are their especial care. It is indeed a work of mercy.” A touching tribute is naturally paid to Mrs. Cooke, who has just passed away, and who was the devoted leader in this slum work. Amongst other classes touched by this Social Scheme are the shiftless, the criminal, and lost women. The work among the women has been so admirably described in “Quenched,” a pamphlet we have already noticed, that we need not tarry upon it now. Some account is also given of social operations carried on by the Army in other lands. The whole concludes with “Notes on Finance.”

“The total cost to the Darkest England Fund of keeping the whole of these various undertakings going during the year has been about £16,000, including money spent on buildings, etc. The total turn-over of the scheme for the year, including the sales of goods manufactured by the people in the various institutes, was £151,000. Of that sum only £4000 was expended in the salaries of officials connected with the management, including legal, medical, and other professional charges.”

A strong plea is naturally made for help. Copies of the report may be had from the S.A. Headquarters, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

Commercial Travellers.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association recently took place in Exeter Hall. Mr. G. W. DOWDS presided at the conference in the afternoon, when the annual report was read. It showed that 107 new members had been enrolled during the year. Bibles had been supplied for the bedrooms of nine hotels and libraries for the commercial rooms of four hotels. The monthly journal, Good Lines, had greatly increased its circulation and popularity. Some of the branches had done good work, and the weekly and monthly gatherings of the members of the parent Association had proved most helpful.

At the evening meeting Mr. F. A. BEVAN presided. He expressed deep sympathy with the work of the Association, which he regarded as a positive need of a body of men like commercial travellers, who spend so much time away from home. Christian fellowship is always a source of strength, but particularly so when our surroundings are such as to oppose rather than develop the Christian life. There is nothing so hard to stand out against as the customs which prevail, whether in trade or in society. The drinking customs of the day are a great difficulty, though it is to be hoped they are not so bad as they used to be. Mr. Bevan said he recently met a friend who complained that his business compelled him to take so much drink that it made him ill. If such a man joined an association of those who abstained, he would be greatly strengthened in his resolve to abstain. In most trades there are practices which will not bear the daylight. If a man speaks the truth faithfully he has got to be a man of strong principles, and determine by God's help to be no party to doing that which is wrong, no matter what the cost may be.

Addresses were given by Dr. Pentecost, Canon Barker, and Mr. Henry King, of Bath. Letters of sympathy with the work and regrets for absence were read from Sir George Williams, Mr. Martin Hope Sutton, Mr. Arnold Pye Smith, and other gentlemen.

New Year Consecration.

TO THEE, O Lord, my life I owe,
By Thee another year is given;
May I, in service here below,

More surely urge my way to Heaven.

Forgive my slow and sluggish pace,
The many faults of bygone years,
My loitering in the heavenly race,
My worldly wishes, coward fears.

To Thee I yield myself anew,
And humbly, gladly, call Thee mine;
Help me to render homage true,
As not my own, but wholly Thine.

May service new be New Year joy,
Fresh consecration, deeper love,
New works of faith fresh powers employ,
By grace imparted from above.

In closer intercourse with Thee,
May I a joy increasing find;
The things of heaven more clearly see,
And leave the things that are behind,

And if the year we greet as new
Should prove to be on earth my last,
May all my days, though fleet and few,
In serving God and men be passed.

NEWMAN HALL.

Medland Hall.—During the past year the admissions of homeless men at the London Congregational Union's free shelter at Medland Hall have reached the enormous amount of 113,000. The great majority of these are genuine working men, and for very many of them employment has been found. Also during the year fifty-five have emigrated to Canada, after under going preliminary tests to discover if they would make good emigrants. The reports received from these men, and also from over a hundred previously sent to the Dominion from Medland Hall, have been eminently satisfactory. Each man was given an outfit and free passage from London to destination on the other side, yet so economical has been the working that the average cost of these emigrants was slightly under £5 per head.

Great Assembly Hall.

DECEMBER is not a month that would be chosen to commence a special mission to bring the Gospel before the masses. Yet those who were privileged to attend the services recently held by Mr. W. R. Lane in Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall, Mile End-road, could come to no other conclusion than they were most successful. For five weeks Mr. Lane proclaimed the unsearchable riches of Christ. Great blessing followed.

During the mission a special effort was made to get the soldiers stationed at the Tower of London to attend the services. Mr. Charrington invited them to take tea with him. Unfortunately the day selected was a wet one, and the men had had a march out in the rain, which prevented many from accepting the invitation. A good meeting was the result, nevertheless. To see the red jackets of the soldiers in such numbers revived old times, when Mr. Sidney Bevan and Rev. J. Pink used periodically to have soldiers' meetings in the old Conference Hall, Carlton-square. It was a joyous sight to see some of the men of Mr. Lane's old regiment coming out for the Lord.

On the last night of the mission, Mr. Lane gave the story of his conversion. In the course of his remarks, he thanked God for the influence of the Tower Hamlets Mission, which had done so much for the East-End. His mind went back to the time when he stood upon their platform in his regimentals. Somehow, he always felt he was related to the mission by the fact that, in the days gone by, in the old tent at the corner of White Horse-lane, he, with other Christian guardsmen then stationed in the metropolis, used to come down and give their experience and testify for the Master. Those were happy times, never to be forgotten by all who took part in the work nearly twenty-five years ago. At the close of the meeting, which was a large one, many went into the inquiry-room and decided for Christ. K.

The One by One Band.

THE members of this Band seek to win individuals, taking hold of one and persevering in prayer and effort until that soul be saved. Already much blessing has followed the endeavours thus made. Mr. Thomas Hogben, 1, Edinburgh-road, Portsmouth, has issued a little paper in which he gives a number of encouraging testimonies. Amongst these are the following:—

"At present we are enjoying a gracious time of revival in the congregation where I attend, and it has come in answer to prayer. Some hard cases, long prayed for, have been brought to Christ, and now we are praising Him. Some of these I had in my little 'One by One' book. I think there are at least four names I had in my book which have been brought to Christ since I last wrote you, so it is great encouragement to continue this definite daily prayer for individuals. I was much encouraged this summer when in Invergordon, Ross-shire, to learn of two cases of awakening through my giving tracts and speaking individually regarding the interests of the soul."

The wife of a mechanic says: "The Lord has dealt very graciously with my husband and myself during the past three years, when we began to live for Him, to seek out one by one our unsaved relatives. We had then scarcely any in our families who were Christians, but since that time at least sixteen have been won for Christ."

Two missionaries now resting in Germany, write: "One we have had in our books since March 28 was a very worldly girl engaged to a worldly man. At last we felt we could not let another day pass without an earnest attempt to save her. We resolved upon an afternoon's boating, and when out in the water we spoke to her of Christ's claim, she cried out in despair—'I can't be good, I can't even pray.' We prayed for her, and she yielded to be saved by God's grace."

Missionaries in Formosa.—The suppression of the rebellion in the Basel Hakka Valley, west from the Hakka region, has enabled the Hakka Mission ladies to return to Wukingfu. The pacification of Formosa has made it possible for the Formosa Mission ladies to cross from Amoy to Taiwanfoo; and it has been deemed safe also for Dr. Cross to go back to Engehun, in the north; while Dr. Paton and Mr. Campbell Brown are busy at Chinchew.

Miss Leigh's Paris Homes.

I AM frequently asked if the work is still going on in Paris, now that my sister is married and lives mostly in Canada. My reply is that God's work always goes on. One might as well try and stop the sun from shining, or the tide from flowing, as hinder it.

"I will work, and who shall let it?" At the present time the work in all its branches is going on more smoothly than I have ever known it, while the need for it will be realised from the following statistics:—At the Free Registry at 77, Avenue Wagram, Miss Mitchell reports that the applications for governesses and servants for the last three months have been as follows:—191 in October, 119 in November, and 101 in December; while the number of young women seeking employment and applying at the bureau during the same period was 336 during October, 290 in November, and 252 in December. Situations were actually found for 104. These young women are not lost sight of, but are periodically visited in their new spheres by the ladies from the Home.

The work at the adjoining mission hall, with its Sunday-school, Bible classes for men, soup kitchen for the poor, mothers' meetings, mission services, etc., is all most interesting and encouraging. Miss Carmichael, who has had charge of this branch for the last nineteen years, is still working here. At Washington House, 18, Rue de Milan, Miss Ayerst is making a determined effort to clear off the mortgage, and has just issued an appeal, to which we trust there will be a liberal response. She is engaged in a difficult and delicate work, and is much beloved by the artists and students whom she is seeking to win for Christ. On December 26, I attended one of the largest and most representative soirées I have yet seen in connection with any of our institutions at which an opportunity was afforded for presenting the Gospel message. The Y.W.C.A. and home now has its quarters in the dependance of Washington House, and is in charge of Miss Freeman, who works principally amongst the shop-girls.

At the Children's Home and Orphanage, 35, Boulevard Bineau, Neuilly, Miss Lawer is doing a splendid work amongst the forty-four children under her care. Both are happy in their work, and the children are well cared for, and are being trained for God.

The lapse of the Galignani legacy of £300 per annum makes it exceedingly difficult for the directors to maintain this branch of the work, and unless more help is forthcoming it will have to be very considerably curtailed. The directors have placed Christ Church, Neuilly, in the hands of the Colonial and Continental Church Society. Rev. Wm. J. Adams is here getting good congregations, and faithfully preaching the Word of God.

The property of our Association in Paris was recently valued at upwards of £40,000, and it will be seen that a very comprehensive work is being accomplished amongst the English-speaking population. The whole, however, is a big machine to keep constantly going, and we sincerely trust that our appeal for the financial support which is so much needed at the present time will not be in vain. Our London secretary is Miss Rhoda Mouncey, 22A, Queen's-road, Bayswater, W.

Field-lane Mission.—December, always a busy month at this institution, has been unusually so this year. On the 15th Mr. Newton Jones opened a six days' Gospel Mission. Two services were held daily for children and elder scholars, and adults. Mr. Jones, by his earnest and stirring addresses, gained the closest attention of his hearers, and it is to be hoped that this mission may prove a lasting blessing to all who participated in it, and by God's tender mercy bring many souls to Christ. The advent of Christmas always reminds the governing body of Field-lane that they are in the midst of hundreds of utterly destitute men and women, who are without the means of obtaining a bare crust, let alone a good dinner on Christmas Day. How best to relieve and cheer this struggling mass of humanity has always caused great anxiety. This year, thanks to the generous response to the appeal, the Mission was enabled to provide a good substantial hot dinner to 829 of London's homeless poor.

Mildmay Mission to the Jews.

THE annual meetings were held at Mildmay Conference Hall on Monday morning and evening. At the morning meeting Mr. J. E. MATTHESON presided, and gave a very interesting address.

Several Jewish children from the Children's Home sang a hymn and recited portions of Scripture in a most praiseworthy and pleasing manner, after which Rev. John WILKINSON gave some striking facts as to the power of God's Holy Word upon the many Jews who came within the reach of the Mission. He gave many interesting items with respect to the working of the Mission, all branches of which were progressing most favourably. During the last nine years a million New Testaments and portions in Hebrew, German, French, Russian, Judæo-German, Judæo-Spanish, Arabic and other languages had been given away. The Medical Mission was very flourishing, there having been 17,000 attendances during the past year. The sewing class for the poorest of poor Jewish women numbers from 300 to 400, and many of these poor women love Jesus as their Saviour. There is a night-school for Jewish children, with an attendance of 400. Many of these are true believers in Jesus, and carry the message of salvation to their parents. Many other branches of work were referred to.

At the evening meeting, when Colonel Morton presided, Rev. John Wilkinson, Mr. Samuel Wilkinson, Pastor Faber, and others, spoke of the great work the Mission was doing in Russia, and other parts of the world.

The Bible League.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Kindly allow me to say through your columns that the engagements in Scotland of Rev. John Urquhart have rendered it necessary for the Council to make special arrangements for the prosecution of our work from its London centre.

I have, therefore, been asked to undertake the duties of honorary secretary, but our funds are low, and we must not incur debt. It would greatly facilitate our plans if subscriptions could be sent in at once to our treasurer, Col. Corry Smith, 23, The Embankment, Bedford, with such additional help as our friends may be able to afford or to procure.—Yours, very faithfully, JOHN TUCKWELL.

Inspection of Laundries.—The new Act does not, as was implied in a note in our last issue, interfere with those who take in washing at home, as it does not apply to any laundry in which the only persons employed are members of the same family dwelling there, or in which not more than two persons dwelling elsewhere are employed.

Letters to the Editor.

RECOGNITION IN HEAVEN.

DEAR SIR,—I read with much pleasure the paper by Rev. Wm. Crosbie on the above subject in your last issue. The theme is one of great interest, and I would like to add another passage of Scripture which, to my mind, is strong evidence on the point raised. I mean Rev. ii. 17: "To him that overcometh, to him will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and I will give him a white stone, and upon the stone a new name written, which no one knoweth but he that receiveth it."

Here we have the personality and identity of the soul affirmed in a beautiful figure. Each soul shall, essentially, know God in its own way, and as no other soul shall know Him. There is the secret of being, known only to the individual soul and its Saviour. None but ourselves shall know the name by which God calls us. The soul knows itself to be in God, and changes not. If our identity be thus established, we should know each other in the glorious hereafter.—Yours faithfully,

ROBERT JONES.

Sudbury, Suffolk, December 30, 1895.

SIR,—The article in your issue of the 26th inst., under the above title, is on one of the most interesting of subjects, in relation to our future state; and if your numerous readers have had an equal pleasure to the writer, in the perusal of Mr. Crosbie's article, they will perhaps pardon my suggesting an interchange of opinion on the subject.

Personally I should like to accept Mr. Crosbie's view, but am unable to do so. My difficulty takes direct form when we are asked, "Shall we know our friends in Heaven?" Mr. Crosbie seems to be fully assured we shall carry forward with us three characteristics he enumerates—our individuality, our identity, our memory.

To this assurance I reluctantly demur, more especially in regard to the last of the three. From its characteristics it seems an impossibility. In its normal condition memory does not choose what it shall or shall not retain, and on what grounds we are called upon to alter its characteristics we are not shown, and this being so, we are brought to face a self-evident difficulty.—Yours faithfully,

W. G. W.

Low Fell, Gateshead, Dec. 30, 1895.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

SIR,—The dark cloud looming in the West waits but for our effort of faith to be dispersed, or to "break in blessings on our head." God of his great mercy grant that nothing so terrible as war between these mighty nations, of one blood, one language, one faith, may ever be permitted. Never may they sully the lustre of their banners with the stain of their brothers' blood, but the rather may they and we stand shoulder to shoulder in the holy war for truth and honour, for justice and mercy, on this poor sin and sorrow-stricken earth. Strong in faith, let us plead again the promise, "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it."

CREDO.

THE INFLUX OF "REPORTS."

DEAR SIR,—My husband and I heartily endorse the views held by your correspondent with regard to the perplexity of being inundated with reports, etc., from the various societies to which we subscribe; we would wish, moreover, to protest against the useless waste of money, in receiving, as we so often do, two copies from the same society, one addressed to each of us. This, doubtless, occurs in thousands of other cases, entailing a perfectly useless and heavy expense in the course of the year, when money is so much needed to carry on the work of the societies.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

H. HOBDEY.

Arlington Villa, Orford-road, Manchester.

SIR,—I, too, wish to complain of "the overwhelming rush of reports, magazines, etc.," that are sent to the subscribers by the various societies. Such waste of money for the printing and postage: I sigh over it, and cannot attempt to read them. I do not like to throw them into the wastepaper-basket, so what to do with them is a puzzle. I often receive duplicates, but no one wants the second copy. I think it is a mistake to spend so much money in this way. A quarterly magazine would be better than a monthly one in most cases.

E. C.

[It is perhaps hardly necessary to prolong correspondence on this side of the subject. It is evident from these and other letters we have received that the present system meets with much disfavour. We shall be glad to hear what the secretaries may have to say in reply, and what, if any, alternative plans they could suggest. It certainly seems as if a "quarterly" would meet the case.—Ed.]

The Salvation Army in France.

A CO-WORKER with Mrs. Booth-Clibborn writes from Rouen:—We have had marvellous meetings in this town, and in a wonderful way God is blessing the Maréchale's efforts for the salvation of souls.

During her fortnight's campaign in Paris our Rue Auber Hall was each night filled with an audience of the most typical kind. Among several remarkable cases of conversion was that of a distinguished authoress, who has written, "I have seen much of this world, and been in contact with many people; but meeting with you and your people I have at last met reality."

Another is that of a fallen girl. For years our officers had prayed for her, and had tried every possible means to lift her, until her salvation was well nigh despaired of. This time she got truly converted, and her countenance and whole appearance tells of the change that has been wrought within by the grace of God.

These are visible results which certainly fill our hearts with praise; but what of the good that has been done unknown to us; what of the working of the seed, so faithfully sown, deep within the heart? Certainly much will be known only when the light of eternity will be dawning over our heads.

Here, in Rouen, the theatre has been packed each evening. It was a joy for her to meet those who a year ago had been saved, and had stood the test.

Our hearts rejoice at this sight, wonderful indeed for such a Catholic town. The light is penetrating in the darkest of hearts. An infidel has come to the light, and helps the officers in a splendid way. He writes:—"Since one year I can say, 'I LIVE.' This blessed correspondence of which you speak, is established between my soul and the next world, and I know now that God is!"

Count Campello's Work.

WE have returned from Italy, and a visit to Count Campello in his Umbrian home. We were deeply gratified with what we saw of his work. If people could only see for themselves his real work they would be eager to help him. The poverty is so great it is a hard fight even to live. At one of the many villages where he has brought the glad tidings of the Gospel, we were delighted to see that they had very nearly finished the building of a place of worship, but four feet of the walls remaining to be finished ere the roof can be put on, but it stands waiting until £60 more can be got to complete the structure. One of the many objects dear to the Count is to fit up a large upper room as a children's hospital. The room is airy, well ventilated, and well built. An English lady who has been nine years in an English Hospital, and has distinguished herself in the surgical ward, offers to go at her own cost for a year or two to organise the children's hospital as soon as it is furnished. From many villages comes the cry, "Send us a teacher; we want to know the truth." Count Campello has the teachers to send, but not the means of sending them. Shall they cry in vain because we will not send what is needed to enable the labourers to go and gather the harvest of souls for Christ? (Mrs.) D. C. PETRIE.

Midnight Meeting Movement.—Special meetings were held at the London Docks, and King's Cross on the last night but one of 1895. Mr. J. J. Drysdale, one of the committee, presided at the latter place. One girl said to the secretary, "I will go with you wherever you will take me; I am quite tired of this life." The office of the Movement is 8A, Red Lion-square, W.C.

Christian Endeavour.

COTTAGE prayer meetings at the homes of those not able to go to church are conducted every Sunday afternoon by a society in Orillia, Ont.

A Toronto Presbyterian society reports the departure of one of its members for the foreign field, and the preparation of four others to follow.

A recent rally at Biggs, Cal., that filled the church to overflowing, was the first religious meeting, apart from regular church services, that the town had ever seen.

At a school for girls at San Sebastian, Spain, praise meeting was lately conducted by four of the graduates, who were leaving the school after successfully passing the Government examinations.

At the recent anniversary of the Burton-on-Trent (New Street) C.E. Society, sermons were preached by Rev. James Mursell. Ninety-seven members are reported, and among other good efforts are mission services in an outlying village.

The Liverpool and District Union includes fifty societies, with an aggregate of 1988 members. During last year eleven new societies were added, as well as six junior sections formed. The committee in the third annual report, express the earnest hope that all senior societies will see the importance of forming junior sections.

Mr. William J. Searle, of New Zealand, proposes that Endeavourers should unite as the Christian Endeavour Letter League, simply by promising to write at least one letter a month to some friend or acquaintance, this letter having for its definite object the extension of the Master's kingdom. The letter may be to some unconverted person, and may point him to "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," or it may be to some one in sorrow or in need of spiritual help. No organisation is required; societies simply taking up the matter as they may desire, and where advisable.

Irish Notes.

THE Christian Endeavour Society is growing in this country, several branches having been established during the last month or two.

The memorial to the late Mrs. Alexander, wife of the Bishop of Derry, is to take the form of a home or almshouse for the destitute poor of all denominations in the city of Derry.

On the last night of the old year, watchnight services were held in a large number of churches of various denominations in Ireland, and were very largely attended. The circumstances of the times added special solemnity to the occasion, and the meetings were therefore more than usually devout and earnest. Many prayers were also offered that our country may be delivered from the horrors of war.

Costers' Hall, Hoxton.

TO provide a winter party for every poor child in the darkest London is no easy goal to reach. One step in this direction has been made by the founder of the Robin dinners, Rev. Charles Bullock, who has for eighteen years raised the sum of close upon one thousand pounds annually for these Christmas parties. Following a most successful dinner given in St. Martin's Town-hall, on December 27th, the Robin Dinner Fund held another large dinner on Friday at Costers' Hall, Hoxton, the headquarters of the Golden-lane Costers' Mission, founded and for many years carried on by Mr. W. J. Orsman, its energetic superintendent.

The committee of the Robin Dinner Fund hope to arrange for many other such dinners both in London and the provinces. Already grants for 18,000 children have been made this year. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN are asked to help to exceed the 80,000 entertained last year. The hon. secs. of the Fund are Messrs. O. Ashton Bullock and John Kirk, Home Words Office, 7, Paternoster square, E.C.

Seamen's Christian Friend Society.—Several hundred seamen assembled at the headquarters, in Ratcliff-highway, on New Year's Day. After tea a limelight lecture was given by Rev. G. J. Hill. An evangelistic meeting was presided over by Mr. H. W. Maynard, and addressed by Rev. John Wilson M.L.S.B., Messrs. W. H. Seagram, G. Lampard, and Mrs. Maynard. The men were also addressed in German by Mr. Grasdorff, and in Swedish by Lad. Leijonhjn. A very large number remained to an after-meeting. At the close about forty signed the temperance pledge. Similar gatherings on the same day were held at most of the society's rests and Bethels round the coasts.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE class room at the Clapham Institute will, in future, be opened for the use of members. There are in Ireland alone 328 branches of the Y.W.C.A., claiming nearly 17,000 members.

The Belgravian Institute is to receive a legacy of £200 under the will of the late Miss Mary Deacon. Conferences for Christian workers are to be held at the Morley Halls, 316, Regent-street, on the third Thursdays of January, February, and March.

The annual re-union and distribution of prizes of the Lisburn branch was held on the 27th ult. The report was a most encouraging one. The members number over 600.

Attractive programmes both for seniors and juniors have been issued by the St. James' (Hatcham) branch. The meetings are held on Wednesday and Thursday evenings in the small hall adjoining St. Michael's Mission Church.

An important meeting was held by the Donegal-square Institute to further a movement, under Miss Albraith's direction, for Christian evangelical work amongst the poor Jews of Belfast. Rev. Dr. Mullinger gave a vigorous address in support of the work.

A very enjoyable "social" was held at Deanston on the 20th ult., by the combined local branches of the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. Addresses were given by Revs. Wm. Huie, J. C. Peat, and L. McDonald. Mr. Alex. Gray, president of the Doune Y.M.C.A., also spoke.

The Rochester Institute is removed to new premises at 212, Walworth-road. The work amongst factory girls will still be carried on by the Factory Workers' Union, assisted by the Y.W.C.A., and three evenings weekly the rooms will be used for Y.W.C.A. work. Miss Miller, the resident-superintendent, has had encouraging success. The change in the characters and lives of many of the girls attending the institute is very marked, and it is to meet the needs of these girls that a Y.W.C.A. branch is being formed.

The Y.M.C.A.

IN consequence of the distress among the poor in Belfast, the Trades' Council invited the Y.M.C.A. to make a collection on the tram-cars of the city. Mr. Black undertook the task, with the result that the Y.M.C.A. have handed one hundred pounds to the relief fund. The action of the Y.M.C.A. has caused general satisfaction.

Sir George Williams signs on behalf of the National Council a call to Christian students for workers among young men. The field, it is pointed out, is vast, and the needs urgent, for most of the five million young men are exposed to peculiar temptations, and may become either the means of leading others to ruin or of bringing glory to God.

The new home of the Richmond Association, situated near Richmond Common, was opened on Thursday evening; there was a crowded attendance, and much enthusiasm shown. Oak Lodge is the name of the building, which possesses large and most comfortably furnished rooms, and is in every way adapted for the purposes for which it has been secured.

The N.E. Metropolitan District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s held its quarterly meeting on Friday night at Stratford; chairman, Mr. R. L. Barclay. Brief reports were submitted from most of the Associations in the district, nearly every one testifying to good work accomplished and freedom from debt. Now and Canning Town appealed for special help from the newly-appointed travelling secretary.

By invitation of the Mayor, the members of the Y.M.C.A., together with other young men engaged in Christian work in the Royal borough, assembled at the Guildhall on Friday evening to hear a New Year's address from the Vicar of Windsor, Rev. J. H. Ellison, M.A. A good number responded and listened to a very useful and practical address. Refreshments were afterwards served in the Guildhall.

The Berlin Association has appointed a secretary exclusively for work among soldiers. The usefulness of this can easily be estimated if it is considered that in Berlin the soldiers called to serve in the guards for two years, return after this to all parts of the country. While most of the provincial regiments take their recruits from the province itself; all the best men are called to Berlin from all over the country. An influence brought to bear upon them will therefore be carried to all parts of the Empire. Arrangements made by the Newcastle Y.M.C.A. Lodging-house Mission Band has resulted in two very successful free breakfasts being provided for those in whom the workers are interested. The first was given on Christmas morning, when over one hundred men enjoyed a successful breakfast. An interesting service followed, when short addresses were given by Mr. J. C. Halliday, Mr. R. W. Hutchinson, and Mr. Wm. Bell. The second meeting was held on New Year's morning, when a hearty breakfast was partaken of by about one hundred and twenty women and children. Brief addresses were delivered by Mr. Harry Armstrong, Miss Campbell, secretary of the Y.W.C.A., and Mr. Draper, of the Soldiers' Home.

Personalia.

Dr. Gregg, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, has been very ill during the past week, but is now considered out of danger.

Rev. J. Douglas, M.A., has undertaken the duties of superintending the studies of the students at the Missionary Training College, St. Agnes Place, Kennington Park, in the place of Rev. J. Wintle. Rev. F. B. Meyer asks the prayers of God's people in connection with this work.

Mr. Samuel James Capper is addressing public meetings in the cause of international peace. He has seen war, for he was one of the honorary commissioners of the Victims' Fund during the Franco-German War. Communications may be addressed to him at Ingelwood, Roundhay, Leeds.

Rev. H. Hovhannessian, of the Aintab Orphanage, has, during his present visit to Britain, collected £800 towards liberating his work from the burden of debt. While he yet remains in England, he is hoping to hear from benevolent friends, who will enable him to assume the care of additional orphans from the districts of Armenia in which the deplorable massacres have occurred. His institution has accommodation for many more than its present inmates. Mr. Hovhannessian is anxious to return home without needless delay. Meanwhile, letters for him may be addressed to our care.

Evangelistic Notes.

King's Langley and Abbot's Langley, Herts.—Mr. Hugh C. Wallace, of the Evangelisation Society, has concluded a month's labour to these places, and we believe God has richly blessed his Word, which was faithfully preached.

Avoch, N.B.—Mr. C. Galletly has finished a fifteen days' mission in connection with Avoch Congregational Church. The services were highly appreciated, many Christians being benefited thereby, while several people have professed conversion.

Ireland.—Fruitful evangelistic services have been held in Ballyconnell Methodist Church, by Mrs. Brown-Anderson, of America. Similar services have been held in Bellaghy, co. Derry, by Miss Wakefield, of Portadown; and at Lagan View Mission Hall, Belfast, by Rev. Henry Ball.

Cage-lane, Plumstead.—On Sunday Mr. James Lovell began a twelve days' mission in this well-known hall. Great interest was shown; much solemnity being aroused by the fact that the beloved General Anderson, who has now passed to his rest, was deeply concerned in the coming mission. Prayer is desired that God may use these special services, and "the last message" of the departed leader, in rich blessing to many souls.

Maldon, Essex.—Mr. John H. Cooke, of the Evangelisation Society, has recently concluded a fifteen days' mission in this town. For Sundays the Public Hall was engaged, and this building was filled with deeply attentive audiences, and we trust Mr. Cooke's earnest words may have lasting effect on some. Many brethren who were led during previous missions to accept Christ, gave Mr. Cooke a hearty welcome, and rejoiced to see so many more brought under the sound of his voice.

A Striking Tradition.—M. Allégret, missionary among the Pahouins, in French Congoland, relates that a cannibal chief, pointing across the river on the shores of which he lived, asked, "Is that the way God went?" In answer to inquiry on the part of the missionary, the anxious man explained: "Long ago—at the beginning—God lived here with his two sons—one white, the other black. He commanded them to be good one to another, also to the animals who were their brethren. The white son obeyed the father's order; but the black one, on seeing an elephant in his plantation eating bananas, seized a lance and killed the beast. Then God went away, taking his white son with him, for he said he could not stay with a son who did contrary to his will. Since then (continued the negro) we have been waiting for our white brother to bring news from our Father, and any presents he may send us." Here is a tradition of the Fall, and an evidence that news from the Father is the consolation for which even degraded cannibals are longing. How thankful should the missionaries be that in some cases the most benighted of men expect them, and in fact, wait for their long-delayed arrival!

Obituary.

MR. H. THANE MILLER, ALBANY, N.B.

SOME may recall the blind delegate who attended the Y.M.C.A. Jubilee meetings, and who seemed so deeply interested in the proceedings. For many years he had taken a leading part in Christian work, and most specially in Y.M.C.A. effort. In a notice of his career in the Young Men's Era, Mr. R. R. McBurney pays a high tribute to his character and influence, closing:—"The work of the association which won his heart and held it true through all the years from the beginning, was the winning of young men to the service of Jesus Christ. The evangelistic spirit was dominant in him. Mr. Miller's Christian life was what might be called a serene life. The trials and difficulties which came to him in his outer life—and they were the most severe which come to man—stirred not the calm repose of his soul. He possessed in an unusual degree the realisation of the presence of Jesus Christ."

MR. MARTIN WARE.

A long life devoted to the service of Christ among lads, and among the fallen and sinful, closed with the last days of 1895. Mr. Ware, the secretary of the Shoeblocks' Society, passed away on Dec. 30, at the age of seventy-seven. In his early days, after leaving Cambridge, he was led to take an active interest in Ragged Schools, and when "Rob Roy" started the Shoeblock Brigades, Mr. Ware became one of his first helpers, thus beginning a service he continued throughout life. His interest in the Bible Society was also very keen. Not only was he a member of the committee for many years, but he was a very effective speaker on its behalf. For over forty years he took a very practical interest in preventive, reformatory, child-saving, and rescue work at home; as well as in the spread of the light of the Word in all lands. All who knew him loved him; and his loss will be mourned by many. Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe pays a warm tribute to his memory in The Record for Friday last.

MR. JOHN MORLEY, CLAPTON.

Many readers will learn, with a sense of personal bereavement, of the death of Mr. John Morley, of Clapton, which took place on Wednesday afternoon of last week. For months past Mr. Morley had been in feeble health, a thing not to be wondered at, seeing he was eighty-eight years of age. On the afternoon of Sunday week, Dr. Henry Soltan recently arrived from India, called on Mr. Morley, and the invalid was able to join his visitors in the singing of some hymns. Learning that Dr. Soltan was to preach at Clapton Hall that evening, Mr. Morley asked for pencil and paper, and essayed to send a message to the assembled brethren. Strength failed him, however, and the same evening he became unconscious. He never rallied, and passed peacefully away on the Wednesday afternoon. His last words were, "My Saviour." His mortal remains were to be interred at Abney Park on Tuesday afternoon, a service being previously held at Clapton Hall. In a subsequent issue we hope to give a portrait and sketch of the life-testimony of the deceased.

CANON REGINALD S. SMITH.

This honoured servant of Christ, whose falling asleep we have already mentioned, had been rector of West Stafford (Dorset) for well-nigh sixty years. Ordained in 1834, he accepted the charge of West Stafford two years after. Dr. Handley Moule writes:—"Mr. Smith was the faithful pastor of Stafford from first to last. But his influence inevitably was felt far beyond it. He was a quiet power in the neighbourhood and county, in the diocese, and in the church; in religious societies (especially in the Dorset auxiliaries of the C.M.S. and C.P.A.S.), in clerical meetings, in diocesan conferences, and not seldom through publications, letter or pamphlet, on questions of the hour. But to define the channels of his influence is to give less than half the account of what it was. The influence was the man, even more than the word. I must not trust myself to say all I would of 'mine own friend and my father's friend.' But who that knew him can speak coldly of that noble gentleness of character and address, that unruffled patience and peace of spirit (with an abundant courage ready at need), those never-weary and never-contracted sympathies, and that mind which, active in every direction, was yet so evidently heavenly, as of one who walked habitually with God? Truly his path of personal religion was as the shining light, and the memory is deeply sacred."

Pastors' College Evening Classes.—The Free Evening Classes for Christian workers are being resumed for the season. Those desirous of joining are requested to make early application to the secretary, Mr. G. Hall, Pastors' College, Temple-street, Newington, S.E., enclosing stamped envelope for reply.

Temperance Notes.

CHICAGO brewers have decided, it is said, to close about 1700 saloons in that city.

It is not possible, says The Lancet, to state with arithmetical precision the proportion of diseases due to alcohol, but it is certainly very large.

The "Gospel Temperance Appeal" the organ of the Carrubbers Close Mission, gives a portrait of the late Rev. James Gall, founder of the famous mission.

New headquarters for the B.W.T.A. at Albany Buildings, 47, Victoria-street, Westminster, were formally opened on Thursday afternoon by Lady Henry Somerset.

A woman twenty-five years old has been charged with drunkenness at Burnley for the fifty-eighth time. A young woman aged nineteen has been charged in London for the twenty-third time.

A boy of fifteen was charged with drunkenness in Liverpool. The police stated that boys were in the habit of obtaining drink in cans from public-houses on the pretence of taking it home.

The Industrial Farm Home for Inebriate Women at Duxhurst, Reigate, is to be called the "Somerset Village Home," so that the name of the president, Lady Henry Somerset, may be permanently associated with it.

The London Temperance Hospital has received £2000 from the executors of the late Mr. Robert Groom, £200 from the executors of the late Mr. Joseph Huntley, and £150 from the executors of the late Mr. James Payne.

Several Norwegian districts have, by popular vote of men and women over twenty-five years of age, decreed the suppression of the "samlag" or spirit companies, and thus put an end to the public-houses, as empowered by the Act of 1895.

Statistics respecting the inmates of French prisons show that out of a hundred persons convicted of murder in Paris, fifty-three are confirmed drunkards. The same proportion of drunkards is found amongst those convicted of offences against morals. Out of a hundred convicted of begging and vagabondage, the drunkards numbered seventy, and no fewer than ninety amongst a hundred sentenced for causing bodily harm.

A conference of temperance organisations in Durham and Northumberland has been held in Newcastle, under the presidency of Canon Moore, in order to discover what measures the party, as a whole, could support. The Government were urged to pass a measure suspending the power of granting new licences; also a Bill empowering justices to refuse off wine and spirit licences, in favour of the repeal of grocers' licences, Sunday closing, the closing of public-houses on election days, against the sale of intoxicants to children under sixteen years of age, against the sale of intoxicants on steamboats while at anchor, and calling for drastic legislation dealing with the evils arising from drinking clubs.

Manchuria.—While there are sad reports of grave trouble, successful rebellions, looting of missionary property, enforced flight of missionaries, in the north-western provinces of China, Northern China seems happily now at peace; and the hearts of the workers are hopeful. The Manchurian missionaries (Irish Presbyterians and United Presbyterians) have felt at liberty to return to their posts, from which they were driven by the war. Moukden and Kirin have both been reoccupied; and in both cities a cordial welcome has been accorded to the missionaries.

Berlin.—At the Industrial Exhibition in Berlin, 1896, a mission work will be done among the young women employed to show goods at the stalls. The society working here among young women stands under the patronage of the Empress, and her Majesty's influence made the organisers of the exhibition willing to erect and grant for that purpose a building in the grounds of the exhibition. The young women will be able to take their meals and spend their few free moments there. Ladies will take charge of their interests, good books and periodicals will be placed at their disposal.—Evangelical Christendom.

Requests for Prayer.—For much blessing on cottage meetings, that souls may be saved, being held week by week at Cotton End, Hurrowden, and Littleworth, by Pastor W. H. Smith.—For a ten days' mission at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, commencing January 12, by Pastors C. B. Sawday, J. Manton Smith, and Thos. Spurgeon.—For blessing on anniversary meetings of the mission at Worcester Park, to be conducted by Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Alexander, January 12 and 13. For a ten days' united mission, in the Public Hall, Epsom, Jan. 16 to 26, by Mr. W. R. Lane.—For a Gospel Mission in Shrubland-road Congregational Church, Dalston, by Mr. Henry Thorne, Jan. 11 to 20.

The Book World.

THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

IN APRIL last we called attention to a remarkable article in Blackwood's Magazine, from the pen of Dr. Robert Anderson, in defence of the Book of Daniel the Prophet. That article has been expanded into a small volume, with the title Daniel in the Critics' Den: A Reply to Dean Farrar's "Book of Daniel." (3s. 6d. Blackwood & Sons.) Maintaining that the precise issue is, "Was the book in existence before the days of Antiochus?" Dr. Anderson holds that the question must be investigated in a judicial manner. "An experienced judge, with an intelligent jury, accustomed to sift and weigh conflicting testimony, would here be a fitter tribunal than any board of specialists, however eminent. The philologist can supply but a part, and that by no means the most important part, of the necessary evidence."

As Assistant Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Dr. Anderson is accustomed to deal with evidence in intricate and difficult inquiries, and in these pages he shows judicial acumen as well as an intimate knowledge of his subject. Theorists are proverbially blind to facts, and woe be to them when they are examined by a lawyer who insists upon the facts, and has no mercy upon mere theories. These pages convict Dr. Farrar of arrogance as well as error; and it is painful to observe that, copying others, in Germany as well as at home, the Dean has, in depreciating Daniel, instanced difficulties which have no existence in fact, and alleged inconsistencies which simply originate in hostile criticism. Professor Sayce, who has done much to discredit extreme critical views regarding the Pentateuch, has unfortunately given his influence against the historicity of Daniel. Dr. Anderson shows us on what feeble grounds; and in the mouth of several witnesses, all specialists in Assyriology, convicts the professor of a most misleading "translation" of a cuneiform tablet, whereby the entire superstructure of his attack upon the accuracy of Daniel is made to rest upon the merest gloss.

Dr. Anderson says in conclusion: "If the Bible were treated with that fairness which is never denied to the heathen classics, or indeed to any secular records, how easily its difficulties might be explained! But when the object in view is to discredit Daniel, and prove it in error, no ingenuity is deemed too subtle—I had almost said, too perverse. The proofs here offered that the book is not only genuine but of Divine authority, are overwhelming." In his argument Dr. Anderson expounds the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. His book is one for thoughtful Christians, whether learned or not, and it will do good to those who will read it in the right spirit.

The Christian Irishman is an evangelistic monthly which should interest Protestants everywhere. The articles, in some cases, have permanent value. The parts for the past year have been stitched in a handy volume. (1s. 3d., post free. Office, 16, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.)

The Secret of Power for Daily Living, by Rev. William Houghton, is a stimulating addition to the "Keswick Library." In ten thoughtful chapters the author deals with life and godliness in a practical manner, not overlooking teaching on God's providence, and the Christian's duty in trial and sorrow. (1s. nett. Marshall Brothers.)

The Story of the Kings of Israel and Judah. A Compilation of Bible Narratives arranged consecutively. By Henry Hill. (Elliot Stock.) Arranged chronologically, this is a useful book. It would have been more useful if the sources as to chapter and verse had been given. The student who supplies this lack in the ample margin will be profited by the exercise.

The Catholic, edited by Rev. Thomas Connellan, is a useful monthly. In the volume for last year (post free 1s. 3d. Office; 51b, Dawson-street, Dublin), there are articles in criticism of well-known Roman Catholic dogmas, also several on the recently-recovered "Confession of St. Patrick." Those who study the Romish controversy will find much information in these pages.

Biblewomen and Nurses. Vol. XII. (3s. Cassell & Co.) This admirably conducted monthly ably pleads the cause of the poor, and expounds in interesting style the patient service of the Bible-nurses and Biblewomen in the squalid corners of London. We trust it will win many fresh helpers for Mrs. Ranyard's society, the London Bible and Domestic Female Mission.

Laws and Landmarks of the Spiritual Life. by Rev. W. A. Gray, ranks well with its predecessors in the "Life Indeed" series. (3s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.) The "laws" relate to the fundamentals of Christian development, and the "landmarks" to deeply important topics. Chapters on "The Supreme Desire" (John xii. 21); "The Supreme Fellowship" (2 Tim. iv. 22); and "The Supreme Testimony" (Col. i. 28, 29) form the concluding section of a book which we commend for its vigour of style as well as its stimulating contents.

Our Bible and the Ancient Monuments: Being a History of the Text and its Translations. By Frederic G. Kenyon, M.A., D.Litt. (5s. Eyre & Spottiswoode.) This is a volume comprehensive in scope and lucid in statement; the scholar will value it as an outline of important facts, and the ordinary reader will make easy headway through its instructive pages. Intelligent students of Scripture will find here a satisfactory answer to questions regarding the transmission of the sacred text; and those who use the Variorum Bible, and other works embodying the results of textual criticism, will find this book, which is illustrated with twenty-six facsimiles of MSS., a very useful companion. Dr. Kenyon writes with admirable clearness, and his work is fully up to date. Those who require a description of Biblical manuscripts and early versions, and the story of the principal editions of the text and historic translations, ancient and modern, will find this volume to be a guide handy in size and worthy of confidence.

Two useful booklets entitled, ANIMALS OF THE BIBLE, have been issued from Drummond's Tract Depot, Stirling. Each part describes six animals, and there are illustrations. A capital biographical booklet is DR. ANDREW BONAR: Lessons from his Life, by Rev. Alex. Andrew, D.D. A good portrait and other pictures indicate this as a book for young and old alike. (1½d. each.)

AM I FIT TO TAKE THE LORD'S SUPPER? This booklet, by Rev. Samuel Pearson, M.A., of Manchester, should prove helpful to many. One of a series of "Tracts for the Times," it is sound and strong, and as good as it is plain and outspoken. It is in its fifteenth thousand, and copies should be placed in the hands of thousands of Church members who neglect their duties and fail to realise their privileges. (1d. Alisonson.)

Crippled and Sick Children.—Some old friends of the poor, who have been moved by compassion for London's crippled and sick children, made arrangements for the London Samaritan Society to receive into their convalescent home and hospital, at Sandgate, one hundred poor cripples quite free of all cost, including railway fares, for a fortnight. Special carriages for their conveyance were kindly provided by the S.E.R. Company, and a staff of nurses were at Cannon-street Station on Monday afternoon to receive them from their parents and friends.

Portobello Mission.—This Mission was commenced in October, 1887, and has been greatly blessed of God. One of the chief features of work is its successful Sunday-school. Many have to be shut out who would gladly come, for want of accommodation. The evangelistic services in the hall are encouraging, and good work is being done among the poor people in the locality. During the summer months open air work is carried on. Commodious premises have been offered to the Mission. They will require much alteration and repair, beside extra seating. The building when altered will seat 500 people, beside having other accommodation. £175 is required. The hon. treasurer is Mr. J. A. McIntyre, 52, Princes-square, Bayswater. The address of the Mission is Portobello-road, Notting-hill, W. JAS. M. MARSHALL.

The account of the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson and their son in Madagascar is painful reading, chiefly because it appears that it was those who had attended their church and schools who did the deed, and plundered the adjoining houses. Had the untaught heathen done it, one could not have been surprised; but from those who had shared the loving labours of such wise teachers we might have expected better things. The tragedy, like the martyrdoms in China, shows how great are the perils which our brethren run, even when we think they have gained the confidence and love of those whose salvation they seek. Heathenism is suspicious and treacherous, and may any day turn and rend its benefactors. Until true conversion has taken place, a heathen may, under sudden temptation, be swept into deeds of violence and blood.

In his lecture at the Victoria Institute, Mr. Reed turned the tables on those opponents of Christianity who are delighted to state that it derives its ideas and its moral teachings from other religions. He showed that the ethics of Buddhism were in part, at least, derived from the Jews, whose country was in a state of great prosperity five hundred years before Buddha is said to have existed. The captivity which scattered the Jews probably carried some of them far east. A thousand years before Christ there was great intercourse between India, Persia, Parthia, Media, and the countries south of the Euxine. There was also traffic by sea carried on by the Phœnicians between India and the coast of the Mediterranean, round by the Red Sea and Ceylon.

The Daily Chronicle, supported by other influential journals, is strongly urging that now is the time for a treaty to be entered into by the United States and our own country, in favour of arbitration as the method of settling all disputes between them which cannot be decided by diplomatic action. The principle has been already adopted by the House of Commons in a resolution passed June 16, 1893, and by the United States Congress in a resolution passed April 4, 1890. All the most influential men in the United States Senate have just expressed themselves in its favour. A strong expression of opinion from the leaders of life and opinion at home might aid in consummating an international arrangement which could not fail to have the happiest effect upon the history of two of the greatest nations in the world.

If the complications of modern life have brought us nearer to war, they have also removed us further away from it. Various nationalities, separated in their original countries by well-defined boundaries, come into perilous contact in foreign lands, and a trifle may occasion an outbreak of the old spirit of jealousy and set the world in flames. On the other hand, there are checks and compensations. Germany may be ready to quarrel with us, but she cannot well afford to lose her best customer. Besides, her hostile attitude at once evokes the sympathy of the United States with us. Again, the United States may be urged on to take a hostile position, but they are restrained by selfish considerations, by ties of blood, and by religious principles, actuating a large number of their citizens. While secondary influences are working for peace, Christians should sedulously propagate a peaceable spirit by the Gospel.

The Queen has many a time shown that she understands her people, and the needs of the hour, but she has never shown it more clearly than in her telegram to President Krüger. She has thereby destroyed the evil consequences of her grandson's rash act, has strengthened the good feeling between the South African Republic and, ourselves, and has paved the way for a peaceable settlement of differences. She seldom intervenes publicly, but when she does act she carries the whole weight of the nation with her, and never trenches upon the prerogatives of Parliament. The twenty words she sent to Pretoria were worth an army and a fleet. Thankful for her action, we cannot but be thankful also for the action of the Government, for that of Sir Hercules Robinson, and for that of the Press. In a time of grave peril everyone who had serious responsibility has acted under a sense of it. Does not this mark a step in advance of the old warlike days?

It was with a feeling of unspeakable relief that the country heard of the decision of President Krüger to liberate Dr. Jameson and his fellow-prisoners, and leave them to the judgment of the English Government. The decision, which was both wise and magnanimous, removed the possibility of angry and vindictive feeling arising on either side. It has, however, cast on the Home authorities a great responsibility, which we believe they will honestly and fearlessly face. If they were to treat the insubordination of these men lightly, it would be an incentive to lawlessness and plundering, and an insult to the South African Republic. It would also be understood as a confession of sympathy with them, if not as an evidence of connivance at their crime. But we look for a measure of justice, the effects of which will be bracing to the public conscience. An effectual check may now be given to the recklessness which will plunge nations into war for the sake of gain.

Even "the wrath of man" is made to praise God, and out of the horrible carnage of war there emerge fair deeds of valour and heroism. In the details of the recent fighting in the Transvaal, which are beginning to arrive, some striking instances occur. In a lull in the fighting a young Boer named Jacoby took pity on a wounded foe, and took him some water. While carrying out this act of mercy he was shot down and killed by another wounded trooper, who had probably mistaken his intentions. Two troopers, during one of Jameson's efforts to get through the Boer lines, having left behind them a wounded comrade, made a desperate attempt, in the teeth of many odds, to rescue him, but were made prisoners in the attempt.

One other striking incident, if read in its widest bearings, shows the absurdity of war itself. At the battle of Doornkop two men were about to fire on one another at short range, when they simultaneously dropped their rifles. Each recognised the other. They had been at school together; and so they realised their brotherhood in the very madness of battle. But were not all the combatants as truly brothers, if only they would recognise the fact? When men of all nations learn their true relations under the Prince of Peace, they will find it as impossible to fire on a human being—though a stranger—as these two friends did at Doornkop when they recognised each other at the fateful moment. But now are the "things pertaining to their peace" hidden from them, and war, gaunt and terrible, still rears its head among men.

It is to be earnestly hoped and prayed for, that the settlement of matters in the Transvaal, and of our relations with America, may leave the way free for the defence of the hapless Armenians. It is nothing short of a calamity that their claims should have been pushed out of the forefront of public notice by such events as have absorbed the chief columns of the newspapers during the past three weeks. During this period, fresh massacres of the most harrowing description have taken place; the reports concerning them have been relegated to obscure columns, and not a tithe of the readers of our daily newspapers know anything about them. It is time the passion of Europe was re-aroused on behalf of their fellow-Christians who are being rapidly exterminated, so that soon there will be no one left to defend. Nothing worse in the history of Christendom has happened than this deadlock in the cause of humanity. The chief nations of the earth are implicated in the crime, for they might have prevented it. Whichever nation has been the real cause of stumbling, she has added a crime to her account that will be a permanent stain in her national career.

An interesting volume of "Recollections and Suggestions" on the subject of "Sermon Preparation" has been written by various prominent preachers in the Church of England. From it we learn how some of our leading occupants of the pulpit get their discourses ready for the pulpit, and in what spirit they look at the work. One of the most striking remarks is from the pen of Rev. Hay Aitken, who insists that preaching should always "mean business." "Have your point well in view from the first; grow towards your point; press your point; expect to carry your point." This is admirable, and should be learnt by heart and practised by everyone whose business it is to endeavour to persuade men of the truth. There are sermons that make us wonder why they were ever delivered. They are full of power, but it is vague and scattered. A discourse should never be an exhibition of fencing skill; it should thrust with the naked point, and always aim at a vital part. In his combat with souls the preacher should never cry nor give quarter.

Rev. A. R. Buckland, whose lambent humour plays so happy a part in his own sermons, passes severe stricture on the quality of the average church sermon. He says, "If the sermon were a novelty proposed for the first time to be used in our churches, it would utterly fail, in a large number of cases, to vindicate its right to live;" suggesting that the pulpit, like some men, tends to live on its reputation, and the memory of past triumph. But Mr. Buckland is just as hard on the average hearer. He is not helpful to his preacher; often he is ostentatiously inattentive; and some "regular church-goers have become cruelly expert in keeping an aspect of serious attention when their thoughts are far away." Strange sights are sometimes seen in looking from the pulpit, as well as in looking at it! Preachers and hearers are meant to be mutually helpful in the service: the one to give, the other to receive, at his best. This is the secret of happy and successful ministries—earnest waiting on God in both pulpit and pew, resulting in well-prepared and telling appeals on the one side; and on the other, the listening of a "good and true heart," that is as deep soil for the seed.

"Why do the wicked prosper?" was a question which greatly exercised the minds of many Old Testament saints, but no echo of it is heard among the saints of the New Testament. Why this difference? Was it not because Jesus had lived, had brought life and immortality to light, had in Himself shown how glorious is poverty which is full of love to God and man, and had made the things of this life appear small and trifling because the things of the eternal life are so great and precious? Men overestimate the present when they leave out the future. But so real and so blessed was the glory of life with Christ to the early Christians that they welcomed poverty and pain and persecution for his sake. Has not that future life lost some of its power in these days even in the Churches?

We pass through periods of fear and doubt for many reasons. Some we cannot help; we must bear them as we can, by God's help. Ill-health, the disappointment that comes of frustrated aims, the penalty that clings to temperament and constitutional moods—all these have to be faced as part of our lot, and we must make the best of them. But there are other causes that are avoidable. Many of the most trying and terrible hours of gloom are due to the fact that we live in the lowlands of spiritual life. And the lowlands are the home of fog and cold and narrow horizons. The remedy is to rise to a higher level. As Sir Arthur Helps wisely puts it, "Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist, but by ascending a little we may often look over it altogether." The cross is planted on a hill, and on the top of Calvary there are never any mists to obstruct the vision of God, to see whom is to be above all shadows.

The great enemy of faith is not the doubt that comes from a thirst for reasonable proof of that which faith believes in, but the flippancy that writes "not proven" on everything that eludes the crude tests of the senses. There are thousands who have discarded Christianity, not because they have studied its evidences, and found them wanting, but because they have looked at them with a passing glance, and then passed by with a sneer. There is no scepticism so deadly as that which doubts because it does not wish to believe. And there is nothing that so destroys the texture of the spiritual nature. It is like one of those acids that gives a polished surface to a corroded metal, and all the while is eating away into its substance and destroying it. Let us deal earnestly and honestly with our doubts. Then we shall turn them into materials and aids of faith.

On Monday last, The Daily Chronicle, under the heading of the "Sermon of the week," reported a discourse delivered at the Roman Catholic Pro-Cathedral, by Rev. Michael Fanning, "Administrator," or Dean, of the Cathedral. The illustrations of our Lord's humility furnished by his early life, were regarded as foreshadowing "that hidden life which He deigns to live with us now in the Holy Sacrament." The preacher pleaded for more "visits to the Holy Sacrament," and asked, "How can we complain of the unbeliever while we stay away from that attraction which He himself supplies in the Holy Sacrament?"

It is characteristic of these days that Christianity should be confused with Popery, and that daily newspapers should make little or no distinction between the Protestantism which our forefathers maintained, and the Romanism which they resisted unto blood. Popery is no longer dreaded in the land as it used to be. It is secretly working itself into the life and thought of the people, and the daily Press too often helps to popularise its doctrines. Protestants need to be awakened to more earnest effort in counteracting Rome's deadly error. There is need for a sound of alarm, and for more definite teaching from platform and pulpit.

We may take it as a grim fact that about forty persons die of starvation every year in London. So far as can be ascertained, the majority of them are cases of misfortune, not of crime. Not a few are well-educated persons, who, through age and infirmities, have failed to obtain employment, and also have been unwilling to reveal their distress. They have struggled along on dwindling means, and then succumbed out of sheer exhaustion. We may condemn them for false pride, but if thousands who ought to maintain themselves had pride enough to refuse public aid, there would be less chance of the worthy suffering. The last touch of pathos in these deaths is that few of them would have happened if the truth about the sufferers had been known.

When we see, as we often do, well-dressed men staggering along the streets of a wealthy London suburb, we think that the reproach of drunkenness rests on other than the working classes. The victims are in all classes. According to a committee of the British Medical Association appointed to inquire into the subject, it appears that while the labouring and artisan classes lose 10, 9, and 13 per cent. respectively through drunkenness, the independent classes lose upwards of 20, the mercantile classes 13, and the tradesmen 16 per cent. From all this it would appear that the more money and the more leisure any class has, the more drunkenness there will be in it. This effectually disposes of the oft-repeated saying, that drunkenness has ceased to be seen among gentlemen; it may not be so common among them as it once was, but they still are the worst offenders.

Flashes of memory are quite as remarkable as flashes of thought; new thoughts come in them. So Peter found when the Holy Ghost was given to Cornelius and his household. "Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that He said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." The words explained the event and the event the words. Down in our memories there should be words of our Lord, which may prove of priceless worth at critical moments of our lives, when they will be remembered for counsel, for warning, for comfort, for instruction. One of the works of the Holy Spirit is to aid memory, is to speak to us like a friend who says. "Do you not remember?" And when he reminds us of old words, they come with a new meaning. Peter knew for the first time that the Spirit was given to the Gentiles, a revelation which wrought a moral revolution.

Weep Not.

The Lord said unto her, "Weep not."

WEEP not for the dead in Christ,
For the dear ones called away
From the toilsome paths of the darksome earth
To the courts of endless day.

From the weary flesh set free,
With its trammels, toil, and pain;
In the beauty clothed of that heavenly youth,
That for ever shall remain.

They shall walk the golden floor
In their shining robe of light,
With the starry crown that the Master gives
To the victors from the fight.

They shall serve no more on earth;
Nor bend to the chastening rod;
But be crowned as kings; and for ever reign
In the Kingdom of our God.

If they by their earthly toil,
Had to fame or success attained,
Then our hearts rejoiced, and were glad to know
That their due reward was gained.

But who may the honours tell?
What tongue can the joys rehearse
Of the great eternal central sphere
Of the starry universe?

Where the angel harps resound,
And the hallelujahs ring,
And the gathering host of the blood redeemed,
Rejoice to behold their King.

Then why should we weep for those
Who the crown of life have won;
Who have heard the words that for aye shall sound
The Master's great "Well done"?

An Anti-Saloon Convention at Washington has resulted in the formation of an American Anti-Saloon League. The constitution expresses as the object of the League the suppression of the saloon, and for this purpose invites alliance of all in harmony with that object, and pledges absolute neutrality with regard to political parties on all questions of public policy not directly and immediately concerned with the liquor traffic.

Manchester.—The annual prayer and praise meeting of the Manchester Women's Christian-Temperance Association and Police-court Mission was held on the 8th inst., and was remarkably well attended, the room being full to overflowing. Addresses were delivered by Miss Roberts, of Tientsin, China, and Rev. F. Wainwright, vicar at Altrincham. Those present will not soon forget the helpful and stimulating words to which they listened and went forth encouraged for the work of 1896.

By MR. GEORGE MÜLLER.

"I love the Lord because He hath heard my voice and my supplications."—Psa. cxvi. 1.

PRAYER AND FAITH is my universal remedy for every difficulty, and always in the end I have success. I expect never to be left or forsaken by my Eternal Friend. The more we realise we are one with Christ, not only in obtaining forgiveness of sin, but as regenerated and on the way to glory, the more we can trust Him for everything. However important prayer for funds may be, it is still more important to pray for God's blessing to be given; for we may circulate tracts to any extent, but without God's blessing it would be of no use. Therefore, if any are led to begin either to a small or large extent to distribute tracts, see to it that this work is watered by prayer; thus God will own it and it will not be in vain.

One tract may be used for the good of many with his blessing, while a thousand may be no good without it. A tract which had been thrown away was lying in the dirt in a roadway, when a gentleman who was passing put out his stick and picked it up. This was the means of his conversion, while he was afterwards used of God as the means of the conversion of many. In my own experience I have met with thousands of cases within the last fifty years, in which God has worked through the circulation of tracts, and I commend it to you as a work within the reach of every one of us.

The distribution of tracts, as one of the branches of the Scriptural Knowledge Institution, began in a very small way; so did the orphan work. My heart yearned for children bereft of both parents, but for years it was only a wish that I could help them. At last a particular case occurred—a little boy, who was one of our Sunday scholars, lost both parents, and was removed to the Union, so that he could no longer come to our schools or chapel. I heard about this from his grandparents, and I said, "If I had an Orphans' Home here is just a suitable case." But this was a weighty matter, for my hands were full of other work. I determined to commence in dependence on God, trusting Him that if He would have me do this He would give me helpers as well as necessary funds. The day after it was known that I was going to begin a little Orphan Home, a German missionary staying at my house gave the first shilling. The day following I received a shilling and a second-hand wardrobe. Meanwhile, I went on praying five to ten times daily, and when a knock came to the door, or a delivery of letters, I expected a gift, and I received articles of furniture and donations of 5s. or more.

At the end of five days a brother gave me a few articles of furniture, and was the bearer of £100 from a poor seamstress. I said I could not accept it, knowing her circumstances, for she was only earning about 3s. 6d. per week by her needle. I, therefore, sent for her, and said:—"I fear you have hastily offered this £100 for the little Orphan Home; you are poor yourself, and your health is not good." She replied: "I have been very poor, but I have had some money left me by my father, who has recently died, and I have received £480, and out of that I give you £100." Her two sisters and brother, who had received a like sum under their father's will, had given to their mother £50 each, but she felt that she ought, as a Christian, to give double as much as they, and she had therefore given £100 to her mother. Her father had left debts which his children were not obliged to pay, but her brother and sisters had proposed to pay the creditors five shillings in the pound, which they had gladly accepted; but she said, "Though my father did not do as he should, I will pay the balance of twenty shillings in the pound," which was over £40. Then I said, "This is all very good, but you are very weak, and will only have a very little to live upon." She answered, "I shall never regret it. What has my Saviour done for me; and to show you with what delight I give this £100, I also give £5 extra for the poor of the church." I blessed and praised God, and it was the greatest encouragement to go on praying.

While I was praying that God would guide, I came, in the course of my reading, to Ps. lxxxi. 10, "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it." I now prayed for a house and for £1000, and from that time day by day money came in, and in time a house was obtained, furniture for the house, clothing for thirty children, and necessary helpers were also found. And then how small was this beginning compared with the Homes for 2050 on Ashley Down.

Are we Getting the Best?

By REV. J. R. MILLER, D.D.

THERE is no doubt that we live below our privileges as Christians. There are treasures in our spiritual inheritance uncovered by us, heights of joy and good unattained. We do not get from our faith in Christ all that we might get. We do not begin to exhaust the possibilities of blessing and of growth in grace.

For one thing, we do not find the best things there are in the Bible. The finest gold lies deep and has to be digged for. It is hidden in the rocks, and has to be quarried out. We will never get the best the Bible has to give us until we learn to search through its chapters as the miner searches with pick, hammer, shovel, and lamp, in the dark mines, for the precious treasure that is concealed there.

One of the secrets of a strong Christian life is daily feeding upon the Word of God. The Bible contains God's bread for God's children. Bible-fed Christians are godlike men and women. It is great thinking that produces great character, and he who makes the Bible his daily meditation learns to think over God's thoughts.

We are not getting the best from our praying. It was the Master who said, "Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door, and pray to thy Father which is in secret." There we may open our heart to God. We never can speak the things of our innermost life in public prayer. Secret prayer is the communing of the individual soul with God. Here it is that godly men and women get their shining faces, the light that breaks through their tears, the strength that makes them victorious in temptation, the power that fits them for Christian work and Christlike serving. The closet of prayer is the holy of holies of each Christian life. The blessing we may receive there is simply immeasurable. "All empty handed came I in; full handed forth I go; Go thou beside me, Lord of grace, and keep me ever so. Thanks are poor things for such wide good; but all my life is thine; Thou hast turned my stones to bread, my water into wine."

We do not get the best possible out of our church life. The Church brings heaven down to earth. It keeps alive in this world the love, the grace, the beauty of God. Our Sabbaths are oases, where we may drink of the pure water that flows from the heavenly mountains, and eat of the fruits that grow on the trees of God, and thus be prepared to go out into the world for a six days' journey over the hot sands.

We go out every morning to trudge over desert paths. We should be sure that on the Sabbath we make preparations that shall not fail us on the journey. Mere idle rest will not give it to us. We cannot get it from the Sunday newspaper, from mere literary books, or from studying works of art. But if we turn our faces to God's house on God's day, and commune with Him, filling our vessels of faith and love with the water of life, we shall not faint by the way.

The things we get from the church are the lasting things. One writes of listening to the brawl of London streets and Parliament houses until he grew weary and sick of the emptiness. Then he went out of the city to watch the darkening even, and to seek the touch of the sweet airs of heaven. He writes:

"Half a mile on, a sudden song,
Mounting above, in a girl's sweet breath,
Brought me to pause, and I caught the words,
'Victory, victory over death!'
From a little chapel so deep in green,
The psalm was heard ere the place was seen.
'These be the things that last,' I said.
Shadows we are that shadows pursue,
Triumph and weep over vanities,
Strut and fret and make much ado.
Verily, Christ, as He did say,
'Is with two or three who meet to pray.'
So, while the people sang and prayed,
'These be the things that endure,' I said."

We need the church. It is never easy to live in this world. In the quietest day there are cares which tend to fret us and break our peace. Business has its temptations, and it is hard always to live out of Christ's teachings in our shops, stores, and offices. Home life, with its household tasks and its cares and anxieties, wears heavily on the heart's sensitiveness. To many the day brings discouragements, disheartenments, and sorrows. But it is possible to get into our souls in God's house such inspiring hopes, such uplifting joys that all the week, in the dust and toil, heavenly songs shall sing in our bosoms. We rob our lives when we fail to use the privileges which the Church brings within our reach.

We do not make the most and the best possible of our life in the work of Christ. The possibilities of Christian ministry are incalculable. For example, the influence that a true home exerts on its inmates is beyond measure. A Christian man who had long been engaged in useful service tells of a visit to his old home. He was put to sleep in the spare room. He opened a closet door, and a scene was before him which brought a rush of tears to his eyes. An old chair stood there, and before it lay a cushion, in which were deep knee-prints. Evidently this was some one's closet of prayer. Instantly the truth flashed upon him. He was looking into the secret sanctuary of his beloved mother, where she had prayed all her children into the kingdom of Christ. What a holy place it was! What would be the result if every Christian home in the world had such a holy of holies, its old chair daily wet with tears of love, and its cushion deeply indented by suppliant knees!

Every individual Christian is the centre of a circle whose hearts He may touch with a benediction of love. He is a custodian of blessing which He is to impart to others. The noblest life is the one that is given up most unselfishly to serving.

Think what kind of a Christian he would be who should realise all the possibilities of faith in Christ and truly find the best things in all life's ways.—Christian Intelligencer.

Rallying Points.

III.—COMMUNION.

"LET US draw near."—Heb. x. 22.

COULD we presume to utter a rallying cry like this if we had not the Divine warrant? But the warrant we have; the Lord Jehovah has Himself said, "Come ye near unto Me" (Isa. xlviii. 16).

Unable of ourselves to interpret such words—for the finite mind cannot rightly grasp the ineffable grace and condescension of the Infinite—He has further taught us that it is "through Christ" that they who aforetime were "far off" are "brought nigh." The Blood of Jesus is the one thrice-blessed passport to the near place of privilege. Apart from this we could not venture nearer than did the awe-struck multitude who on Sinai's slopes trembled with fear lest the anger of God should break forth upon them.

Unspeakably great our privileges, who, sheltered by the cross of Christ, and accepting our position as identified with Him, can sing:—

So near, so very near O God—
More near we cannot be,
For in the person of his Son
We are as near as He.

And yet, while professing entire belief in God's assurances about this, how slow we are to "draw near"! How much we need to urge each other to take full possession of the place He has given us.

These words, "Let us draw near," may have a primary reference to the priesthood of believers. It was only the high priest who had access to the holiest of all! and the apostle may have meant to remind us that it is as "a kingdom of priests" (Rev. i. 5), we have peculiar title now to that most sacred place of nearness. There is wondrous sweetness in this thought, as indeed there is in the consideration of the whole subject of priesthood, from the New Testament standpoint.

Equally blessed is the remembrance that, as children of God, too, we are invited to "draw near." A powerful passage in Dr. Moule's "Grace and Godliness," so illuminates and emphasises this point that I cannot forbear to quote it:—

"In grace, in Christ, as vivified and raised in Him, we are indeed, as to the Father, 'children,' 'dear children.'... So to Him, as to our very Father, in a sense of that word as intense as it is definite, we have 'introduction' (Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12). He welcomes our inmost approaches, behind all scenes of outward life. He meets us and listens to us, not only as a Sovereign on some day of state receives his peers, and perhaps his children among them, to an intercourse elaborate, limited, reserved because of its very pomp; but rather as that same Sovereign in the recesses of home life and love clasps his children to his heart, and hears all they have to say, and gives them an affection no longer hampered in its exercise, but quickened in its pulse and joy by the fact of his royalty and theirs." (page 104).

We need to recognise, what it is so difficult to comprehend, that the interchange of confidences and affections is not only our own unspeakable joy, but is also a joy to Him; that we rob Him of his rightful due, and, even more, of his peculiar "portion," when we withhold aught of what He values so highly.

"Give Me thine heart" is his one chief request. It is not our intellect that He asks for; it is not for our service that He sues—though, of course, true discipleship implies and includes the yielding of every power to Him, whose we are, and whom we serve—but it is for our love that He pleads.

"Lovest thou Me?" is still the one demand to which He must have an answer.

"I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals," is the message He would still send to those who have forgotten their "first love."

And the impelling motive to our sluggish heart remains unchanged. "We love Him because He first loved us" (1 John iv. 19).

Thy heart is opened wide,
It's offered love most free,
That heart to heart I may abide,
And hide myself in Thee.
Ah! how thy love doth burn
Till I that love return;
I would love Thee as Thou lovest me,
O Jesus, most desired.

Let us not, then, regard the rallying cry here, "Let us draw near with a true heart," as being wholly, or chiefly, a summons to prayer, although this is included. It is, besides, a call to that intimate and abiding communion with God, which, "in full assurance of faith," recognises his delight in our confidences; as well as his readiness to grant our petitions. Let us take it as the charter of our freedom to dwell "in the secret place of the Most High," as the alluring signal to heights and depths of fellowship unknown before, but which are indeed ours as we claim them by simple faith. "God... hath quickened us together with Christ,... and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 4–6). One dear old Christian said, when spoken to of the joy of the eternal home with Him—probably so near, "I am in heaven now."

"Oh, yes," urged the visitor, "but I mean when you leave the body, and are at home for ever."

She smiled as she replied, "I dwell there."

"But you do not quite understand me. I mean, what will it be to be really there, and sing the new song?"

"I sing there every night," was the quiet response, for the presence of Jesus made her days as the "days of heaven upon earth."

LUCY A. BENNETT.

The Ethics of Buddhism.

CONSIDERING the position which some claim for the Buddhist writings, it is certainly not without ample reason that the subject of the derivation of the ethics of Buddhism was taken up at last week's meeting of the Victoria Institute. Its consideration was introduced in a paper, the author of which referred to the frequency with which moral precepts, often similar to those in Holy Writ, were quoted as from Buddhist writings, this being very often done by Theosophists and others who sought to minimise the value of the Christian Scriptures. The question, therefore, arose, Were these precepts to be found in the earlier Buddhist writings, and, if not original, whence were they derived?

A careful examination of the Buddhist writings, and of the Old Testament, showed that every valuable moral precept inculcated by Buddha or his followers was freely taught by Moses and the prophets centuries before Buddha existed; and this was scarcely to be wondered at, considering the light which had been thrown of late on the extent to which nations in earlier days had intercommunication. The ethics of Buddhism were evidently derived from nations with whom the inhabitants of India had commercial and other relations, including the Jewish, which was in its greatest prosperity 500 years before Buddha was said to have existed; and also later, when the captivity took place, and there arose a tendency towards the dispersal of that people.

Attention was drawn to the evidence given by Strabo and other ancient writers to the great commercial intercourse existing in the tenth century B.C. between India, Persia, Parthia, Media, and the countries south of the Euxine, as well as the traffic by sea which recent research has shown to have existed, and was carried on from India, round Ceylon, and up the Red Sea, the ships being mostly manned by those intrepid mariners the Phœnicians.

Life in Cliff College.

CLIFF COLLEGE, on the elevated slope of the Derbyshire moors, is the home of a large family, from forty to fifty young students, who, under the care of the principal, Rev. J. F. T. Hallows, are preparing to carry the Gospel to those who have never heard the glad sound. The earnestness, the singleness of purpose of teachers and learners alike, are most striking, as is the happy home spirit, the joyous gladness of those who have counted the cost, and given themselves to God's service. To this delightful home I have recently paid a week's visit.

The College is a branch of the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, Harley House, Bow. Forty or fifty students are always at Cliff, sent down after passing a time of probation at Harley House. Their mornings are spent under able tuition, in Biblical studies, Greek, church history, and theology. After mid-day dinner they disperse to work in house, farm, and garden, to prepare them for life in undeveloped countries. Then comes tea and three hours more study. In all this is seen the shrewd practical wisdom of Dr. and Mrs. Gratian Guinness, who together founded this great enterprise; which takes and trains suitable young men gratuitously for mission work, and which has already sent nearly 800 missionaries to distant lands.

There are many interesting details in the work and daily life, such as the gathering for prayer each morning, so unlike the ordinary formal family prayers, when Principal J. F. T. Hallows reads and explains some difficult passage of Holy Writ, and the students themselves give voice in prayer to their own and their brethren's needs; the monthly missionary meeting, when neighbours far and near are bidden to come and hear all that is being learnt in the College of the needs of the dark parts of the earth; the meals, in which the students wait on and serve one another with a skill and cheeriness which speaks well for their adaptability; the outgoing each Sunday to help at church, chapel, and Sunday school for miles around; these are all impressive and interesting sights.

There is the "Summer School," too, when the College, being empty of its students, is thrown open to Christian workers, who come to enjoy its beautiful surroundings, its social life, the health-giving air, and the theological lectures and spiritual communion offered to them under the guidance of Dr. Harry Guinness.

The interesting monthly magazine, Regions Beyond, tells, with intimate knowledge, great literary clearness, and artistic beauty, the story of this great work and its needs—how everyone with money or with leisure can help by prayer, by sympathy, and by material gifts. This, with other information, can be had on application to Harley House, Bow, E.

I am thankful for having been led, even for a brief space, from the tumult, the toil, the conflicting needs of a great city, to the recreating, reviving atmosphere of this exalted spot. In such an atmosphere, among such workers, one is lifted higher. One's needs, one's hindrances, one's blessings and privileges are transfigured, and one's eyes opened to see things earthly and things heavenly in a new light. In a spirit of deepest humility and earnest resolve for the future we confess, "Lord, it is good to have been here."

Ross Bible Carriage.—The report of this mission shows that open-air preaching; house to house visitation, Bible carriages and tent work has been carried on vigorously in towns and villages in the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Hereford. Good winter missions have also been held. The itinerations of the Bible carriage have awakened great interest in places out of the track of ordinary Gospel work. The director is Mr. John Coates, Northleigh, Cantilupe-road, Ross, Hereford.

To Help Armenia.

THERE was a time in the development of the Armenian question when we were advised and ordered to await the result of investigations, negotiations, and also the European concert, etc., though all the friends of Armenia were convinced of the barrenness of these negotiations, and of the lack of real European cohesion. They waited, and are looking in impatient indignation on the process of extermination going on in Armenia. The public is now anxiously waiting to see something done which shall close this painful chapter in history. The difficulty seems to be to devise the best method of doing something. All suggestions of methods, practical and effective, towards inducing the Powers to act will be welcomed. In this connection we venture to make a few suggestions, hoping that they may meet the kind consideration of some of the leaders of public opinion. In order to know what there is to be done, we must first know the exact situation of affairs at the present time.

I. The Powers of Europe are not ready to do anything worth mentioning. Inactivity characterises their attitude. If there is any agreement between the Powers, it is one of non-intervention. So that if we wait in this way we shall see nothing except—to use Mr. Gladstone's expression—"the Sultan triumphant in his dark designs against the Armenians."

II. England is unable or unwilling to act alone in the matter of compelling the Sultan to reform. She, or those in power, are afraid that her single-handed interposition will be met by active opposition on the part of the other Powers, and that this will lead to complications. Therefore, there is not much hope that the appeals made exclusively to the British Government will succeed in inducing them to energetic action, unless some extraordinary pressure be brought to bear upon them. Some basis of operation must be found that will be more powerful than this cold diplomacy, and more far-reaching than one country—simply England.

Now it seems to me that the Church can afford all the necessary elements for the basis of operation just needed. The Church of Christ, as such, must take the matter in hand, and push it forward with combined action. We acknowledge with thanks the active part taken by many ministers and churches in the matter, but salvation will come only by combined action of the whole Church. Every section of the Church has its own representative. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the President of the Wesleyan Conference, the Presidents and Secretaries of the Congregational and Baptist Unions, the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, and others, could come together and devise means and methods of moving the whole body of the Church to such a pitch that no Government would ever dare to resist. In every section of the Church there are organisations that can help in the work and whose co-operation can be secured, such as the various missionary societies. Then there are other religious and semi-religious bodies, as the Peace Society, Salvation Army, Friends' Society, Evangelical Alliance, the Sunday School Unions, Y.M.C.A.'s and Y.W.C.A.'s, and the Christian Endeavour, all of whom should be willing to help. Then, widening the sphere of their operations, they could invite the churches of other countries to join them—United States and Germany at least. The Archbishop of Canterbury in his Christmas sermon showed great sympathy with the Armenians. Many other bishops did the same; and, if asked, would probably join in an effort on their behalf.

No one ignores the difficulties of such a union. There is no need to enumerate them. But if churches cannot unite in such a cause of pure charity and love, how can they condemn the disunion of the Powers, and their jealousies one against another?

Once such an agreement among the churches and their leaders, among the various religious bodies, associations, and agencies formed, they could decide upon their line of conduct. Prayer-meetings, contributions, efforts public and private on a gigantic scale throughout Christendom, would follow at once, and the respective Governments of the three countries at least will be compelled by the cry of the peoples and by the pressure of their best subjects to combine their efforts also in their turn and bring the recalcitrant Sultan to reason and obedience.

If the deliverance of the sepulchre of Christ was worthy of an army of Crusaders, surely the suffering Church of Armenia, part of the body of Christ, is worthy of an army of unarmed volunteers, not less determined to bring about the deliverance of suffering Christianity in Turkey; and thus secure the triumph of the grand idea of the Crusade in a more peaceful way, and the solution of the quarrel between the Cross and the Crescent. If our forefathers were willing to give their lives, will their descendants prove so degenerate that they will not even consecrate and combine their energy, thought, and prayer in the same cause? Will they remain content with standing coldly by and merely condemning the deeds? The very existence of such a gigantic combination ought to be sufficient to induce the Governments to action. "If only there were a leader," I often hear people cry; "O for a Cromwell!" My cry is rather, "O for a Samuel in the Church of God to lead the people of God to victory!"

A Parsee Christian Association.

DEAR SIR,—It may interest your readers to hear of the Parsee Christian Association which has recently been formed, and which has its headquarters in Bombay. It has been felt by some of the Parsee converts residing here that a bond of union among them is needed, and that if all Parsee Christians throughout the world will unite in one Association it will be a source of strength to them and an encouragement to others to join the Christian Church. With this object as many as were able have met together in Bombay, and formed themselves into an Association, of which Rev. Dhaujibhoy Nowroji, minister of the Free Church of Scotland in Bombay, has been elected president.

They now wish to invite all Parsee Christians, of whatever denomination, to join them. Members are requested to pray, unitedly or separately, for one another, to correspond with the secretary, and to endeavour to influence other Parsees for good by every means in their power. As there is now a considerable Parsee community in England, and many of those who are resident there have been baptized, we hope for some accession to our members from among them. Our numbers are at present small, but include almost every one of the Parsee Christians in India. Within the last six months five new converts have been baptized in Bombay, and there are encouraging signs which point to the prospect of larger numbers entering the fold of Christ.—Yours truly,

R. S. RUSTOMJEE MISTRY, Hon. Secretary.
Bombay.

From a Reader.—A Professor at the Seminary of the D.R. Church at Stellenbosch (of which the Rev. A. Murray is one of the curators), writes to us as follows:—"Allow me to say that I have taken in THE CHRISTIAN for years, that I knew it as The Revival, that it is a welcome friend, with its inspiring messages and its testimony in the direction of righteousness and godliness. In many a Dutch home your paper is read and appreciated, and we of the Dutch Reformed Church owe you a debt of gratitude."

Deaconesses' Institution.

THE Evangelical Protestant Deaconesses' Institution and Training Hospital, Tottenham, is familiar to our readers in connection with Dr. Laserson, its founder, who passed to his rest in April, 1894, after having been director for twenty-five years. The chief object of this institution is the training of Christian women on Evangelical Protestant principles for Christian work, district visiting, attending the sick poor, and holding Bible classes; also the training of such as are suited for the calling, as nurses, with the end in view that the souls of the patients are to be cared for as well as the bodies. The work is unique in this country, and only in Germany are there institutions of a similar kind.

There are now in connection with the parent house, at Tottenham, fifteen out-stations, with twenty-six sisters working in Sunderland, Harrogate, Cork, Dublin, Scarborough, Newcastle, Woodford, Rochdale, Stedham, France, Jerusalem, and Sierra Leone.

In the Hospital itself there are now thirty-four sisters; or sixty-one in all giving themselves to the service of God among the sick and suffering poor. The evangelistic work goes on well. The Sunday evening service is still continued, also Sunday-school and Bible-classes.

The waiting-room affords an opportunity for having a short service with the out-patients, whilst those lying in the wards have time to ponder over the portions of God's Word read to them, and many entering the Institution apparently careless and indifferent, have left it trusting in Christ.

In the Hospital attached to the Parent Institution, the sisters have abundant opportunities for gaining the necessary knowledge to make them efficient in their nursing capacity. Owing to the enormous increase in the population of Tottenham and neighbourhood, the hospital work is becoming more and more essential.

Col. E. Swinton Skinner, of the Indian Staff Corps, who was appointed director in November last, has occupied high and responsible positions in India. Joining the Indian Army in 1860, he entered in 1880 the Judge Advocate General's Department. Last June he vacated his post, according to the rules of the service. During his stay in India he took an active part in missionary, Bible, and Gospel work, and on his return home did good service at Eastbourne and Blackheath.

The lady superintendent is still Miss Dundas, who, as Sister Christian, has for twenty-three years been widely known for her valuable service. The consulting medical staff now consist of two physicians, Dr. Gilbert Smith and Dr. Percy Kidd, and two surgeons, Dr. Lichenberg and Mr. J. Langston, F.R.C.S. During the last few years of Dr. Laserson's life, owing to illness, he was unable to devote all his energies to the work, and the subscriptions fell off. On his death there was found to be a debt of about £2065. This increased to nearly £3000 during the following year. This debt, through the kindness of a friend of the Institution (on the security of a reversionary legacy of £4000 bequeathed to the Institution) will be soon paid off. The council have for the past year been most active and diligent, and have met weekly to examine the accounts, and the weekly bills have by the goodness of our Heavenly Father been, as a rule, settled.

Still the Hospital suffers much from lack of funds, and two wards, containing fourteen beds, are closed. Tottenham itself is unable to support the Institution, the usefulness of which reaches out far beyond the district, and forms a strong claim upon the support of Christians generally. It looks to the Lord's people for support, and in this it will surely not be disappointed. The difficulties have lately been many and grave, but God has heard and answered prayer, and doubtless He will incline many to aid this valuable Institution. The address is the Deaconesses' Institution, Tottenham.

National Crises and Missions.

By DR. GEORGE SMITH, EDINBURGH.*

FROM East and West and South there are coming to us, at this opening of the year, such wars and rumours of war that I propose to strike the keynote of the meeting to-night by applying the historical spirit to missions during the last century, and asking, in the light of the great events that are happening now around us, and that happened at the beginning of the century, what lessons the century has for us, and what duty is laid upon us as we enter, under very similar circumstances, upon its successor.

Two thousand five hundred years ago two prophets of the Old Testament laid down the great historical truth which has ever since been seen working out in the history of missionary Christianity. In Isa. lx., and especially in the four short but pregnant prophecies of Haggai a little later, you have a wonderful declaration from the mouth of God Himself spoken by these prophets, and as true to-night as when the message was given—"I will shake all nations," followed by the glorious announcement, "The desire of all nations shall come." Whether you take that word "the desire of all nations" as in our Authorised Version, or whether, with riper Hebrew scholars, as "the desirable things of all nations," as described in Isa. lx., the result is the same. You may take both meanings as we look back on the past century. Soon after these words were spoken by the Holy Ghost, a great missionary work began in the shaking of the nations. The first century of missionary Christianity, begun in the fulness of time by the Lord Jesus Christ coming to his temple, was preceded and brought about by such great historical facts as these—Alexander the Great and his successors carrying the Greek language and literature (soon after to be the language of the New Testament) all over the civilised world, and right into what is now the British Empire of India. Following that you have the great Roman power—the power of law, of organisation, of order, to which the English-speaking peoples have succeeded, and which we use to civilise the rest of the world, or at least its brown and its dark races. These two great processes went on and prepared the fulness of the time when the Lord Jesus Christ Himself came. He passed on the message in perhaps the most terrible description which ever proceeded from his gracious lips, "When ye shall hear of wars and commotions be not terrified. . . . When these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh."

Did Isaiah and Haggai and our Lord Himself, of whom they spake, speak only for their own age? No prophet did that. I want you for a little to apply their teaching and that of the great Prophet Jesus Christ, the Son of God, to our nineteenth century—the missionary century of which so much has been said in recent times. What was the beginning of all this work on which we are congratulating ourselves—only I trust because it is still the day of small things and a basis, a point from which to start something greater? We find it in the shaking first of our own nation. That shaking began in troubles with our children beyond the seas. For the great missionary work, which we rejoice now to carry on all over the world, was brought about by the American War of Independence. Never was there a war that did so much alike for the victors and the vanquished. We were vanquished then, and we ought to have been; we should never have fought that war. But, in the providence of God, we became two nations instead of one. The forces of Christianity were doubled. We left our American children to themselves, and proceeded to do—what? To found that great British Empire upon which we not only congratulate ourselves, but in which our American brethren, speaking the same language, have worked with us—yea, in some cases more than we—in bringing the peoples to Christ. If America had not been cut off from us in that way, we should have been hampered, and should never have had the power and the unity of action which Providence gave us in the working out of this Empire, which we hold in trust as a missionary people.

Then came the second great shaking of the nations in the French Revolution. That event is generally considered by historians to have been even more mighty in its issues than the American War. That great upheaval which shook the nations of Europe, again shook us and shook America, until new institutions were brought to the birth, new churches, new societies, and new laws. Liberty and reform spread over at least a great part of Europe. It was out of the womb of those great events that modern missions sprang. As the result of those tremendous shakings, brought missions to the birth and carried them on during the first half of the 19th century. I mention these four, not because there are not many, in some senses, as great missionaries, but because it seems to me that they made the epoch which brought about the prosperity and extension of missions as we have them now.

CAREY, of course, was the first. Said Charles Grant, the great East India director, when writing to Charles Simeon, "I had great designs for our church in India, but you would not listen to me. I asked for eight men from Cambridge in 1786, but you would not send them. So Providence has reserved the honour of evangelising India for the Baptists." What Carey did for Asia is well known; for it was not to India alone that he went. He translated the Bible into the language of every race in South Asia which did not already possess one. I suppose the only respectable translation at the time was the great Tamil version of the German missionaries. What Carey did in his preaching and teaching work, in his medical work, through his college, trying every educational and evangelising method and working them out, I need not describe.

Then there came his young friend, HENRY MARTYN; his neighbour living in an old pagoda, which I am sorry to hear is now falling into the mud of the river Hooghly. His work was to complete what Carey left, because the latter could not do everything, and he knew that the young Anglican chaplain was the man to do it, with a scholarship greater than his own, and with the culture which Cambridge gave to Martyn, though no university ever gave it to Carey. Martyn's special glory (and no one comes near him in modern times) was the work for Mohammedans in India. His first convert was the first native missionary to the Mohammedans ever ordained; he was afterwards ordained by Bishop Heber as a minister of the Church of England. It was not in India alone that Martyn worked for the Mohammedans, but in Arabia, which was the goal of his ambition, and in Persia above all. There Henry Martyn's body lies, buried by the Armenian Church at Tocat, and so taking possession of Islam for Christ.

Then came the third man, ALEXANDER DUFF, his specialty being work for the Brahmins. He adopted the educational method which has been copied by every other church and by the Government itself. Thus he educated men who became pastors of churches and missionaries for other societies, and saturated all recent progress with Christian principle.

Before I speak of the fourth man let me say that I remember, when little more than a boy in India in 1853, attending the first of these missionary conferences held by missionaries in Bengal. The spirit of missions had been leaving the churches at home. The shaking of the nations which had begun at the end of the last century, in the middle of this century seemed to have lost its effect.

THE GREAT "FORTY YEARS' PEACE," after the battle of Waterloo, was nearly complete, and the Crimean War had not begun. There seemed to be over all the churches at home, and over the universities especially (for I went out to India fresh from the Arts course of the University of Edinburgh)—there seemed to be stagnation, certainly there was no progress, in Christian missions. Then came, perhaps, a more terrible shaking of our British nation than even that in the American War of Independence, when the Indian Mutiny of 1857-8 broke out. I suppose it might be said (as it is said in the Old Testament of the plagues sent upon Pharaoh, and of the greatest of them) that there was hardly a home in England or Scotland or Ireland which did not bewail someone dead. Those of us who passed through that Mutiny, or lived on the fringe of it, out in India, believe there never was such a shaking of the Empire as then. We remember how every number of Punch in those days came out to India filled with pictures and verses breathing vengeance. Read the columns of Punch for 1857-8 if you would know how this land was shaken. The literary classes were turned for the time almost into butchers. But then came a reaction. The Churches awoke, and the cry for vengeance took another form—not for more soldiers, more blowing from guns, more hangings, but for missionaries. I remember in 1859-60 how a splendid missionary revival began. New societies came out to us in India, not only from England and Scotland, but from America. The great Methodist Episcopal Church of America sent a man who still lives—Bishop Butler. I remember, almost as a boy, standing by his side when he preached in a great Calcutta church one of those marvellously eloquent sermons that stirred Duff. The American War of Independence and the French Revolution had both spent their force, so far as the churches were concerned, and the Mutiny came. With the Mutiny there appeared

THE FOURTH MAN, DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

Some of us well remember what was the effect when he came home after his first crossing of Africa from the West to the East. In was then, in 1857-8, that he began those wonderful campaigns which swept the whole Continent of Africa right into the missionary field of the churches, so that we had Africa and Asia working together, and the claims of both placed before Christendom in a way they had never been before.

I want now briefly to ask you what have been the results of the work of these four men up to the present time. We should take large views of such questions, and not judge them by the yearly report of our own church or society, or groups of churches and societies, blessed as these are. The first result has not been creditable to the Christian Churches. America and England together have sent only 8000 missionaries, men and women (not counting the wives of missionaries) to all the world. That result is one upon which we can congratulate ourselves if we go back to the beginning of the century; but in the light of the fact that there are 3000 students pledging themselves to go out if asked, it is a fact of which, if it continues much longer, the Church of Christ of all denominations should be most heartily ashamed, and must be penitent.

But the other side of the results is something far greater. How God has answered the prayers of people who have so little faith! The most modest estimate will place the fruit in converts now all over the world—the brown races, the red races, and the black races—at four and a-half millions of more than nominal Christians. From my long residence in the East, and intercourse with missionaries, I should put these four and a-half millions of native Christians before the same number of professing Christians either in this country or in America. One reason is that the native converts are to a large extent persons who have come over from false religions in the face of most tremendous obstacles; having had their faith tested, and having made sacrifices which born Christians, such as we are, can never be called upon to show in these modern times. But the four and a-half millions of native converts all over the world are those only who are alive at the present time. I should like to make a calculation—and I believe it could be done with a little patience—of how many native men and women have come over from the various false faiths to Christ since the year 1800, when Carey led down, in front of the house in which I lived for sixteen years, into the muddy waters of the Hooghly, his first Hindu convert. Let your imagination work through what you know, and you will be able to realise to some extent what a vast procession they form! There is no Vision of Mirza equal to it, because we follow them across the bridge that spans the sluggish stream of death; not into the Hindu heaven or the Buddhist hell, or the abode of demons whither the Animists and other native cults fancy the souls of the departed go. We follow them to the paradise of God and we hear them sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. When I am down-cast about missions, I turn from the living converts of the great organisations and agencies, to the picture which our Lord Himself drew when He said, "Many shall come from the East and from the West, and from the North and from the South, and shall sit down in the kingdom of heaven." These are already "a great multitude of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues" and

NOT A FEW HAVE THE MARTYR'S PALM.

There is one other result; and there, too, your imagination must be allowed to work. When Carey began his press, the Word of God had been translated into, let us say, thirty languages, or at the most thirty-five, including our own English version. To-day more than 365 languages have the Word of God in whole or in part. A language for every day in the year, and the Bible or the New Testament—most certainly the Gospels—in that language! I have sometimes thought that our friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society, or the National Bible Society of Scotland, or the great American Bible Society, should make out a list for us, assigning for every day of the year one of these translations, so that we might learn more of the people and the languages, and pray and work more intelligently for them.

I close with one word as to our duty in the future. I have alluded to the Indian Mutiny. I saw the massacre well at Cawnpore before it was built over. I went round the walls of Delhi, when the skeletons of dead Sepoys were still bleaching in the ravines which our soldiers had held so splendidly by the help of God. But I do not know, if we only had imagination to realise it, that there has ever been anything, even in the Indian Mutiny, like what we now see in Armenia in the wiping out, the extermination, the deliberate murder, not only of a great people, but of a great Church, shall I say of a great religion—certainly of the oldest missionary church in the whole history of Christianity. We have nothing to do with politics here, and we trust our Government, whatever party be in power, as to a foreign policy. But our foreign politics are foreign missions; and if we are truly Christian and intelligent men and women, we read our morning paper, not for foreign politics merely, but to interpret them through foreign missions. I protest to you that in all my life, including the Mutiny, I have never known anything from the human point of view, so sad, so apparently hopeless, because of the friction among the Powers of Europe. I know nothing so terrible as this great Armenian destruction. What does it mean to us? It means that whatever the Powers of Europe may do as to the Sultan of Turkey, that modern Nero, the Church of Christ has got first of all to go to work and bring the Mohammedans into the Kingdom of Christ. Martyn's policy in 1810 has got to be ours as we enter the second missionary century. We have to begin a new crusade. And I would say to these thousand young men and women volunteers whose faces are now looking upon me, if they can go through any church or through no church, as Ion Keith-Falconer and Henry Martyn did—go and work for the Mohammedans. It is to this new crusade that we are called by the shaking of the nations. As we enter upon it, let us develop our work in that direction, more and more, realising from the historical events that are happening around us the old cry of Peter the Hermit, "GOD WILLS IT."

College Life.—6.

By CUTHBERT McEVOY, B.A.,
Classical Tutor of Regent's Park, New, and Hackney Colleges.

CONCLUSION.

FINALLY, let us ever remember that there are hosts of our spiritual ancestry who, in all ages and in all countries, have endured hardship and privation, and have died fearful deaths to hand on to us the cause which we have undertaken. Ignatius is our kinsman, who stood like an anvil when smitten. We can look back to Ridley and Latimer deliberately facing death by burning for our cause. Henry Martyn, who moved manfully through discouragement after discouragement, to his lonely desert death. Moffat, Livingstone, Mackay, Gil-mour, these and many others, high souls, whose mere names are incitements to endurance and self-denial, all these are our spiritual antecedents. And their great work now lies in these hands of ours.

It seems absurd here to urge the paltry martyrdoms of daily life: and yet it is an unmistakable and sorrowful fact that we are in danger of shrinking even from them. Wise economy of strength is often made an excuse for shirking inevitable and necessary discomforts. A continual self-regard makes a man a mollicoddle who is watchful of symptoms, afraid of work, afraid of the weather, and morbidly sensitive to fancied slights. Of such stuff no true ministers nor true missionaries are made. Better a hundred times the reckless physical expenditure of the enthusiast than the pampered health of the effeminate.

"Endure hardness," "Quit you like men," "Take up the cross daily." These are the watch-words of true heroism, and the sacred mandates of our religion. In a ministerial college all the wavering strands of individual manliness should by contact be strengthened and confirmed, and brought, as it were, to a focus of such powerful lustre that any sluggard entering unawares within the circle of its influence should stand rebuked, and either for very shame throw off his drowsiness, or else make place for better men.

Let us convince ourselves that the life upon which we have entered is not a life of ease. It is not a life of quietness, interrupted by occasional toil, but a life of almost continual toil, in which rest sometimes intervenes to brace us for new strife. For

After Christ, work turns to privilege,
And henceforth, one with our humanity,
The six-day worker, working in us still,
Has called us freely to work on with Him
In high companionship.

Be persuaded of the value of your work. Think no part of it unworthy. If you cannot foresee its results, welcome it as a lesson in patience, and be thankful. Allow yourself to be guided wholly by those who direct your work. A teacher is not responsible for one who does not follow him. But the touch of responsibility deepens his interest, and ensures his care. Wrestle chiefly with the difficulties of your work. Do not walk round them and shout victory over that which needs no conquering. If you are as other men you will find, especially as the novelty of work wears off, a growing tendency to content yourself with acquiring a great number of small and easy things rather than a few great and hard things.

The oak that has borne the brunt of tempests becomes part of a nation's bulwarks; your hot-house plant delicately reared, perishes if the door be left ajar:—

Be earnest, earnest, earnest; mad if thou wilt,
Do what thou dost as if the stake were heaven:
And that thy last deed ere the judgment day.
When all's done, nothing's done. There's rest above,—
Below let work be death if work be love!

The pulsations of Christian life should be felt throughout Christendom; most felt in our ministerial colleges—Christendom's heart. Here of all places should be perceptible the pulse of love; not intermittent, but deep, regular, and calm. Here of all places should the closest and sweetest and most lasting friendships be possible—the friendship above all others of fellow travellers in the path of light. At all costs, even at the cost of our poor dignity, ill-feeling must be avoided. A word of conciliation can wipe out in a moment the blot of misunderstanding which a drop of gall might make indelible. Nescit vox missa reverti.

Though your toil may seem now strangely unremunerative, go on with it trustfully and patiently; let difficulties be your spur and not your drag; learn patiently the lessons of defeat, and then forget you were defeated; be methodical; be sympathetic. In all things strive and endure to the uttermost. Thus you may help to make your College a centre of resistless energy and contagious vitality, sending forth from its walls, whether to the exacting work of the English ministry or to the hot desolations of Africa, or to the shallow grounds of India, or to the hard wayside of China, keen minds, undaunted souls, for whom the vision of the life to be is more than the life that is—men who shall not only rank worthily with the noblest heroes of a noble past, but themselves become the inspiration of a greater future.

Our Policemen.

DEAR SIR,—Some of your readers may not be aware that there is (in Adelphi-terrace, Strand) a Police Institute, which occupies somewhat the same place towards our policemen that Miss Daniell's Soldiers' Homes occupy towards the soldiers, or Miss Weston's Sailors' Rests towards our bluejackets.

This institute affords a home to many a young man, who has come from some far-distant country village to join the Metropolitan or City Police Force, and also to the many provincial police-officers who visit London on duty or on leave. Numbers of recruits, or, as they are called, "candidates," for the Metropolitan Police Force, are welcomed at the Institute social evenings and Bible-classes; and many have reason to praise God throughout their life for the start thus made in the Force, and for the loving introduction to the Almighty Friend and Saviour there extended to them.

The Institute is also the headquarters of the International Christian Police Association, which has branches in many of the police forces of the world, and the central office of the Police Convalescent Home and the Provincial Police Orphanage. The whole work (with the exception of the restaurant) is dependent on freewill offerings.

Knowing that the last few months have been a time of unusual pressure financially, as well as remarkable blessing, a generous friend (Mr. J. Cory) has recently given £50, and has been led to offer another £50 in the hope that nine other friends will do likewise, thus making up the sum of £500, which is greatly needed at the present time. Our policemen go through many perils, and encounter many fierce temptations in their work of protecting our lives and property. Should not their spiritual needs be made our care?—Yours faithfully,

CATHERINE GURNEY.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, January 19.

"BECAUSE THOU SERVEDEST NOT THE LORD WITH JOYFULNESS AND WITH GLADNESS OF HEART, THEREFORE SHALT THOU SERVE THINE ENEMIES."—Deut. xxviii. 48.

WE must serve. It is our nature. Our Lord never suggested a third course as an alternative to the service of God or mammon, as though it were possible to escape all service whatsoever. We either yield ourselves servants of righteousness unto holiness, or of iniquity unto iniquity; and to whom we yield ourselves servants to obey, his we are.

It is a solemn thought: if we are not serving God with joyfulness and gladness of heart, we are serving things which are our worst enemies. A man has no worse foe than himself when he lives to serve his own whims and desires. These habits, and appetites, and fashions are luxurious and pleasant just now, but their silken cords will become iron bands.

On the other hand, if we would be secure from the service which hurts us, let us give ourselves to the Lord to serve Him with joyfulness and gladness. Do you ask the source of these? Remember, He will put gladness into thy heart; joy is the fruit of his Spirit. When thou art in a healthy state joyfulness and gladness rise spontaneously in the soul, as music from song-birds. When the sacrifice begins, then will the song of the Lord begin. The heart finds the well-spring of perennial blessedness when it has yielded itself absolutely and unconditionally to Christ.

MONDAY, January 20.

"I SHALL HAVE PEACE, THOUGH I WALK IN THE STUBBORNNESS ON MINE HEART."—Deut. xxix. 19 (marg.).

So man's foolish heart reasons. He hears the curse pronounced against sin, he knows that the man who turns from God is threatened with gall and wormwood, and yet he persists in his evil ways, secretly blessing himself, and laying the flattering unction to his heart, that he at least will come off scot free. Such an one shall not escape; "The Lord will not pardon him, but his anger shall smote against him."

The only way to peace is by abjuring the stubbornness which sets up its own will and way against God's. Is not this the secret of the unrest of your soul, that you have never perfectly yielded to God. You know that if others did as you do, and cherished the dispositions that you permit, you would instantly condemn them, and assure them of the incompatibility of soul, rest, and such things as these; but you bless yourself, and say, "I shall have peace, though I walk in the stubbornness of my heart."

Ask God to take the stubbornness out of you, to rid you of your hard heart, to bring you into loving, gentle subordination to Himself. Return and submit. Take his yoke and learn of Him. Bow down at his feet. Let every step of your daily walk be taken in the track of his holy will. So shall you find rest unto your soul.

TUESDAY, January 21.

"THE LORD THY GOD WILL CIRCUMCISE THINE HEART, TO LOVE THE LORD THY GOD WITH ALL THINE HEART."—Deut. xxx. 6.

Circumcision is the sign of separation. It was enjoined on Abraham and his children that they might be God's peculiar people, chosen from all the nations of the earth. Similarly, the circumcision of Christ, which is made without hands, of which the Apostle speaks, is a putting off, a separation from the sins of the flesh, a participation in the grave and burial of Christ (Col. ii. 12).

We must be separated from the spirit and temper of the world. Between us and its sins, ambitions, methods there must be not only an outward, but a heart severance. We were separated in the purpose of God when Jesus was cast without the camp to die. But we must be separate in our personal behaviour. Wouldst thou have this? Then claim that this promise should be fulfilled, and ask that God would circumcise thine heart, the seat of thine affections the hearth of thy soul-life.

Then thou wilt love the Lord with all thine heart. This is why we love God so little. The force of our love is spread over too wide a surface, it is like the river Orinoco, which is lost in swamps as it approaches the sea. If only we were really separated from all that is alien to God, and given up to Him wholly, we should find all the capacity of our hearts becoming filled with his love. We should love all things and people with a tenderness and glow which were steeped in his.

WEDNESDAY, January 22.

"THOU SHALT CAUSE THEM TO INHERIT IT."—Deut. xxxi. 7.

Joshua is ever the type of our blessed Jesus. Joshua not only won Canaan for his people by his faith in the gift of God, coupled with his strenuous efforts, but he caused them to inherit it. Jesus not only won the wealth of the heavenlies for his Church by his death and resurrection, but He waits to cause us to inherit it through the Holy Spirit which He gives.

How great is our heritage! Heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ! All things that pertain to life and godliness awaiting our appropriation! All spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus! There is no conceivable grace or virtue, no fabric of the Divine looms for the soul's dress, no ornament of heavenly jewellery for the soul's adorning, no weapon of celestial temper for the soul's equipment, no salve or balm of Divine comfort for the soul's healing, which is not ours in Jesus. But we do not inherit them; we do not possess our possessions. We are like people who have sent all their valuables to the strong-room of a bank, and never by any chance make use of them.

This is a lack which Jesus can also supply. He can cause us to inherit: first, by his spirit He reveals the lavishness of the Divine possession; next, he excites an appetite of desire; next, He begets the expectant faith that claims; and, lastly, He becomes to us each one of these things, so that we are enriched in Him, and, possessing Him, find that all things are really ours.

THURSDAY, January 23.

"AS AN EAGLE THAT STIRRETH UP HER NEST, THAT FLUTTERETH OVER HER YOUNG, HE SPREAD FORTH HIS WINGS AND TOOK THEM."—Deut. xxxii. 11.

Three references are made to the eagle.

She stirs up her nest.—When her fledgelings are old enough to fly, but linger around the few bits of stick, dignified as a nest, the mother-bird breaks it up, and scatters them. How much better this, than that they should miss the luxury of flight on outspread pinions in the blue vault, and of basking in the eye of the sun. So when the Father sees his children clinging to earth's bare rocks, captured and held by the poor sticks they have gathered, and missing the ascension-glory, He breaks up the nest. The fortune is dispersed, the home broken up, the aspect of the life changed.

She flutters over her young.—They stand scared and wretched on the edge of the rock, but she careers gently above them, now edging around, now mounting, then dropping far below to rise again. So would she allure them to follow her example. Here again we have an emblem of God's efforts to make us imitators of Himself, to teach us the possibilities that await us in Jesus.

She spreads forth her wings and takes them.—Inspired by the mother's endeavours, the eaglet may venture on the untried air, and lo, the unaccustomed wings fail beneath its weight. It falls, but not far, for the mother swoops beneath, and bears it up and away. God is beneath thee. If thy faith fails, and thou art falling, like another Peter, into a bottomless abyss, He will catch thee, and bear thee up, and teach thee the mystery of life in the Heavens.

FRIDAY, January 24.

"OF LEVI, HE SAID, THY URIM AND THUMMIM ARE WITH HIM WHOM THOU LOVEST."—Deut. xxxiii. 8 (R. V. marg.).

What a contrast between the blessings of Jacob and of Moses. In Jacob's farewell charge, we find the ominous words, "cursed be Levi," and he foretells that this tribe should be divided and scattered in Israel. But here the curse is turned into a blessing, and the scattering is transformed into a holy ministry for the whole of Israel, "They shall teach Jacob thy judgments and Israel thy law." See to what a place of privilege they are exalted! "They shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt offering upon thine altar."

If ever there was an illustration of the power we have to turn a curse into a blessing, it is here. Step by step the results of that awful sin, for which Jacob cursed his sons, are changed into benedictions. Where sin abounded, grace has much more abounded; indeed, it has reigned, it has broken out into radiant and royal glory. Do not sit down hopeless, because of the consequences of an early sin that threaten to follow thee to thy grave. Thou mayest yet get honey out of the lion's carcass.

The way to this was by entire devotion to the call of God. After the sin of the golden calf, Levi said of his father, and of his mother, I have not seen them, neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor know his children. The cause of God, which Aaron had so ruthlessly betrayed, was dearer to him than the tenderest ties of blood. So he came into God's secret counsels of love, and knew the Urim and Thummim answers of the One whom He loved.

SATURDAY, January 25.

HIS EYE WAS NOT DIM, NOR HIS NATURAL FORCE ABATED."—Deut. xxxiv. 7.

This was true of Moses as a man. He had seen plenty of sorrow and toil, but such was the simple power of his faith, in casting his burden on the Lord, that they had not worn him out in premature decay. There had been no undue strain on his energy.

But there is a deeper thought than this. Moses stood for the law. It came by him, and was incarnated in his stern, grave aspect. He brought the people to the frontier of the land, but would not bring them over it: and so the Law of God, even when honoured and obeyed, cannot bring us into the land of promise. We stand on the Pisgah-height of effort, and view it afar in all its fair expanse; but if we have never got further than "Thou shalt do this and live," we can never pass into the blessed life of rest and victory, symbolised by Canaan.

But though the law fails, it is through no intrinsic feebleness. It is always holy, just, and good. Though the ages vanish, and heaven and earth pass away, its joys and titles remain in unimpaired majesty. It must be fulfilled, first by the Son, then by his Spirit in our hearts. Let us ever remember the searching eye of that holy Law detecting evil, and its mighty force and avenging wrong, and let us shelter in Him, who, as our representative, magnified the law and made it honourable.

Islington Cattle Market.—The annual tea to drovers and their wives and slaughtermen and their wives, engaged in this market, was given in St. Luke's Parochial Hall, North-road, last Friday evening. Close upon 200 enjoyed the very substantial repast provided. A public meeting followed, and was addressed by the vicar (Rev. R. Glover) and other friends. Prizes were given to three members of the Friday evening Bible-class who had made the best attendance during the year. Misses Randall and Edwards contributed much to the success of the meeting by their sweet singing.

THE CHILDREN'S PAGE.

All communications referring to this department to be addressed to UNCLE TOM, the Children's Editor, 12, Paternoster-buildings, London.

Uncle Tom at the Seaside.—I.

I WANT to address myself more particularly this week to bigger boys and girls. You don't like to be spoken of as "children" because you think you are getting too old, and perhaps think that what is said to the little ones is "too simple" for you, so I am going to give you a few minutes by yourselves. Of course, you boys will not mind your sisters listening; and they will not mind you if you let them sit in front and don't tease them from behind.

When I have been visiting at people's houses, I have noticed sometimes that the younger members of the family stay at home on Sunday evenings, but the others, like you who do not go to bed so early, go to church or chapel instead. It was just the same when I was a boy, and I remember there was a time when I was too old to stay at home, and yet not quite old enough to understand much of the sermon if I went out. Perhaps some of you feel like that—neither one thing nor the other. If so you are the very ones I want to interest this week.

I expect some of you like the sea—paddling, bathing, and boating. What a loving, kind friend it seems, with its gentle little waves playing about on a fine summer day, and singing to the pebbles on the beach. But what a terrible and fierce enemy it becomes when it is rough, and its great breakers dash themselves upon the rocks and over the ships that are rolling almost helplessly upon its angry bosom. Have you ever thought how sad and anxious the sailors' wives and children must be on a rough, stormy night? While some of you were enjoying yourselves at Christmas, and having a jolly time, do you know that a lifeboat went out from Kingstown harbour to rescue the crew from a ship that was in danger in the gale; and she was overturned by the fearful billows, and seventeen of the brave men who took her out were drowned. Think of all the sad hearts and bitter tears that were caused by that one terrible accident! And there have been many more besides that during the past few weeks.

Every day the newspapers contain what is called a "List of wrecks and casualties," which gives the names of the vessels, and says what has happened to them. Sometimes the machinery goes wrong, but more frequently the danger arises from the storms they meet. If you think of the sailors on a rough, windy night, try and remember that hymn which begins—

Eternal Father, strong to save, and offer the little prayer that ends each verse—
Oh, hear us when we cry to Thee,
For those in peril on the sea.

But what is it makes the sea get rough like that? "The wind!" Yes. There is a very vivid description of a storm given in Psalm cvii., and the verses are well worth while turning up to read. When I have watched the sea, I have often wondered how it is that it can be changed so suddenly, without our being able to see what the cause of it is. In the South Seas it is so smooth sometimes that sailors call it a mirror, or looking-glass. And as you can see your own face in a glass, so, I think, the sea is a mirror in more ways than one, because it shows us ourselves.

Perhaps you do not understand what I mean. Well, I have seen my own likeness in it lots of times, and yours, too. One day, like that blue sea glinting in the sun, you are all smiles and gentleness and laughter; and a little while after something has happened to annoy you, and your temper has risen like a tempest of wind, and you have raved and stormed about the house with such an angry face that your brothers and sisters have been only too glad to get out of your way. Aye! and worse than that, you have made them, and other people too, very unhappy, and their hearts very sad.

Do you remember how Jesus calmed the Sea of Galilee? It is described in the Gospel of St. Mark, chapter 4, verse 35. And in the same way He will calm your stormy temper if you ask his forgiveness and help. I daresay you have never thought what a lot of sorrow your tempers have caused. You have felt bad about it yourself sometimes, but you have made others sad too; and, worse than all, you have grieved the Lord Jesus.

I am sure you would ever so much rather have people think of you as a kind and gentle friend than as an enemy; and would rather they liked you than disliked you. So try and see yourself in the mirror of the sea, and learn this little lesson from it. There are other things it teaches, too, but one at a time is enough. You can try and think of some more, and write and tell me what they are, if you like; and we will pay another visit to the seaside soon and talk them over. But don't forget that you are sometimes "in peril on the sea," and when the wind of any temptation begins to blow, pray at once to Jesus to help and save you from it.

Write your name and address distinctly.

I must thank all my young friends who have written me letters during the week. I am glad they like our Bible-searching. And some older people also have written saying they have found it helpful to themselves, as well as to their little ones.

What a lot of little nephews and nieces I am getting! I shall be quite proud of them. You will be interested, too, to hear about two older ones. This is what they say:—

DEAR UNCLE TOM,—As I am only a poor farm labourer you must not expect a very nice letter from me, but we always take THE CHRISTIAN, and as some of it is quite hard enough for us, we always look for the pieces for the young. My wife and myself are middle age and have no family. We wish to know if we may be old children, and find and send the texts of Scripture, as we have no Sunday evening service at our church. We think it may be a profitable way to spend our Sunday evenings. May God bless you.—Yours faithfully, Niece, MARY ANN, and Nephew, GEORGE C.—.

The answers to No. 1 sent in this week (list 2) have been so numerous that I have been obliged to give only the names of those who have been correct in their replies. If you do not find yours there you will know you were wrong in some way, and must try again. About eighty have been wrong in some part or other. Sometimes it is an error in copying out the verse or the number, or confusing the speaker with the person spoken to in the texts, which it only needs care to avoid. It is just as easy to put the right answers as the wrong ones, and it is much nicer to find your name in the list than to be left out, is it not?

This week I have told you where to find the texts, and want you to learn them. We will try and make a change every week, so next time perhaps we shall have something about animals or birds, which will be sure to interest you. UNCLE TOM.

"Young Helpers" at Albert Hall.

LAST Saturday afternoon, Dr. Barnardo had a great crowd of well-to-do boys and girls gathered within the walls of the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington, accompanied by parents and friends in goodly numbers, to witness the annual entertainment provided by the children of his Homes. A capital programme had been provided for the afternoon; it was excellently carried out by the children, and much enjoyed by the spectators.

The music, of course, was plentiful. The great organ, the boys' band from Stepney, the squad of young Highlanders with their bagpipes, and the lungs of the 600 lads and lasses seated on the orchestra, each contributed a share to the harmony of the afternoon. Two recitations were given by Canon Fleming with his rich silvery voice—the one being Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade," and the other a very funny tale about the white bootblack who agreed to black the black boots of the black bootblack.

There was wonderful variety in the other exercises. Ninety little boys went through a series of soldierly movements. Later on a similar number, dressed as marines, gave a display of Naval drill. There was also a very clever exhibition of gymnastics by small boys. Then a band of little women from the Village Homes at Ilford went through musical drill, with a very pretty effect, followed by skipping, an Atalanta race, and a game of "Bell the cat." The singing of nursery rhymes of the olden times by little girls from Dr. Stephenson's Home was most amusing. To crown all there was a Christmas pie, with twenty-four real live black birds in the shape of little boys.

Then came a tour by limelight through "Waif-and-Sray-Land," with visits to the principal branches of the work connected with "Dr. Barnardo's Homes." The members of the Young Helpers' League were especially interested in the views of the Stepney Hospital, Babies' Castle, the Infirmary at the Ilford Homes, and the Home for Incurables, Birkdale; for their contributions entirely support 121 cots in these institutions. King David and His Psalms.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANIA.

Introduction.

(Concluded.)

WHILST German literature has not produced a single work in which an endeavour has been made to solve the question here brought forward, English literature has, on the other hand, one such in Dr. Maclaren's "The Life of David as reflected in his Psalms." This book has been received with great interest, an interest which has also been extended to the same author's commentary on the Psalms, subsequently issued. But in the former of these books it is only the forty-five Psalms, acknowledged by Delitzsch as David's, which, "with some confidence" are produced as being in connection with the life of David. The writer of these lines has ventured to go the whole length in his book, recently published in Norway, "King David; his Life and his Psalms," which, as previously mentioned, contends for eighty Davidic Psalms. Now that criticism has advanced so far as to declare all the Davidic Psalms to be spurious, with the exception of a portion of the eighteenth Psalm, it would be providential if it could be shown with any certainty that they are all genuine, so that the struggle may be confined to this issue:—All genuine or all spurious?

How the author has arranged the Psalms in conformity with David's life will be seen in the following statement, in which each Psalm is introduced in connection with the place in the historical narrative to which it refers.

It is the eighth of these episodes in David's life, "The wonderful granting of David's prayer in the last Philistine war," which the author has prepared for insertion in THE CHRISTIAN, in the hope that it may arouse interest in his forthcoming work. Of the seventeen Psalms which here are readjusted, by one historical incident hitherto passed over, Professor Delitzsch only acknowledges four (xviii., xix., ix., and x.) as being genuinely David's, but without being able to prove any historical position in respect to three of them (xxix., ix., and x.).

The author has written in a shorter form a German book about this episode. It has been published in Berlin by Wiegand and Grieben.*

Evangelising in South India.

DEAR SIR,—For the last eighteen months it has been my privilege to work for the Master in this needy portion of the vineyard, where I am the only European Protestant missionary. Until the beginning of this month, we had the privilege of a monthly visit from Rev. J. A. Sharrock, S.P.G. missionary, and he and I divided the evangelistic work of Pondicherry and the surrounding villages. Now Mr. Sharrock has been transferred to Trichinopoly, and the burden falls more heavily upon me. One of our great needs is a bullock or horse bandy to enable us to reach the more distant villages where the sound of the Gospel has not yet been heard.

During the past year we have visited about twenty villages, and have everywhere been well received. The women specially have listened eagerly to our message, and we have sold and distributed nearly 700 Scripture portions, including Bibles and Testaments. These villages have been those that we could reach walking, or by train, or "push push," and have not exceeded five miles, as the coolies who push these carriages could not go further. The cost of a small bullock bandy would not be more than £5 to purchase, and the annual expenditure for keep of horse would be about £5. We should be able to travel greater distances, and thus carry the glad tidings of salvation to hundreds who have never heard of Jesus and his love. The bandy, too, would be a shelter from the burning rays of the sun, and the drenching rain from which these "push pushes" cannot shield us.

I write all the more earnestly, because the friend who has hitherto kindly provided us with money for the "push push" is no longer in a position to help us. When I mention that the population of Pondicherry alone is 83,000, Roman Catholics, Hindoos, and Mohammedans, you will understand something of the greatness of our need.—Yours, for Jesus sake,

(Miss) M. A. ROBINSON,

Lady Superintendent.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., resumes his Bible Lectures to Young Men at the Central Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate-street, on Saturday next, 18th inst. The meetings are held from three to four o'clock sharp; and the subject for Saturday next is "The Ministry of John the Baptist." These meetings have for many years been unique in the history of young men's movements, having been attended by a weekly audience of between two and three hundred.

Mr. W. R. Lane last week conducted a short mission for young men at the Central Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate-street, under the auspices of the City of London Bible-class Union. This Society encourages the formation and maintenance of weekly Bible-classes in the large City houses. Its work during the present season is very successful. Mr. Lane's mission has proved very helpful in encouraging and stimulating Christians; and in adding to their number many who, for the first time, have publicly confessed Christ as their personal Saviour.

* We here quote some of the opinions expressed in various German periodicals concerning this book. Thus the Kreuzzeitung remarks:—"In face of criticism denying the age of the Psalms, these investigations are justified, and are of decided interest." Deutsche Evang. Kirchenzeitung:—"The author is rightly offended at the nuisance of unholy criticism, and places the collection of Psalms on its historical basis, thereby confirming their authenticity." Pastoralblätter:—"This treatise is of great interest, and is warmly recommended to the perusal of every friend of the Bible." Evangelisch Kirchlicher Anzeiger:—"All that has been produced by the author to prove the authenticity and connectiveness of the Psalms cxliv., xxxiii., xx., xli., xlvii., xlix., lxxi., cxvii., lxxv., ix., x., xli., xlviii., and lxxvi. is singularly well founded, and will be especially comforting and edifying to all Christians and friends of the Bible. We, therefore, highly recommend his book, and hope that he will soon publish his future studies on the subject."

The Late
Rev. W. Evans Hurndall.

THE great Head of the Church makes no mistakes. Wonderful alike in counsel and in working, his ways are past finding out. True, the believer, seeing not the end from the beginning, is tempted, again and again, to marvel when some career full of bright promise is cut short, and the Church loses one who has bidden fair to do yeoman service. Yet even then, by faith we understand that He doeth all things well.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And He will make it plain.

Many who have been closely associated with the work at Westminster Chapel, who have rejoiced in the evident tokens of blessing and revival since the advent of the young pastor, a little over a year ago, and who now, humanly speaking, see these fair hopes blighted, must find comfort and strength in the assurance, "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."

Rev. W. EVANS HURNDALL, M.A., was born in Buckley, Gloucestershire, in 1846. His father being a large manufacturer at Bristol, the son was trained for the business, which, indeed, he entered, becoming partner at the age of twenty-two. Even then, however, he was seeking to serve the Lord, conducting a Bible-class of 150 members at Castle Green Chapel. Coming to London as agent of the firm, he was led to interest himself in a chapel at Putney, then without a regular minister. Although his bent had already been towards the ministry, circumstances had hindered, but now the evident interest aroused in his preaching compelled him to the conclusion that God was calling him to this service. This conviction he acted upon with that resolution and self-abandonment which characterised his after career. The sacrifice of worldly prospects which he was certainly making troubled him not at all. God had called him, and that was sufficient. Entering St. John's College, Cambridge, he took his degree, and then accepted a call to Harley-street Congregational Chapel, Bow.

The undertaking might well have daunted a young man. Once a famous and wealthy meeting-house, it had, like many another East End cause, dwindled to an enfeebled and impoverished condition. The classes who had been its main support had moved away, and the poor who began to crowd the district were not disposed to attend the chapel. The needs of these unevangelised masses was to him an irresistible call, and he threw himself into this uphill work with an enthusiasm, energy, and resource which soon told. His personal influence and love for souls won for him a ready hearing, and the place began to fill. Nor were those who came sent empty away. He was a man with a message, and his message was the Gospel of Divine grace, told in simple yet glowing language, and with that intense personal conviction which ever commands attention.

Nor were the pressing needs of the poor forgotten. His sympathetic heart was wrung by the tales of sorrow which reached him, and he began to organise relief operations and social work on an extensive scale. Following on lines which his neighbour, Pastor Archibald G. Brown, had adopted, Mr. Hurndall gave himself to constant visitation, the care of the sick, and the provision of relief, until by-and-by he had a staff of eight paid missionaries and an army of voluntary workers engaged in carrying help and cheer into the homes of the destitute around.

One remarkable outcome of this work was his "Men's Own" Society, started in the Great Hall of the Bow and Bromley Institute, which attained a membership of a thousand, and became the centre of a host of useful auxiliary agencies. Thus he laboured for seventeen years at Bow, seeing hundreds of souls won to the Saviour. The chapel was thronged by large congregations, the membership increased, and a spirit of earnest effort animated the whole Church fellowship.

At length, however, his physical strength failed, and in January 1893, he felt himself compelled, by a nervous breakdown, to resign the pastorate. The meeting at which he bade farewell to his attached flock was a memorable manifestation of love between pastor and people.

After resting for a year, recruiting in the country, he began preaching in Clarement Chapel, Pentonville. Meanwhile the famous chapel in Westminster, built for Rev. Samuel Martin, the largest in London save the Metropolitan Tabernacle, had been for some time without a minister, and during the long vacancy the whole church organisations had languished. Various efforts had been made to secure popular preachers—overtures being made at one time to Rev. John McNeill—but in vain. A temporary occupancy of the pulpit by Mr. Hurndall convinced the deacons that here was the right man, if only they could secure him; and they accordingly invited him. His laborious years at Bow, and his recent illness, might have inclined him to seek an easier post, but the call came to him as from God, and he accepted.

In September, 1894, Mr. Evans Hurndall entered on his new and responsible charge. Only fifteen months ago, and already the church appeared to have emerged on a new era of prosperity. The congregations, which had fallen to a mere handful, increased rapidly, the membership more than doubled, and the prayer meetings became full of life and power.

The "Men's Own" Society, which had proved such a success at Bow, was introduced at Westminster, and soon took hold. Already about 600 men meet regularly on Sunday afternoons in Westminster Town Hall, while a "Women's Own," held in Buckingham Hall, has been successful on a smaller scale, having about 350 members. Mission work on the lines which had achieved so much in the East-end, was also begun with good result in the slums which lie under the shadow of the historic Abbey. Mr. Hurndall himself was the life and soul of the work, and his striking presence had become familiar in the poor corners. He was, however, no monopolist. Indeed, one element in his success was the power of setting his members to work. Like Mr. Spurgeon, he believed every Christian should be a worker, and thus he soon rallied round him a host of willing-hearted men and women who lent strength and tone to the whole work.

In the midst of all this busy and fruitful service, the leader to whose devotion and daring it was due, has been suddenly, under circumstances we have already detailed, called hence, leaving a memorial of faithful and true service, which will not soon be forgotten by all who knew him, and knowing him loved him.

Pastor A. G. Brown's Anniversary.

IT is not given to many ministers of the Gospel to complete so long a term of labour at high pressure as Pastor A. G. Brown completed last week, when the twenty-ninth anniversary of his ministry in East London was celebrated by a gathering which filled the spacious Tabernacle. After tea, which was served in the school-room, Mr. John Marnham presided over a public meeting, and in the course of a hearty address congratulated the pastor on the blessing which had attended his labours.

Mr. Brown was greeted with much warmth, and at the outset read telegrams of congratulation from his daughter Lucy and her husband (Mrs. and Dr. Bennett), and from "Dublin Baptists." The last-named added the hope that the East London Tabernacle church would spare their pastor for a brief while, that he might pay Ireland an early visit. Mr. Brown proceeded to give an interesting account of his connection with the church. He accepted the pastorate (at the age of twenty-two) when the church was situate at Stepney. God poured out his blessing on his labours in the sixth week of his ministry. On that Sunday evening the place was filled; moreover, that night was signalised by the conversion of over one hundred souls, ninety of whom he himself had the privilege of baptizing. From then to the present day there had been a steady flow of blessing. When he accepted the pastorate the church membership stood at 250. The numbers had been carried on consecutively, and the last number was 5909, so that during the present ministry some 5700 members had joined the church. Out of these, Mr. Brown added, he thought he was well within the mark if he said that at least 5000 were from the world—won directly from Satan's kingdom. This good work, the pastor proceeded to explain, had been done entirely by the teaching of the Scriptures, by preaching the truth in dependence on the Holy Ghost. As to the outside work, the pastor intimated that it had involved an expenditure of £1617.

Mr. OYDEN (a deacon) followed with a few remarks, and said that his brother officers had commissioned him to deliver a message to those present that evening. The message was: "We love you as brothers and sisters in the Lord; we love the 'guy'nor'; and we love each other."

Among the speakers who followed were Pastor G. D. Hooper (from Luton) and Mrs. G. Woodward (the pastor's daughter "Nellie"). The last-named has only just returned from China.

The Week of Prayer, 1896.

THE special and united meetings for prayer were continued last week in the West-end, the City, Exeter Hall, Mildmay, and many other London centres, as well as in the provinces. The week being one of great public anxiety, attention at some of the gatherings was largely and rightly directed toward the critical position of affairs.

WEDNESDAY MEETINGS.

This day being devoted to prayer for nations, the thoughts of many were specially turned to the serious political outlook. The subjects were:—

Thanksgiving for the special blessings enjoyed in many lands by the Church of Christ during the last half century. Prayer in each nation for its ruler and for those who make and administer the laws. Prayer for subjects, that they may honour God in the observance of the Lord's Day, that they duly render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and that they seek the advancement of temperance and purity; special prayer on behalf of all who are suffering for Christ's sake; that righteousness may be promoted in all lands; and that thus the time of universal peace may be prepared.

General Sir Robert Phayre, G.C.B., presided, and, after his few appropriate opening remarks, prayer was offered by Rev. G. E. Asker and Mr. Donald Matheson.

Rev. G. F. PENTECOST, D.D., expressed the conviction that whatever affects England commercially, politically, or religiously, will more or less affect every quarter of the earth. In the present national crisis there must not be absolute reliance upon the wisdom of even the greatest statesmen, but rather recourse to the fount of all true wisdom—God Himself. While Cyrus, the human deliverer of the Israelites from Babylonish bondage, was undoubtedly under the guidance of God, yet, in the highest sense God's wisdom is given only to his own people. The sum of divine wisdom in the Church, for guiding England and other nations out of present peril into a larger and wider place of righteousness and peace, is to be found in the aggregate of those who make special petition to God for that wisdom. Even in such an age of the world as this, the destinies of the earth will be shaped by whatever the Church of the living God agrees upon, in respect of the great principles of policy for administering the nations in which, though a minority, Christians are a dominant factor.

Without yielding any measure of his own natural and proper national feelings, Dr. Pentecost was sure he voiced the ~~conviction~~ conviction of all the best people in his own country when he stated that they were all honestly trying to subordinate mere patriotism to a higher sense of obligations connected with the Kingdom of God. Our first duty just now, as Christian men, is to exercise heavenly patriotism; and in so doing both Englishmen and Americans may find a common platform. Dr. Pentecost held his inheritance as an Anglo-Saxon to be greater than if he were simply an Englishman or an American. He believed the Anglo-Saxons, as a whole, to be raised up in our times, for the purposes of God, quite as much as were the Jews in the days of old. There was nothing meritorious about it; but it had come to pass, in the providence of God, that the Anglo-Saxon race was, in a pre eminent sense, though of course not exclusively, the custodians of the Gospel and the missionaries of the world. The righteousness and peace of the world, as far as we may so speak, rests with Great Britain and with the United States; and warfare between these two great English-speaking peoples would be nothing short of the most stupendous crime of the Christian era. In making prayer to God, we may do so definitely and intelligently, along the lines of the high spiritual relations which the two nations sustain to each other. In conclusion, Dr. Pentecost said: I pray for a solid, lasting, and unbreakable alliance between Great Britain and the United States, for the purposes of righteousness and peace; such an alliance as will enable us to control and dictate the terms of peace to all the nations of the earth. If we are both at peace, thus illustrating God's righteousness, surely all other nations must fall into line with us, or openly declare for Antichrist.

Rev. M. Easton, an American missionary from Persia, added a few words expressive of reciprocity on the part of American Christians in the desire of their English brethren for the maintenance of peace; and much fervent prayer was made in this behalf during the remainder of the meeting.

At the Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate-street, Mr. M. H. Hodder presided, and read 1 Tim. ii. 1-4, and Psalm xlv. After prayer by Rev. Dr. Jenkins and others, an address was delivered by Dr. NEWMAN HALL, with special reference to the duty of Christians in view of international misunderstandings. While trusting that the dark clouds that had gathered would pass away, he was not at all sure that a tempest of war would not break upon us. In spite of appearances, the hearts and minds of rulers are in the hands of God, who, in spite of the devil's pretences, is the Lord of the world. Let us pray to the God of Peace, through the mediation of the Prince of Peace, and this we may do with boldness, knowing that our supplications will assuredly be heard.

Specifying the warlike elements of the hour, the speaker mentioned, first of all, the Ashanti campaign. No doubt those who have the responsibility know what they are doing, but the fine young fellows who have gone forth do not know. They may be swept away, and families may be involved in sorrow. Let us pray that there may be no bloodshed—that an understanding may be come to without war. As to the dismal state of things in the Turkish Empire, some think that Britain ought to act quickly; others fear lest we should thereby provoke a terrible war. Let us have confidence in God.

Christian people are in danger of being infuriated by the accounts of oppression and massacre. War is a terrible thing, and no one should exult in the idea of it; while Christians should view it as the very climax of horrors. The law of God forbids killing and stealing, but war says kill as many as possible and destroy all you can. War slays its tens of thousands, and wounds twice as many; and, moreover, it sows the seeds of revenge and long-continued hatred. Let us pray that God will interpose and prevent it. When Israel was in Egypt it seemed as if God disregarded their sufferings, but at length He said, "I have surely seen the affliction of my people, have heard their cry, and know their sorrows."

Then, continued Dr. Hall, there is the misunderstanding with America. I cannot bear to think of it—the possibility of war with our American brethren—who read the same Bible, sing the same hymns, and have the same worship as ourselves. We have the same literature, and are bound with common ties out of number, being also engaged in the same mission work throughout the world. God avert war between England and America. The people in America are grieved at President Cleveland's message. We trust that thoughtfulness, and consideration, and prayer will prevail. Think of the fratricide and ruin! The very devil and his angels might exult for joy to see two such nations, bound by the bonds of brotherhood and working together for the evangelisation of the world, engaged in mortal strife.

Having read and expounded 1 Cor. xiii., showing that nations as well as individuals should display love and forbearance, Dr. Hall led the meeting in earnest prayer for international peace.

THURSDAY MEETINGS.

On Thursday the subject of foreign missions was taken up, the various points being thus stated:—

Praise to God for the increasing recognition, among all branches of the Church of Christ, of their obligation in this matter; for readiness on the part of individuals to obey the call of the Holy Ghost; for the fidelity of some even unto death; for many open doors and tokens of the Divine blessing. Prayer for the "Messengers of the Churches" for the manifested Presence and power of the Holy Spirit: for all on whom the responsibility rests of sending forth missionaries; and for increased liberality and sympathy among the home churches.

In St. Martin's Hall, Mr. JAMES E. MATHIESON presided, and read Acts xv. He referred with thankfulness to the awakening of the missionary spirit in these latter days. He rejoiced in many tokens that the Church is beginning to realise her responsibility in this matter, and the younger generation seems likely to regard the missionary movement with yet fuller interest. In this connection the chairman made happy reference to the Students' Missionary Conference held in the preceding week in Liverpool—a convention which he felt to be pregnant with promise for the future.

Among those who led in prayer were Dr. Henry Soltau, and Lord Radstock.

Dr. Bruce, late of Persia, recalled the thrilling words of the Apostle of the Indians, Las Casas, who, protesting against the abominable cruelties inflicted on the natives of South America by the Spanish invaders, said, "I left Jesus Christ in the East Indies suffering at the hands of the Spaniards, a thousand times over, persecution, crucifixion, torture, and death." This the speaker used as illustrative of the sympathy of Christ with his people—

In every pang that rends the heart
The "Man of Sorrows" bears a part.

This is one grand qualification of a high priest, that he should have a fellow feeling with suffering. Our Great High Priest has the tenderest sympathy with all sufferers, and specially those who endure for his name's sake, such as the recent martyrs in China and the outraged and murdered Armenians, hundreds of whom have had the choice of Christ or Mahomet, of life and apostasy or a terribly cruel death. The speaker feared that some Christians had given up praying for the Armenians, concluding that God has for some purpose abandoned them. But he implored his hearers not to cease praying for these tortured, despairing people. Passing on to the state of heathendom, he remarked that the two grand obstacles against the progress of Christianity are Buddhism and Mohammedanism, to which might be added the worldly condition of our own churches at home. On these and similar accounts, he rejoiced specially in this world-wide concert in prayer, bringing believers closer together, and bringing down blessings from on high.

At the Centenary Hall, Mr. T. Morgan Harvey occupied the chair. An address was delivered by Rev. F. W. MACDONALD, based on 1 Tim. ii. 1-6. He said that in the teaching of Christ and his apostles prayer for others is not merely a subordinate, permissive, or doubtful element, but occupies a conspicuous and important place. The privilege of intercession affords an opportunity by which Christian love may sweep the entire human horizon. The Apostle's exhortation that "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, he made for all men," threw upon the infant churches a noble and inspiring duty. Having its motive and ground in the mediatorial office of Jesus Christ, intercession is the central principle in the kingdom of God. By it we are redeemed; the redeemed world hangs upon the uplifted hands of One who "ever liveth to make intercession." Both on the cross and in his perpetual intercession, our Lord is at once the supreme intercessor and the type and pattern for all his people.

No man can breathe the true atmosphere of the kingdom of Christ who does not pray for others; no man has caught the spirit of the household into which the Christian is adopted, who does not offer prayers for others. And this intercession should not be left to mere kindly impulse, but should be nourished and strengthened by consideration of Christ's example. We have a ministry of prayer to fulfil as towards the world, and on behalf of every member of the household of faith. When we pray for the benighted and perishing heathen, for those who are downtrodden and oppressed, and for those communities who know not what they want, and for our own countrymen, with their follies, and sufferings, and sins, we are not grieving God, but are pleasing Him; we are not getting into combat with any laws, but falling in with their gracious movement. When we offer a prayer that is "good and acceptable in the sight of God," what may we not hope for and expect?

FRIDAY'S MEETINGS.

"Home Missions and the Jews" were the appointed subjects on Friday, but in St. Martin's Hall the chairman, General Hatt-Noble, R.E., as well as the speaker for the morning, led the thoughts of the audience in the direction of public affairs and the blessedness of staying the soul upon God in the time of anxiety. The subject for the day was thus stated:

Praise for enlarged interest shown in these Missions, and for the Divine blessing attending them. Prayer for all Christian evangelists, city missionaries, Bible colporteurs and for missions among soldiers and sailors. Special prayer for God's ancient Israel, that there may still be "a remnant" saved, until, the fulness of the Gentiles having been brought in, "all Israel shall be saved."

said:—We praise God this day for the increased power of united Christian sentiment. When one of the wisest of our public men said that with common-sense and patience all our international difficulties might be overcome, he appealed to qualities which without Christianity would be impossible. If it were not for the sanctions of religion and Christian morality, these ideals would become inoperative. The more the different nations of the world are permeated by the fundamental teachings of our faith and the principles on which these rest, the more will the power of common-sense and patience become prevalent. Common-sense means the due recognition of law and principle and their action on human conduct; while patience means we have acquired sufficient mastery over ourselves to make these principles effective in daily life and conversation. Without such principles and motives we cannot check international strife, jealousy, or suspicion.

Now look at home for a moment. We are called to "go into all the world," but the message we are to carry loses its power when it falls from the lips of people who are not Christian at home and in commercial dealing. Under such circumstances, our voices sound artificial and canting, and carry no conviction to the minds of men. Turning to London, our great five-million peopled London, especially the diocese of London, which I know best: in this area, there are three and a-half million inhabitants, of whom the communicants on Easter Sunday last were 120,000, and on any ordinary Sunday about 35,000. I am not undervaluing the work of our brethren, the Nonconformists, but I use these figures merely to illustrate the neglect of Divine things generally prevailing. The labour of all put together, do not suffice to reach the hearts and consciences of men. Such being the case, we may well lay aside suspicion of one another, mutual jealousy and distrust. We are not responsible for other people's ways of looking at the truth. The question is, "Do they love and loyally serve the Lord Jesus Christ?" If so, we are brethren. We have no right to say, "I am so thoroughly right, and you are so thoroughly wrong, I can have nothing to do with you." Now as to the work of home missions. The old National Church has divided the land into parishes for convenience of operation. Many, of course, do not worship exactly as we do. But is it not possible that members of the newer churches might recognise the scruples of the older Church; while members of the older recognise the conscientiousness of the new; so that without giving up our principles, we might recognise each other's work? There ought to be intercommunication in common work. We meet on the platform of the Bible and similar societies, but we might take knowledge of one another in our local work, co-operating with and furthering each other's labours.

Then as to the Jews, we need to show them more brotherly kindness; making it easier for them to see the beauty of Christianity. We must not think that each individual Hebrew has deliberately rejected the Messiah. Nineteen centuries of persecution and prejudice have hardened them against Christians, but the vast majority of them—even of the 92,000 Jews in London—know absolutely nothing of Christ or Christianity. If we cannot all teach them, we can commend the faith we hold dear by our Christ-like example and gentleness and consideration towards the children of Abraham.

A season of prayer followed, in which Canon Gibbon, Col. Robertson, and others took part.

Mr. E. Trotter presided at the Centenary Hall, and an earnest address was delivered by Rev. E. J. KENNEDY on the plea of the man of Macedonia, "Come over and help us." This call comes to Christians to-day, as it did to the Apostle. It may be a mute appeal, but it is the voice of a real need. The call entails serious responsibilities, by the neglect of which Christians not only impede the work of Christ, but keep back the blessing upon the Church and Israel. Mr. Kennedy and others led in prayer for a deeper realisation of duty in the evangelisation of the masses of our countrymen.

SATURDAY.

On Saturday the question of young people and family life was dealt with, the subject being—

Praise for the blessings of family life, and for the young who have given their hearts to the Lord. Prayer, that much grace and wisdom, with humility, may be granted to all members of professing Christian families, that, obeying the precepts of Scripture, they may richly inherit the blessings promised to children brought up in the fear and love of God. For Sunday-schools; for Christian Associations of young people; for Schools, Colleges, and Universities.

Lord RADSTOCK conducted the meeting in St. Martin's Hall, and the hour was most profitably spent in fervent supplication on behalf of "Families and Schools." His address was of a very spiritual character, tracing a connection between the typical paschal lamb which figures in Israel's deliverance from Egypt as described in Exodus xii.; and Christ's dealings with his disciples, as recorded in John xiii. It was clearly pointed out that our spiritual passover, as God's believing people, consists in receiving a living Christ, by faith, and that this is an impossibility for an uncleansed soul. Then followed some thoughts on the bearing which that truth has upon worshipping God in spirit and in truth, as contrasted with mere formalism; and on the paramount need which exists for full confession of sin before God, in order to realise the abundant answer to prayer which He is ready to bestow.

"Christian Lifeboat Crew."—The New Year's muster of the Crew was well attended by sailors of various nationalities as well as friends. Miss Child gave out the text for the month, "And He led them by the right way" (Psalm cvii. 7). She recounted the blessed times experienced at Christmas, mingled with sad instances of shipwrecks and consequent loss of life.

Gales in the North Sea.

DEAR SIR,—Three months ago I sent you some details of a storm I witnessed on the North Sea in the first days of my second voyage in the Hospital Mission ship, Alice Fisher. In the light of recent experiences I should prefer now to speak of that scene as a smart breeze only. It has fallen to my lot in the present month to have to ride out in the gallant Mission ship, Queen Victoria, in two gales of terrible violence, carrying death and havoc in all directions.

On the morning of Dec. 4 we sailed from the Grimsby fleet for our usual short sojourn in port. Scarcely had we covered twenty knots when we were contending with the full force of that frightful hurricane, the destructive character of which, both to life and property, you have been made familiar with by the newspaper reports. We lay to immediately under three-reef sail fore and aft. In this condition we drifted about for eighty consecutive hours at the mercy of perhaps one of the most pitiless storms that has howled its anger over the tortured, treacherous waters of the North Sea. We reached port in safety and without mishap, but we have been less fortunate in the gale that is just abating.

Being put in commission again on December 20, we sailed on that date under the happiest of auspices, except that Christmas would have been preferable ashore. The earth, the air, and the sea gave every indication of a calm and serene voyage back to our fleet, with a fresh supply of woollens, literature, drugs, and the old, old story of Jesus and his love for our fishermen friends. But this sweet scene of peace was soon to be changed. Hardly had the third day (Sunday) closed upon us before the fiend of storms had blown his battle blast, and from the north-east came swooping down upon us a fierce, scourging gale, not of such force perhaps as that of December 5, but with a much heavier sea-swell, and accompanied by hail and spray, rendering it impossible sometimes to see the ship's prow.

We lay to, as on the former occasion, till mid-day on Christmas Day. I hope and trust I may never have the misfortune to be the eye-witness of such an onslaught between the elements of nature and a ship at sea. It would be useless to attempt a description of the wild grandeur, the mad fury of the scene. Brave was the battle, but our Great Commander's hand was again on the wheel; his all-seeing eye was on the prow. The Queen Victoria brought us all out of our peril in safety, but at the expense of some of her canvas. With deep and heartfelt gratitude, we ascribe the praise and glory to God.

Tremendous seas dashed against us, and over us at times; and the noise of the thundering waters resembled more than anything else the booming of artillery. The heaviest sea struck us about half-past one o'clock on Christmas morning, carrying away for the second time our foresail, and making the ship to tremble and quiver like a leaf from stem to stern. The gale abating, we got our position and set sail to find our fleet. The first we fell in with, the "Red Cross" fleet, was diminished to about a dozen sail. Next we found the "Short Blue" fleet; or what remained of it. Afterwards we reached the "Northern" fleet, now consisting of three trawlers and two smacks. Last of all our own fleet, the Grimsby, which seems to have suffered the least; although two trawlers with all hands have gone down.

One skipper told me that he saw on Christmas morning five smacks entirely dismantled, and one sinking, showing signals of distress. He, himself, could not render them any assistance, his boat having been carried away during the night. I could tell of many brave and noble deeds done on the North Sea last Christmas morning, and of the terrible hardships, the wearying anxiety, the tire-some days, the sleepless nights, that our fishermen have to endure. The comforts and blessings which the M.D.S.F. has brought to these men are enormous.

—Yours truly,

ALEXANDER STUART.

A Profitable Evening.

A TRUE STORY.

SOME time ago a business man from the North was in London for a week or so. The weather was very cold, and he knew none socially in the neighbourhood. What should he do? Addressing the waiter at the hotel where was staying, he asked, "Where could I spend a pleasant, profitable evening without much trouble?" The waiter looked a trifle disturbed. What did "profitable" mean? "That depends as whether you're a gent as likes to see life," he ventured to say. "There's a many ways of seeing it." "Well, I don't want to go to a prayer-meeting," said the other. "Ah, then I can suit you, sir," replied the waiter, smiling.

Later, the man from the North found himself in a large music-hall. It was one way of killing time, though he did not care so much for music-halls. He felt he had gone there too early; he was in a cheap seat, or he would have gone out until the performance began. But he was crowded in. Two girls sat just in front of him; they were loudly dressed, and seemed to know a good many of the audience in the hall, to judge by their remarks. Presently one said,—

"I can't see young Lil at the back there; she was to be here to-night. Lor', she's had to give in pretty soon," she laughed. "More's the pity," returned the other girl. "I don't believe, if there was a God, as He'd let a little thing like her come to that. I know how she'll feel, too—all daring like, and yet ashamed, at first; and then she'll get used to it, like you and me."

"Stop that," cried the other. "What's took you? I suppose the missionary people have been at you!"

The other said nothing, but she continued looking towards one spot, where was a door. The man from the North looked too; he understood enough of what he had heard to know that a life's tragedy was beginning for a poor, weak child, perhaps no older than his eldest girl. Her name, too, was Lily. Suppose it had been his Lily! Was there a God? Or was it true what this girl had said? There must be a God and a Saviour—his Lily believed there was. A sudden, strong impulse came over him to save this strange Lily.

"Look, look! there she is!" cried one of the girls. He saw her—he stood up in his seat. "There is a God, who cares," he heard from his heart. "Let me pass, please," he requested of those sitting in his row.

"Come out of this!" he authoritatively demanded of a pale, over-dressed girl, to whom he made his way, and who looked not more than sixteen.

"Why should I?" she asked. "Who are you?"

"I am Lily's father," said he, taking her arm; "Come outside, and I will explain. My Lily is going to be kind to you."

The girl looked puzzled and defiant, but she allowed herself to be led outside. Here she made a stand.

"Let me be!" she exclaimed, "Let me go my own ways; you know nothing of me. Where's your tracts?" She tried to laugh.

"I know less of God than you do," said the man, "if that is what you are afraid of; but I shall not let you go back there. I could never look at my Lily again if I did."

Then the girl threw up her hands, and burst into bitter weeping. "Oh, I'm not fit to be wherever your Lily is," she cried, "and who told you my name? Did mother send you?"

"I never knew of you till ten minutes ago, and none has ever spoken to me of you. But, if you have a mother, think of her now, and leave this place at once," said the man.

"What are you going to do with me?" the girl asked. "We can't stand talking here—let's go inside."

"No," said the man, "that's finished." He hailed a passing cab, and directed the cabman to drive to a house in one of the suburbs.

"I am taking you to my sister for the night; in the early morning I shall telegraph that my Lily comes to London; she will know what to say to you," said the man.

Later on, he asked his sister, "Can you trust me, Cissy?" "Unfailingly," was her reply. She was a child of God.

Then he told the story, and finished with:—"A strange longing has taken possession of me—a longing to do the will of One greater than and out-side myself. Who but God drove me, in spite of myself, to save that girl?"

"Had a pleasant evening I hope, sir?" the waiter asked as he returned to his hotel.

"A 'profitable' evening, I dare think," was the reply.

"Well! if he don't look as if he'd been to a prayer-meeting, after all!" soliloquised the waiter.

The business man could not sleep; all his past, all the gentle persuasions of his Lily, the prayers of his sainted wife, the words of the poor girls at the music-hall, dogged him. At last he could bear the intolerable burden no longer. "Oh, God-light!" he cried. "Take me, teach me—I am sick of myself. What is this agony that I feel!" The Saviour of the needy and the lost became his refuge; the God of all grace touched his heart, and all unknowing, he was born again.

His Lily came to London next day, and sister and daughter both saw the blessed work that had begun in this one so dear to them, so long prayed for, so unbelieving! The two Lilys met, and by the wonderful alchemy of love, the heart of the sinner was won to think upon new ways. She voluntarily agreed to remain with Lily's aunt, and her red-letter days were those on which her namesake left her home in the North to visit her London aunt. And what of the man who was led to save the outcast? He told the story recently at a prayer meeting after a service for men, held in the town where he lives:—

"You know me—when men tell you there is no God, none to save, none to heal, tell them you know there is, for that He saves J—H—every hour." Seven gave themselves to God that night out of the forty-three who heard these words.

Of the two Lilys, one is still the light and delight of her father's home, a home where Jesus reigns. The other is the respected wife of the foreman of the works owned by her earthly saviour, and her Christianity is of a very vivid type.

The Light of the World.

Matt. v. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 11.

OH, Christian brethren! Ye who take Your quiet ease in Zion—wake!

Do you not hear,
In accents dear,
The cry of brothers,
Fathers, mothers,
Chained in the gloom
Of error's doom,

Calling for the light to dawn,
Waiting for the break of morn?

For the dawning of that day
When the churches shall display

The truth and right,
All clear and bright
As dew in morn,
Ere day is born,
And thus portray,
In pure array,

Like a banner of beauty unfurled,
The light of the Light of the World.

Beyond the illumin'd tongue or pen,
To show this Holy Light to men,

Your lives must preach,
Your robes must teach,
Washed and made white
They'll show the Light.
The world around,
By Satan bound,

Will then believe; and Jesu's might
Will change their chains to robes of white.

Work Among Lepers.

MISS MARY REED'S work among lepers at Chandag is one of the most touching incidents of modern missions. Mysteriously consecrated to the work among these poor sufferers, by being permitted herself to contract the disease, she has laboured with signal blessing and success for some four years. The small asylum, with some thirty-eight inmates, to the superintendence of which she was appointed, has grown under her care until she has now a large institution with about 100 inmates, and substantial houses ready for more.

Mr. Wellesley Bailey, superintendent of the Mission to Lepers, whose committee maintains the work, lately paid a visit to Miss Reed, in the course of his tour of inspection of the various centres of work in India. From his interesting account we extract the following:—"When we arrived, Miss Reed showed me her little house, which she has arranged with the greatest taste. In front of the house is a magnificent shrub of heliotrope, which scents the whole place. There is no doubt there has been considerable improvement since she came here, and that her general health is splendid. This is undoubtedly in answer to prayer, and I should not be at all surprised were she even to get better, though that may not be God's will for her. But be that as it may, she is consecrated to his service for his lepers, and she accepted it cheerfully. She always was, and still is, extremely sensitive as to contact with disease and suffering, so you can imagine what it is for her to attend upon these poor people in their sufferings! but the Lord Jehovah is her strength and stay, and daily and hourly carries her through.

"As to her work and the institution, I am perfectly astounded at what she has been able to accomplish, and at the splendid way in which, single-handed, she carries on everything. Hers is one of the best-managed institutions I have seen, and the inmates all seem contented and happy. She takes the immediate oversight of everything herself, and is managing the place most economically. At present she has several needs, which she would be glad to see supplied at once. They include a set of houses for animals (ponies and bullocks), cost about £10; and a new house for less advanced cases of the disease, £20. The sum of £20 is needed to erect and start a windmill (which has been given), by which an immense amount of labour and expense will be saved. There are to be several baptisms to-morrow. One of the candidates led us in a beautiful prayer, thanking God that she had become a leper, as it had been the means of her knowing Christ."

Communications may be addressed to the hon. sec., for London, Mr. John Jackson, at 186, Aldersgate-street, E.C.

AMIDST all the exciting events of the past fortnight, and the bustle and activity at our great naval ports, it has been good to realise that "all things work together for good to those that love God." Our Christian seamen and marines have been drafted at a moment's notice, some to the flying squadron and some to the torpedo-destroyers. Their great desire is to "live Christ" among their shipmates, and to pass on the true light. Their prayers are earnest that out of all this Christ's kingdom may be advanced in our Navy.

I am glad to say that I am in direct and personal communication with all these ships, and that our monthly letters and monthly paper, Ashore and Afloat, will follow them everywhere. Our workers are now busy at Devonport, Portsmouth, and Chatham, organising all this work. In the sad losses of life through the capsizing of the pinnacle of H.M.S. Edgar, and the sinking of the whaler of H.M.S. Acorn, we have lost good men and true, and have been called to sympathise deeply with the widows and mothers who have lost those to whom they looked for support.

Christmas shed its bright happy light over us; nearly 2000 presents to men, their wives and children, were given away, and these presents were sent to me from all parts of England, and from all ranks of society. So, by loving words and actions, Christ is glorified, and our sailors made to feel that their country thinks of and cares for them.

Mr. Radcliffe in Russia.(Concluded from last week.)*

WHEN we reached Wilmanstrand, its loveliness astonished us. We lived in a long, one-storey, white house, perched high up, above the lake, which, dotted with its one thousand islands, lay in placid beauty at our feet. The great earthworks round the barracks were covered with grass as green as an emerald. The trunks of the birch trees shone like silver in the sunshine; and the leaves, only about one week old, were a most delicate shade of green. In the middle of some of these birches stood the lofty church belfry—a most imposing structure of wood, painted white and green—which could be seen miles away.

Then in the centre of the town, above the fire engine house, was a tall, square tower, on which a man kept a look-out for fire by night and day. He was never off the watch. A good lesson for us in spiritual things, is it not?

One morning a message came to our party at the hotel, requesting one of us to visit a Finnish woman. A long walk brought us to a wood-yard; and we found there an old and very poor woman, with a sad expression on her face. After much interpretation of English and Finnish, backwards and forwards, we gathered her history. The old woman had a lodger, who took very ill one night. He was a bad man; and she was so afraid that he would die, that she fell on her knees and prayed for him. As she knelt there, the Holy Spirit showed her that she herself was more wicked before God than the bad man she was praying for; and she had carried this heavy burden of sin for two years. How gladly we conveyed to her all-attentive ear the same good news which the angel proclaimed on the plains of Bethlehem—"Fear not! for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." The old woman, we had reason to believe, accepted God's free gift of pardon; and as we sailed away up the Saima Lake from Wilmanstrand, a few days after, I thought I saw my old friend with a happy face on the shore, standing up amongst the others, and waving her farewell to us.

From our next resting place, Knopio, Mr. Radcliffe wrote:—"I desire to entreat special prayer—very special prayer. The Canon here voluntarily offers a state church for every night we stay. Knopio, you will see, is more than two hundred miles north of Wiborg, and it is the chief town of this part of Finland. The Finnish women appear to love to listen to the Gospel from our ladies; filling the church and the aisles of the Canon's church full to the door, many standing up."

Once, perhaps, five or six priests were seated near the altar, to hear what women could say through interpretation. A man saluted us in the street, and said he had got rest to his soul from the meeting in the parish church. But the crowning meeting for numbers was in the park, granted by the Burgomaster. These dear Finnish people, indeed, received us as God's messengers.

Leaving Knopio, we started on a long, long journey, with no inns suitable by the way to rest in. Our food was in a basket; and at night we sat in the carriages, still travelling on. It is a great drive up the centre of Finland to reach Uleåborg from Knopio, which we left in a little steamer, and first sailed through several lakes. A week before, we had sent post-cards in Finnish by the post-car to the different "stations" en route to have horses ready for us when we arrived at each "station." On the evening of the first day we reached Idensalmi; not, however, to go to bed, but to take our places in the carriages for the night, and travel northwards to Uleåborg, the chief town of Finnish Lapland; which, with its rapids and islands and white wooden bridges, was unlike any place we had before seen. The people, as at other places in Finland, came out in crowds to hear Mr. Radcliffe preach to them in their own language by interpretation; and as it was light all night, remained for conversation sometimes till nearly midnight.

From Uleåborg we started on our journey southwards. A large and comfortable steamer conveyed us down the Gulf of Bothnia to Wasa, where we met again one of our kind interpreters, Mr. Bjorkenheim; and the state church priest opened wide his church doors and school-house, and was most hearty and affectionate. From Wasa we returned for a few days to our old quarters at Tammerfors, and from thence we proceeded to Bjorneborg, which we reached in one day, driving between seventy and eighty miles. The congregations in Bjorneborg were deeply moved on hearing the simple Gospel in their own tongue by interpretation. They astonished us at one service, when Mr. Radcliffe was speaking, by rising out of their pews, moved by their intense interest, and coming to stand round the pulpit while the address was going on.

And now our visit to Russia is but a memory, though to us it must ever be a grateful and blessed one.

We were told that it was not easy to enter Russia; but we found it was more difficult to leave. At last, however, we got under way from Abo for Stockholm.

Irish Railway Talks.—7.

By GEORGE WILLIAMS.

THE 5 p.m. for Wexford steamed into the cheerful little station at Arklow just as I reached the crowded platform. It was a lovely evening, and the soft woods and gentle hills of the world-renowned "vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet" appeared as if falling asleep in the tender light of the slowly setting sun. The railway station presented an animated scene, for it had been fair day in Arklow, and now the country people were returning to their homes, chatting and laughing in the pleasant way peculiar to the light-hearted Irish peasantry.

To me it had been a very happy day. In the company of the rector and curate of the town, together with the rector of the neighbouring parish of Kilbride, I had helped to sound out in the fair for five hours the story of a Saviour's amazing love. We had met with no opposition whatever; one policeman had formed our entire bodyguard, and we had estimated that more than 2000 persons had heard us during the day. I had for nearly two hours watched a group of people right opposite to us, pretending to buy old clothes from off a cart. They lazily turned the things over from time to time, so as to keep up the pretence, but finally went away, not having purchased anything. In reality they had been listening all the time to the wonderful words of life.

Feeling, therefore, very happy and thankful, I made my way along the platform and jumped into a carriage crowded with fair people. Amongst these was a powerful-looking man, armed with a stout stick. Directly he recognised me he became quite frantic, and flourishing the stick, furiously demanded how dared I attempt to preach in the fair. Every moment I expected my head to be broken, but, happily, his anger stopped short of actual violence, and I suffered no damage.

Becoming quieter after some time, he said, with evident triumph, "Now, tell me, after his five years of street-preaching, has that howling idiot Hallowes converted one Catholic?"

"I hope not," said I. "You hope not!" said he, "Then what in the world are you preaching for?"

"If Mr. Hallowes converted a man it would be no more use than changing a corpse from one coffin to another. But when God's Holy Spirit converts a man, the man becomes a new, a living, and a holy man; and in the judgment day it will be found that men were born of the Holy Spirit in the streets of Arklow." Upon this he thrust his hand into his pocket, and pulling out a crucifix and a string of beads, and holding them up before all the people in the carriage, he exclaimed with great confidence and satisfaction, "There, that's what I am trusting my soul to for salvation!" "Well," said I, "the crucifix is a very solemn symbol, but I will be bound you were in a public-house to-day drinking whisky." "Well, and what of that?"

"The beads and the crucifix didn't keep you out of the public-house."

"Oh, a man must have a little refreshment."

"That's all very well, but if you would admit Him who died for your sins upon the cross, and who is now a living and mighty Saviour, into your heart, you would give up your drinking habit; but all the beads and crucifixes in the world in your coat pocket can't save you from whisky-drinking or from any sin."

Not being able to contradict this, and the people in the carriage appearing to approve of what I had said, he began flourishing the stick afresh, and shouted, "Come along, if you dare, and preach in the fair of Gorey, and with one stroke I'll lay you in the street as dead as a herring."

"Are you a Christian?" I asked.

"Of course I am," he said.

"But a Christian is a man in whom the Spirit of Christ dwells."

"Well, I tell you I'm a Christian, and, what's more, I'm a Catholic."

"But the holy apostle St. Paul says, 'If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' Now the Spirit of Christ is a gentle, loving, pitiful spirit. The Lord Christ would never strike or kill anyone. He would never shout and storm and threaten as you are doing. It is plain to these honest people in this carriage that you have not the Spirit of Christ, but on the contrary, an opposite spirit; therefore you are not one of his, and therefore you are not a Christian at all."

Strange as it may appear, this bold thrust made him somewhat solemn, and during the remainder of the run to Gorey he talked seriously with me of the grace and power there is in the Lord Jesus for ruined and lost men. He seemed half ashamed of his violence, and when the train stopped he wished me good evening quite pleasantly as he stepped on to the platform.

"Wait a moment," said I; "aren't you an Irishman?" "I am, to be sure."

"And am not I an Irishman?" "I suppose you are."

"Then what are we fighting for?" "Faith, and I don't know," said he promptly.

I thought it would be useful to send him off with this lodged in his mind; it would disarm future possible hostility, and lead him to reflect how monstrous it is that half-a-dozen ecclesiasties living far away in Italy, should influence one Irishman to murder another Irishman if he ventures to speak of the love and saving power of Him who "came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."

Moravian Missions.—The quarterly organ of the London association in aid of these missions, referring to the deficiency of £6000, says:—"At the present moment, the sums received from all sources, including eloquent and gratifying contributions from struggling native churches, have reduced the amount to considerably less than one-half. Nor have the future increase and the Labrador extension and Ship Fund been forgotten. Long-tried friends have generously rendered or promised additional support; and new friends have been found and new sympathies awakened, which we trust will prove permanent. Much, however, remains to be done, for the latter half of a required sum is notoriously the more difficult to raise." Hence the present urgent appeal by the secretaries, 2, Farnival's Inn, E.C.

The Students' Conference.

THE meeting in the Philharmonic Hall, Liverpool, on Saturday forenoon was perhaps one of the most impressive of the series. The report of the executive of the S.V.M.U. was submitted, after which the foreign delegates were formally received and heard. In presenting the report, Mr. DONALD FRASER dealt first of all with the statistics of the Union. Since April, 1892, when it was formed, 1038 students had been enrolled—832 men and 206 women. These students, belonging to all the divisions of the kingdom, and attending many different colleges and universities, represent twenty-six denominations. Out of the total number mentioned 212 have sailed; 66 others have been accepted; 22 have renounced; 34 have been rejected, and several died. The best proof of the stability of the movement is the large proportion of volunteers who have actually left for the field. Dr. Duff said that if ten per cent. of the men who offered themselves in a missionary revival ever reached the foreign field, that revival was a great success. From the Students' Union many who have left college are still engaged in home preparation; notwithstanding this more than 47 per cent. have already sailed, and 61 per cent. have been accepted by the missionary societies. The 212 students who have left are working in 42 different societies, and in 29 different countries.

Mr. Fraser spoke of the cordial co-operation existing between the Union and the missionary societies. As one result the societies are having a much larger number of candidates for mission work. One denomination which for two years was unable to find four men to fill vacancies, has now twenty-eight candidates. The missionary spirit has been quickened and extended among students generally. This has been apparent in the increased number and earnestness of the missionary meetings in college, the circulation of missionary literature, and establishment of missionary bands. During the past years strong links have been formed between the various colleges, to the mutual helpfulness of all. National limitations, too, are fast disappearing. At this conference there have been welcomed students from twenty-four different nationalities, who come as brothers in the Lord Jesus Christ. The colleges are finding that the Union is a means of deepening the spiritual life of the members. One student states that the volunteer band is the spiritual centre of his college; and in many colleges the whole religious life has been transformed.

As to the future, Mr. Fraser said that the work of the Union would be seriously crippled if the Christian Churches did not respond to its claims with greater liberality. Some excellent advice was also given to the students in various stages of preparation as to the best ways of utilising their opportunities and of influencing others. It was announced that the motto which has been the inspiration of the American movement, "The Evangelisation of the World in This Generation," has been adopted by the executive as the watchword of the British movement also. They had done so because they believed that He who said, "Preach the Gospel to every creature," wished his followers in every age to do it.

After some very encouraging facts, as to the spread of the work in the European colleges, had been given by Mr. WILLIAMSON, the formal reception of the foreign delegates took place. They stood in their places on the platform, and were welcomed by the chairman in very hearty and brotherly words. Then little addresses followed from Dr. Siemsen as representing Germany, Pastor Eckhoff from Scandinavia, Mr. S. Schoch from Holland, M. Gaboriaud from France, Mr. Hsiang from China, Mr. Fukunda from Japan, and M.

Anet from Switzerland. All these friends spoke in English very creditably, and expressed the indebtedness of their fellow students, as well as reported on the progress of the movement in their respective lands. Each speaker was very warmly cheered, and a feeling of much enthusiasm pervaded the audience.

The afternoon was devoted to sectional meetings of the different missionary societies represented; of these there were over a dozen, and all the available accommodation at the Y.M.C.A. and Gordon Hall, as well as some of the rooms at the Philharmonic Hall, were brought into requisition for these family gatherings of friends working, or intending to work, under the same auspices.

At the large evening meeting in the Philharmonic Hall, Mr. Donald Fraser, who presided, spoke of it as "Our International Day." One result of the Conference was that Scandinavian, German, French, and Spanish delegates had handed in documents declaring their intention to promote the volunteer movement in their respective colleges and universities. The Dutch delegation had signified their intention to go wherever God should lead them. In Australia also this movement had been begun.

Rev. H. F. BEACH, speaking about the American and Asiatic movement, said that the most hopeful development in the U.S. and Canada was that of the educational part of the movement. In the first year the volunteer movement spread like wildfire in the colleges and universities, and at the end of the year 2000 volunteers had joined. In 1890, however, it was found that from lack of missionary information difficulties had arisen and volunteers were giving up their declaration. It was found necessary to organise and to educate the men and women so as to get them on a stable basis. The secretary and others were visiting the colleges and universities arousing an interest in this matter. Thousands of letters were sent out to institutions of learning, and Sunday-schools for the purpose of training these young people to be leaders in missionary study were held in colleges; inexpensive text-books had been prepared, and a special course of study adopted which had produced good results. The speaker gave some details of the work, and concluded by urging his hearers to devote their lives to the glorious enterprise of missions.

Mr. L. B. BUTCHER, general secretary of the S.V.M.U., said there were 120 colleges and universities in the land (not counting the theological), with a student population of 40,000. He regretted that men ready to go into the field had to wait because the Church of Christ was not ready to do its duty. The ordinary expense for a year was estimated at £700. This would maintain two travelling secretaries and one student to visit the colleges, a lady student to do similar work in the ladies' colleges, and meet the cost of correspondence and office expenses. £800 would be required for the expenses of the Conference, making a total required for this year of £1500.

Mr. EUGENE STOCK, on behalf of the C.M.S. and other great missionary societies, wished God-speed to the S.V.M.U. The C.M.S. and some other societies were sending out every man who was properly qualified, relying on the Lord to give the money. They had adopted that principle eight years ago; in seven years their forces were doubled and they had a surplus at the end.

Dr. GEORGE SMITH gave a very interesting account of the missionary work done by the Free Church of Scotland. Last May the general assembly of that church sent out Mr. Maclean, a former secretary of this Union, to Madras, and now they were looking forward to sending out Mr. Donald Fraser (the president of the Union) to the very front of Central Africa. Speaking of the small proportion of missionaries to the immense population of the world, Dr. Smith said that the whole of the 8000 missionaries might be well concentrated in Bengal alone. Two special topics were discussed—"The Needs of the World," and "The Wealth of the World"; and Dr. Smith concluded by urging upon the meeting the duty of responding cheerfully to Mr. Butcher's appeal.

Mr. S. EDDY (one of the travelling secretaries of the American Union) also gave a very feeling address on the needs of the heathen.

The Chairman appealed to his hearers to contribute to the expenses of the Union. Slips of paper were handed round by the stewards, and it was subsequently announced that £1641 3s. 2d. had been contributed.

At the public meeting in the Philharmonic Hall, held in the afternoon, a number of brief addresses on Scripture texts were given by the students and friends in response to the invitation of the chairman.

On Sunday evening, the Philharmonic Hall was crowded some time before the hour, for a closing consecration service. So large an audience had assembled that an overflow meeting was held in the Gordon Hall. After prayer by Rev. Dr. Cunningham, the passage of Scripture describing the call of Barnabas and Paul was read. The chairman (Mr. Donald Fraser) announced that out of the £1600 subscribed on the previous evenings, grants would be made to the foreign delegations, to extend the movement throughout their colleges, and that funds would be sent to Mr. Mott in Australia for the same purpose.

Mr. T. JAMESON (general secretary of the Liverpool Y.M.C.A.) having briefly spoken, Mr. C. T. STUDD announced his subject as "Take It," meaning that the world had been given to the Christian, but he must "take it." They must be fools for Christ's sake, and not allow any intellectual difficulties to prevent their acceptance of God's promises. They had heard the cry of the heathen, and the only thing to do them good was the Gospel. It might seem a difficult thing to do to take the Gospel to the heathen, but if we believed the promises of God we should be enabled to do so by the power of the Holy Spirit through the indwelling of the Lord Jesus in our bodies.

Dr. PIERSON followed with a stirring address on "The Evangelisation of the World in this Generation." To "evangelise" means "to tell the story of good tidings." Evangelisation must go before conversion, and conversion before edification. There are four steps in evangelising—the Church must send forth the preacher, the preacher must proclaim the Truth, so that people may hear and believe. They in turn become proclaimers of the Gospel. Was it possible to evangelise the world in the course of a single generation? Dr. Pierson, in answering this question, showed what the Moravian Church had done. He further considered the question of means, and maintained that it could be done. If we obey the commands of our Great Leader, all is possible. The duty of giving was enlarged upon; if we do not give back to God what we hold in trust we shall be dishonest and criminal.

Mr. SHERWOOD EDDY said a great problem was facing each student that night—the question of his relation to the mission work. Some men say "There is enough work at home"; but is that always God's appointed place? Other men doubt whether they are called, but the call was given once for all when Jesus Christ said, "Go ye into all the world," etc. Some hesitate on account of the lack of means; others say, "Why should I decide now?" Mr. Eddy pointed out the duty of the student in respect to these matters and showed what need there was for an army of workers in the mission field.

At this stage of the proceedings, the chairman asked those students who hoped to be in the foreign field in another year to rise, giving the name of their college and the field they hoped to go to. In compliance with this request, some twenty rose, one after the other, the fields of work chosen being different parts of Africa, China, India, and South America.

Mr. FRASER then gave the concluding address, the aim of which was to show that the missionary and the student must rely entirely on the power of the Holy Ghost, in all his labours, trials, and difficulties. The one secret of a successful life, 'is to live in a continual atmosphere of prayer.' The conference would be an eternal success, if its members, following the example of the Lord Jesus, would consecrate themselves to such a life.

Dr. Barnardo's Supper.

THAT there is an unspeakable endurance of misery in the child-life of the metropolis we know, but it is not easy to understand how Dr. Barnardo can hold his door wide open so that every really neglected and friendless child who comes may join his already leviathan family circle. For the last twenty years in succession he has made a great cast of the net by means of a wonderful New Year's gathering in the Edinburgh Castle. On Wednesday evening last week the interesting and attractive experiment was once more repeated. For more than a week before skilled workers had been visiting every unsavoury corner of neglected London. The transfer of a ticket for a grand entertainment and supper at once excited the anticipation of these boy and girl waifs on the stream of London life.

The invited guests duly came, and nearly as many more, on the chance of there being a corner that could be filled up. What a change from the cold miserable street to the bright warm hall and the cheerful music! As to behaviour, no fault could really be found with the interesting company; the combined influence of the Ragged School and the Board School was noticeable to all who had seen a successive series of such suppers.

As to the quality of the guests, it must be said that the bidders to the feast had done their duty. The one consolation was that the children were largely unconscious of their misfortune. There is very little difference between a child that was half washed six weeks ago and one that was never washed. As to ages, there were some who looked as young as six, the majority were between twelve and fifteen, while a few were much older.

Dr. Barnardo's arrangements were prompt and generous. The sound of the bugle kept the numerous stewards in harmony, mugs were filled and replenished, and eatables supplied as directed. After everyone seemed to have had more than enough, thanksgiving was sung, and Dr. Barnardo proceeded to take further hostages towards good behaviour. Last of all, he said deliberately that he wished all to think of him as their friend, and as representing a lot of friends who were not present. Every boy was invited to stay behind who needed a helping hand.

There was no doubt that the boys understood the import, and the importance of the announcement. There is one about sixteen who whispers that he means to wait. Did he wish to go to Canada? No; he wouldn't leave mother. Father was dead. He had been street-cleaning for two years, but was now too big for that work. Would the Doctor get him a situation so that he could work for mother? There are two lads who, evidently, have made a grave decision. Where had they been working? At the docks—work one day and none the next. They couldn't get enough to eat. Would the Doctor send them to Canada? 'And what sort of place was it?' this promised well; there was deliberation and forethought in these would-be emigrants. Another had trumped from Liverpool, working en route, as he would find the chance. Having reached London, he was starving, and if the Doctor would not have him, he was without resource; and so on and so on.

While these personal details were being gleaned, a beautiful object lesson in kindness was being given, Madame Clarence was showing what wonderful things she could do with her doves. They were under no control, yet not one attempted to fly away. They drove little carriages, manœuvred on bicycles, and performed all manner of tricks undreamt of before. Then came performing dogs, and the children shouted with wonder. The little folks certainly enjoyed themselves. Last of all came the lantern, and pictures that were calculated to make the mouth of every homeless boy water. To see the photograph of a lad as he first presented himself in his misery at the Home, and then to see him after the industry of years had effaced all marks of his evil days, was a bait that surely no right-minded lad could reject.

When the time for parting came, many took the turning that led to investigation, and the door of the Homes, to follow the host of 28,500 boys and girls who have already experienced social salvation, through these grand institutions promoted and sustained by Christian philanthropy.

The McAll Mission in Straits.

DEAR SIR,—Since the death of its founder there has been a considerable diminution in the contributions, so that last month there was a deficit of 53,000 francs, £2120. The committee consider the financial condition of the Mission to be so serious as to necessitate the closing of several halls.

The work is a very worthy one, the aim being to win converts for Christ, and then to pass them on to the French Protestant Reformed Church. I can speak from personal knowledge of the work in Toulouse, one town in which the committee have decided to close the three halls, in which hitherto evangelistic services have been conducted five times, and religious instruction given to the young twice weekly. The people in Toulouse feel very deeply in the matter, and have been and are still making efforts locally to induce the committee to recall their decision; but the work being almost solely among the poor, large funds cannot be raised. There are 120 such halls throughout France, doing a very useful work. Donations may be sent to Colonel Finch White, 112, St. Martin's-lane, London, W.C., the London office of the Mission.

Should any friends prefer to take collecting cards, these can be procured for them.—Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR H. BLANDFORD.

Westgate College, Westgate-on-Sea.

[It would be a great calamity for this work to be curtailed; France needs the Gospel.—Ed.]

Nurses for South Africa.

It is a sad fact that while there is apparently a grand sphere for such as love the Lord Jesus Christ to serve Him amongst the poor in our hospitals, yet the nurses find they have so little opportunity of speaking for Him to the patients. Such is not the case with those who nurse in connection with The South Africa General Mission. The headquarters are at the Nurses' Home, Cape Town, where there are vacancies for qualified Christian nurses, both "general" and "obstetrical," with a wide field for Christian service, and knowledge acquired in our hospitals could be greatly utilised for Christ. Would our friends kindly make known this need? Particulars of salary, etc., of Mrs. Everett, 20, Streatham-hill, S.W.

Spitalfields Church Mission.—The third annual meeting in connection with the Spitalfields parish men and women's gatherings was held on Monday evening in Christ Church Hall, Hanbury-street. These gatherings are held on several evenings in the week and on Sundays. The services are short and bright, with plenty of singing. The hall was crowded with men and women evidently belonging to the poorest and most destitute class. They heartily enjoyed the substantial tea with which the proceedings commenced. The chair was taken by Rev. J. H. Scott, the rector of Spitalfields. Rev. E. C. Collins gave an account of the work done at the hall during the year. This had been most successful. The services started in 1893 with only six men, but now there was a regular attendance of more than 200. They were unfortunately very much in need of funds. The Archdeacon of London said, "he hoped the mission would grow and increase, and be a great blessing to all." Other addresses followed.

Scottish Notes.

THE Saltcoats Homes for destitute Glasgow children have at present eighty-one inmates. During the past year fifteen have been sent to Canada and twenty-three sent out to home situations.

The death is recorded of Mr. Hugh Miller, son of the illustrious Christian geologist of that name. He was a young man of decided gifts, and deeply interested in questions bearing on the Christian faith.

A special mission, conducted during the past week at Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow, by Mr. W. J. Taylor, of the Evangelisation Society, has been a fruitful season. The effort is being continued through the present week.

Mr. Quarrier entertained to tea and supper some 2000 youthful street vendors one evening last week, in the National Halls, Gorbals, Glasgow. At the close of the proceedings he invited any fatherless boys or girls needing a home to apply to him.

The leaders of some of the Church Courts in Scotland have been expressing themselves on the chief national topics of interest at this crisis. In the Established and Free Presbyteries of Glasgow words have been spoken calling for national humiliation before God on account of national sins; deploring Turkish misrule and calling for intervention on behalf of the suffering Armenians, and deprecating the continuance of industrial strifes in our own country. The members of the Free Presbytery of Dundee have given utterance to similar sentiments.

At the noon-day prayer meeting in the Glasgow Christian Institute last week, Dr. Duff, Free St. George's, made reference to the crisis in the Transvaal. It was a matter for great consideration that so many Glasgow people were located in the Transvaal, and that there also a large number of devoted Christian ministers were labouring. The Colonial committee of the Free Church of Scotland had been sending out suitable young ministers to Johannesburg and other parts of South Africa. It seemed a matter of gratification to think that the confidence in the stability of the people was based, not on diplomacy, but on the conviction that their trained men of God were seeking in these troublesome and perilous times to wait on Him and to trust in Him alone.

Irish Notes.

THE late Mr. Geo. Thomson, of Belfast, has bequeathed £1000 each to the Sustentation and Foreign Mission Funds of the Presbyterian Church, £500 each to the Johnston Memorial Home for Presbyterian Orphans and to the new Presbyterian church at Broadway. He has also left £500 additional to the same church if his estate permits after providing for his widow.

The Week of Prayer at the beginning of the year has seldom been observed more widely or has been more largely attended than during the past week. The state of Armenia and the threatening aspect of our foreign relations were referred to again and again in the prayers that were offered as well as in the addresses delivered. United meetings were held in Belfast, Dublin, Derry, Waterford, Portadown, and various other centres.

Providence (Row) Refuge and Home.

THE work of the Providence (Row) Night Refuge lies amongst the very poorest. The homeless, destitute, and starving flock to its doors night after night to find shelter and sympathy. While there is room no bona fide applicant is turned away. No distinction is made of race or creed, the sole passport required being that of homelessness and destitution.

The statement of each applicant is taken down, and after the first night the case is inquired into by a committee of ladies and gentlemen, who, with the manager, receive no remuneration whatever. According to the merits of the case, the applicant is allowed to remain for days and even weeks, until work is found or a situation provided and a fresh start in life given. Each night nearly 300 persons are received, and the number of nights' lodgings, with suppers and breakfasts, given since the commencement has been over 1,200,000.

Besides the Refuge, there is a Home for Servants, who partly support themselves by work. There is also a Home where respectable persons out of situations are received and supported for a small sum per week, and there is a work-room for women staying in the Refuge. Rent has been paid and a small allowance given to mothers and children when the breadwinner has been laid low with fever, or otherwise been incapacitated for work. Clothes have been given to the ragged in order that they might take respectable situations once more. Such is the work of the Providence (Row) Night Refuge, and all are asked to enable the good work to be extended by subscribing to the funds. The manager is Mr. A. Purcell, Jamaica-buildings, St. Michael's-alley, E.C. (89)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of November 28 I read an interesting article on this subject by Rev. D. Burford Hooke, secretary of the Colonial Missionary Society. With the substance of that article I am in hearty accord, and trust the time is not far distant when not only in Johannesburg but in other up-country towns we shall have the presence of a godly evangelical preacher, sent to us from the home land to visit the centres of population from time to time. I can assure Mr. Hooke of the most cordial co-operation of the Y.M.C.A. here, and I think I can speak also for the other branches at Cape Town, Johannesburg, Ladysmith, Pietermaritzburg, and Durban.

We have concluded a Y.M.C.A. conference in Johannesburg, and the spiritual needs of the young men of our colony were deeply felt by each member of the conference. It was resolved to extend the work by endeavouring to establish branches wherever we could in South Africa. I was struck while in Johannesburg with the overwhelming number of young men to be seen all over the place. In the churches they seemed to form the larger part of the congregation, but I was told that there is only church accommodation for about 5000 of the people, and the white population is now supposed to number about 80,000; there is, therefore, ample scope for earnest workers.

I know of no better agency here to reach young men than the Y.M.C.A. In Johannesburg it is just beginning to make itself felt as a real power; in Kimberley we have been only started eight months, and in that time many a young man from home has found his way to our premises, and been helped in various ways. Young men from any land will find in the secretary of the Cape Town branch one of the best friends of young men in South Africa.

I would support Mr. Burford Hooke in cautioning young men who come here to be careful in their choice of companions. By all means let them come with letters to "Christian people, and especially to the Y.M.C.A., where they may always be sure of a hearty reception and good associations.—Yours faithfully,
JOHN KENT, General Secretary.
Y.M.C.A., Kimberley.

RECOGNITION IN HEAVEN.

DEAR SIR,—The letter of W.G.W. under this heading in THE CHRISTIAN of Jan. 9th, who seems to question recognition in heaven, seems to require a voice from the other side. I cannot myself conceive it possible that our existence in the next world can be without our individuality, identity, and memory, as without these three requisites, it seems very clear to me that we must practically be fresh and new existences "altogether; and to what purpose then does Paul tell us that Christ when He comes will bring all his saints with Him. "Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (1 Thess. iv. 18).

Comfort one another! Why, what comfort is in it, if there be no memory, and no recognition? And to what purpose, I may ask, is life here at all, and its varied training; and, if all be to be forgotten, even that wonderful mystery of love, man's redemption, if there be no memory hereafter? I believe, on the contrary, that our memory hereafter will be far more clear and piercing than it is now. For our new bodies, through which we shall then work, will be perfect, and though, through these imperfect ones, memory is now often unable to recall events here, and even the heart's loving remembrance is dimmed by time, yet in the next age, when we shall be clothed, as our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ was after his resurrection, we shall be able to recall every act and circumstance and love of this life even as He did, for we shall be like Him (1 John iii. 2). And so, though the Lord Jesus Christ Himself will be to us all and everything, the one supreme Being of our heart's love, still, in a lesser sense, we shall know and love in Him all we have known and loved here, and with a still deeper love; and further, that we shall know and love everyone of the whole family and household of God.—Yours faithfully,
Jan. 11th, 1896. O.

DEAR SIR,—May I record in your valuable paper a few thoughts which have occurred to me upon the subject in question? Recognition implies and depends upon memory, individuality, and identity, therefore if these are retained recognition will result.

1. If I lose memory I forget the theme of the song of the Redeemed, I forget that there was ever a time when the Lamb of God died for me, and in forgetting the past the want of contrast makes the glory of heaven less splendid than it would appear to an eye that has seen the dimness of earth's best glory. No, I can never forget in heaven that I have entered into "my inheritance that fadeth not away," through being born again by "the blood of the everlasting covenant," the child of God, and a joint-heir with Christ.

2. My salvation depends upon my taking Christ as my individual Saviour, just as if (were none but I a sinner) He had died for me alone: with David I claim the "good Shepherd" as "my (own individual) Shepherd." And, with Paul, my striving is "that I may be found in Christ," so that when the justice of God demands "Where art thou?" his love may find me safely "hid with Christ" in my Father's heart. But it is I, as an individual, that deserve his wrath; it is I, as an individual, that am hid in his love. The Bible maintains individuality in the Day of Judgment (Rev. xx. 12); no one can answer for another's deeds.

3. In that day "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed," as Elijah was changed, but Elisha saw no change in his identity. Again, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," as Lazarus was raised from the dead, but unchanged in identity. It seems improbable that the power of God should fail to raise from corruption the identical features of any that have seen corruption. When I see in heaven the face of one who pointed me to Christ, memory tells me of one who showed me the "living way," and tells me that he is one among the many millions of the redeemed, and memory, again, shall tell me that yonder was his face. Shall I know "the door" and not know the sign-post? Shall I recognise the scarred hands and wounded side of Him who died for me, and not behold again with praise the saints who "bear yet in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus"? E. V. K.

WILLIAM GRIMSHAW OF HAWORTH.

SIR,—We have been hearing very much lately about Haworth and the Brontës. Not only have publishers been making a great "boom," through advertisements in the Press, and through the noisy men of letters on the top of the bookselling booths in Vanity Fair, but a lecturer has actually appeared at the Royal Institution, where Davy and Faraday, Tyndall and Sidney Smith used to delight the public. The latest evolution we hear of is the establishment of a "National Museum" by the "Brontë Society" at Haworth. At the opening of this museum a letter was read from Sir T. Wemyss Reid, in which it was said that now due honour would be paid to "commanding intellect and magnificent genius." More was said about "that noble band of thinkers and writers who had broken the bonds of narrow conventionalism which had so long fettered English thought!"

Now, we are much pleased to find that "Jane Eyre," and other Brontë books, although they can scarcely be regarded as "commanding intellect and magnificent genius," are still popular and widely read, for they are immeasurably better than most of the trashy novels that please the present generation.

But is it not strange that, amidst all this hubbub about Haworth, the name of William Grimshaw is utterly ignored? Since Mrs. Gaskell wrote the Life of Charlotte Brontë, I have not seen one reference to him, though he was the great apostle of that Yorkshire region. When he became incumbent of Haworth, in 1742, the people were as ignorant and barbarous as heathens. For twenty-one years he laboured among them, and by his means the whole region was civilised and Christianised. There had been no services in Haworth Church for three years before his arrival. After a time, the rough people used to come from twenty miles round, over moor and mountain, in winter weather. He enlarged the parish church at his own cost, and even then the crowds were so great that he usually had to preach in the open air.

John Wesley was his intimate friend, and Whitefield often preached there. Charles Wesley wrote two of his beautiful hymns when the good man died; and many were the ballad elegies, printed like broadsheets, that were sold in the West Riding, expressing the deep sorrow that was felt. His memory was long had in honour. In after years

John Newton, of Olney, in one of his letters to Cowper, says, "Haworth is one of those places which, like the fishing towns of Galilee, owe all their celebrity to the Gospel."

There was a biography of William Grimshaw in the catalogue of the Religious Tract Society, and may be there still. In The Athenæum about thirty-five years ago there was a leading article reviewing "Life of Grimshaw," by R. Spence Hardy, and giving a five-column notice of a man who "deserved commemoration." In that Athenæum I find the following anecdote:—

"The Archbishop came to hold a confirmation and desired Grimshaw to preach from a text he gave him, that he might judge if his doctrines were irregular. The sermon was just such as he preached among the mountains. The Archbishop heard it and warmly thanked him, wishing there were more like him!" This man was the predecessor twice removed only, of Rev. Patrick Brontë, the father of Currer Bell and her two sisters. Everybody has heard of Haworth, but very few in our days have heard of William Grimshaw. Let him once more be remembered with honour, though his portrait may not adorn the walls of the National Museum of Haworth!

JAMES MACAULAY, M.D.

American Notes.

MESSRS. STEVENSON AND BELL have met with much encouragement in a mission at Clinton, Mass.

Messrs. Whittle and Burke have closed a season of fruitful Gospel services at Kalamazoo, Mich.

A National Purity Congress has held an important meeting in the city of Baltimore for the repression of vice, the rescue of the fallen, the protection of the young, and the enforcement of the law of purity on men, equally with women.

Mr. Joseph Cook has returned to America from the Orient in broken health. He was on a lecture tour in Japan when, on account of nervous prostration superinduced by overwork, he was constrained to cancel his engagements and return home.

An unusual occurrence was the reception in the communion of the Church on confession of her faith, and as a recent convert, of a woman ninety-four years old. It was in connection with the December communion of the First Presbyterian Church of Nyack, N.Y. She was consecrated to God by her parents in prayer as an infant—prayers answered after more than ninety years.

A very interesting account appears in one of the New York dailies of a service held by Mr. I. I. Sankey, at the Y.M.C.A. hall in Twenty-fourth street. The evangelist was greeted by a large congregation, whom he delighted, as of yore, by his sweet and powerful song, as well as by a Gospel address. In conversation with a press representative Mr. Sankey is reported to have said: "Mr. Moody and I have now an invitation to visit London the coming year, and I have no doubt we would have repetition there, and through England, Ireland, and Scotland, of our old successes. I do not yet know whether we shall accept the invitation. I should like to go over there once more. What a pity would be for us to have war with these people; but war with them, I believe, is impossible. We are one. We are a Christian people of one family, and if we have our little differences over trifles sometimes, they are family differences, and the time past for bloody feuds in Christian families."

Treats to Jewish Children.

On Tuesday last week about a thousand Jewish children of all ages were entertained in the Hebrew Conference Hall, Old Montague-street, E., by Mr. and Mrs. Ehrlich, whose Gospel and temperance work among them has been so greatly blessed for many years past. The Christmas tree was a feast for the eyes, and the articles taken from it much gladdened the little ones. Christian hymns were sung with much heartiness, and addresses by several friends listened to with marked attention.

A number of poor Jewish children attending the Sunday-schools held in connection with the Barbican Mission to the Jews were on Wednesday last week entertained to their annual New Year's treat at the Mission-house, 33, Finsbury-square. After tea portions of Holy Scripture which they had learnt during their attendance at the school were recited, and quite a half-a-dozen repeated the whole of Isaiah liii. The contents of a large Christmas-tree were afterwards distributed amongst the children, who are the cause of much encouragement to Mrs. Lipschitz and the lady missionary.

The Y.W.C.A.

LADY HOPE and Mr. T. A. Denny were among the speakers at the thirtieth annual meeting of the Hove Institute, Brighton, held on the 9th inst. Viscountess Portman has again accepted the office of president of the London Association, and Mrs. F. A. Bevan and Miss Denny have been respectively elected chairwoman and vice-chairwoman of the council.

The quarterly meeting of the Liverpool Institute was held on the 7th inst. This branch is now the eldest in the district, and funds are needed in aid of improvements recently effected, affording increased social advantages to the members.

The annual Christmas tree and meeting for the members of the junior branch took place at the Percy Institute on the 3rd inst., when there was a large gathering. An earnest address was given by Miss Laura Barter. A tea and Christmas tree were provided on the 7th inst. for the children belonging to the Sunday Bible class.

The Y.M.C.A.

AN Association has been formed at Durban, Natal.

It is reported that the work at Devonport has been more solid and satisfactory during the past year than in any other period of its history.

The American Associations have joined in sending a general secretary to Tientsin, who has already arrived and is doing an excellent work.

The Penzance Association, with which Mr. J. B. Bolitho, M.P., is manifesting a very warm sympathy, has in contemplation the erection of a new building. Mr. Robert Burn and Mr. F. C. Bennett attended the public inauguration of the Redditch Association. Other speakers were Canon Newton and Col. Victor Milward, M.P. The work at this centre has made a very promising beginning.

The work of the Middlesborough Association has been greatly revived, during the past few months, owing largely to the efforts of the travelling secretary for the North of England and to the interest shown by Mr. Wayman Dixon, treasurer.

In a recent address to the Sydney Young Men's Christian Association, Dr. Saumarez Smith, the Primate of Australia, characterised gambling as a folly, a danger, and a sin, and besought his hearers for their own sakes, for the sake of others, their country, and their God, not to gamble.

The annual meeting of the Exeter Y.M.C.A. was the most largely attended and enthusiastic gathering ever held by that Association. The membership reported was 333, in good standing. A debt of £50 has been cleared off, and, during a very short time, no fewer than twenty-seven Sunday-school teachers had been sent to various churches in the city.

Meetings were held every evening last week by the Goldstream Y.M.C.A., in connection with the week of prayer. The first meeting was held on Sunday evening, in the hall of the Association. The preacher, Rev. P. Mearns, senior minister of the Vest U.P. Church, explained the nature of the Alliance, and the extensive range of its branches all over Christendom. He then spoke (1) of the name of the Divine Spirit; (2) his commission; and (3) his work. Addresses on the week evenings were delivered by Rev. Messrs. Elder, Rutherford, Caldwell, and Mearns; and Mr. E. Johnston.

On Thursday evening upwards of 200 members and associates of Hackney Y.M.C.A. attended the New Year's social reception by the president, Mr. J. E. Tanner. During the evening there were musical selections by the Royal United Temperance Handbell Ringers, also distribution of prizes, and brief addresses by Dr. Gritton and Mr. Charles Cox. Many young men rose to testify to the fact that the Association had been the means of their conversion. Between thirty and forty new members and associates were introduced. Every member of the recent ambulance class (nearly thirty in number) succeeded in obtaining a certificate.

At the monthly meeting of the National Council, which was held at Exeter Hall on Friday afternoon, Mr. Frank Anderson, of Exeter College, Oxford, who has been selected by the National Council as Y.M.C.A. student worker for the Bombay Presidency, tendered the thanks of the British College Christian Union to the Council for the hospitality shown by the Y.M.C.A. to the great conference of students recently held in Liverpool; and, in the matter of the closer co-operation which has been decided upon as between the B.C.C.U. and the Y.M.C.A., reported that the committee of the former thought it possible that, on their part, they might strengthen the relations between the two bodies: (1) by inducing students to conduct missions in the associations; (2) by advising their members to join local Y.M.C.A.'s; and (3) by recommending the Y.M.C.A. secretariat as a sphere of work for promising men connected with the Union. These suggestions were cordially endorsed by the Council, and will be developed, in connection with other plans for co-operation, to be further considered by the two organisations.

Christian Endeavour.

THE Christian Endeavour Society at Southernhay Church, Exeter (Rev. Justin Evans), reports 184 members.

The Society of Christian Endeavour, Ragged School, Chesterfield, held its annual tea on New Year's day. Mr. Herbert Taylor very kindly gave forty of the most destitute boys in the town tickets for tea. The usual monthly consecration meeting was held, conducted by Messrs. Fisher and Hearnshaw, and the Misses King and Wildman.

One of the most important branches of work carried on by the Endeavour societies in the States, is in connection with the prisons. At Pittsfield, Mass., the Union looks after all discharged prisoners: at the penitentiary at Santa Fé, New Mexico, a society has been formed; in the Kentucky State Prison at Eddyville, the societies of the neighbourhood held a meeting at the invitation of the prison Endeavour Society, and more than 400 persons expressed their desire to lead a better life, while 100 professed conversion. Similar work is done in Texas.

Obituary.

MR. VALENTINE, HERNE BAY.

THIS aged saint, who has just passed away in retirement at Herne Bay, was for many years secretary of the late Rev. Charles Graham's church in Shepherd's Bush. He has lived to see a large family grow up around him, all serving the Lord, and for this he was full of praise. It is not easy to ascertain the exact details, but it is understood that Mr. Valentine was one of the first few who knelt with Mr. George Williams at the first meeting out of which the Y.M.C.A. grew.

MR. MATTHEW BURNETT.

Although it has been generally known that this evangelist has been in weak health for some time, few would be prepared to hear of his death. Some weeks ago he went north to his native district, and now we hear he has passed away at Stainton Dale, near Scarborough. For nearly thirty years he had done good and useful service in the cause of Gospel temperance. As we stated in a sketch of his life given some time ago in our pages, his special work was done in Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand. In earlier years, 1861 to 1863, he did good work among the miners of Cumberland. After he returned from the Antipodes (in 1890) he laboured in his old way as much as possible; but his bodily strength was failing, and now his work is over. Many who owe much to his labours will mourn his departure.

ARCHBISHOP GREGG.

Much regret was felt in Armagh on Saturday morning when it was announced that Dr. Gregg, the Archbishop of the diocese and Primate of the Irish Episcopal Church, had passed away during the night. He was the younger son of the famous Dr. John Gregg, of Dublin, and afterwards for several years Bishop of Cork. He was appointed incumbent of Christ Church, Belfast, in 1859, and Bishop of Ossory in 1875. In 1878, on the death of his father, he was translated to the bishopric of Cork, and a little more than two years ago, on the death of Archbishop Knox, he was translated from Cork to the Archbishopric of Armagh and Primacy of all Ireland. He was remarkable for his humility, his common-sense, and his business capability. He was a plain, good man, who impressed all who heard him or came in contact with him with his simple earnestness, evangelical fervour, and purity of heart and life. His end was rather sudden, but not unexpected.

Servants' Home.—The Men-Servants' Home, 14, Sloane-terrace, Chelsea, London, S.W., is now twenty-nine years old. God has signally blessed it. Many men while in the Home seeking situations have been led to Christ and gone forth to witness for Him in the houses of the nobility and gentry. The last quarterly meeting held at the Home was attended by a great number of men and women servants; to hear their fervent prayers and praises and exhortations to one another to go forward in the Christian walk was very stimulating. Many letters were read from absent ones in the country, etc., and even from S. Africa, S. Australia, Cairo, and Canada; some letters told of blessings received during the past year. Further information may be had from Mr. Goodchild, 14, Sloane-terrace, London, S.W. A.M.

Personalia.

Mr. Richard Weaver is very unwell. He writes:—"The doctors do not seem to do me any good, so I have to look to the Great Physician."

Rev. J. Gelson Gregson's address during his visit to India will be care of Messrs. Thomas Cook and Son, Old Court House-street, Calcutta.

The Bechuana chiefs were given an enthusiastic welcome at Capetown, where, the day after their arrival, a public meeting was held in their honour.

Rev. Dr. Kerr, who for several years past has acted as honorary secretary of the Scottish Protestant Alliance, has resigned the secretaryship of the Association.

President Kruger.—General Botho, when in South Africa, had a long interview with the President of the Transvaal Republic, and was much impressed by his simplicity. He found the President "quite of a religious turn of mind, and rejoiced to know that he frequently preached at Johannesburg."

Rev. John Fleming M'Swaine, Moderator of the Federal Assembly of the Presbyterian Churches of Australia and Tasmania, is expected in this country at the end of February. It is understood that the object of his visit to England is to consult a London physician with reference to a throat affection from which he is suffering.

Mrs. E. W. Whittemore, whose portrait we recently gave, and whose rescue work in New York, the "Door of Hope," has been much blessed, expects to reach this country on a visit about the end of the month. She will be glad to receive invitations to conduct meetings in halls or churches, and to speak of her work, as well as on foreign mission work generally. Letters should be addressed to our care.

Mrs. B'shop.—A letter has been received from Mrs. Bishop, who, writing from Seoul, the capital of Corea, under date November 6, said she was ready to start the following day into the interior. During Mrs. Bishop's absence from Corea, the Dora Bird Memorial Hospital, which she has erected in memory of her mother, was completed, and she was quite pleased with its appearance and internal arrangements. Mrs. Bishop expects to return in May next by way of America. In a previous letter, written from Ilkao, in Japan, she said she was benefiting much from the bracing wintry weather.

Evangelistic Notes.

Harwich.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh has completed an eight days' mission in the Public Hall. Much good has been accomplished.

Ireland.—Gospel meetings have been held in Agnes-street Presbyterian Church, Belfast, by Mr. J. Anderson; in Portstewart Presbyterian Church by Mr. S. G. Montgomery; in Bellaghy Methodist School-room by Miss Wakefield; at Blackwater town by Messrs. Shire and Deal; and at Belturbet Methodist Church by Mrs. Brown-Anderson.

High Wycombe.—Miss Groves has recently conducted mission services at Holmer Green, Loosley Row, Wycombe Marsh, and Speen. The mission lasted about ten days at each village, and large congregations have gathered. The churches have benefited by the services, and a considerable increase of membership is, writes a correspondent, expected to result.

Mr. Monro Collings has conducted a special mission at Bethany Hall, Caterham, with very good results. The time for the mission—the last few days of the old, and first few of the new—was considered rather unfavourable for getting large meetings, but, happily, these fears were groundless. God has been speaking through his servant, and using him mightily. The Earl of Carrick and Mr. J. W. C. Fegan are to conduct special services at the end of the month. For this, prayer is requested.

Soldiers' Home, Woolwich.—Mr. E. P. Telford has held a twelve days' mission at this Home, and many have been gathered into the kingdom. Every evening the congregation increased, the interest deepened, and we believe that a deep and lasting work has been accomplished by the Holy Spirit. On one occasion it was touching to see a young couple kneeling together seeking salvation; while another soldier and his wife who had only been married three days were among those who found the Lord. Many members of the mother's meetings, as well as soldiers and civilians, have already given evidence of having received new life from above. At the watch-night service the hall was crowded, and the meeting was one not soon to be forgotten. Intense thankfulness for God's goodness in the past, and a humbling sense of responsibility for life and service in the future, led God's own people to a truer consecration to Himself as the old year faded into the new, while some who had never responded to that loving invitation, "Come unto Me," surrendered to the Master as we knelt and sang, "Oh, take me as I am."

THE BOOK WORLD.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

The Regions Beyond. We welcome Vol. XVI. of this bright monthly, which, while surveying mission work in general, gives detailed accounts of the operations of the East London Institute and the Congo-Balolo Mission. The pages are admirably illustrated, and calculated to afford instructive and stimulating reading to all who are interested in evangelistic work in the wide world. (Partridge.)

The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit. Sermons preached by C. H. Spurgeon, revised and published during the year 1895. (7s. Passmore & Alabaster.) The discourses issued week by week during the past year are here gathered in a handsome volume, forming the forty-first of the series, and bringing the total number of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons up to 2445. In addition to the sermons, there are many expositions of Scripture, at once spiritual and practical, in conformity with all Mr. Spurgeon's work.

The Morning Star. This is the second annual volume of the "Herald of the Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ," edited by Dr. R. McKilliam. (2s. and 3s. 6d. A. Holness.) As a frontispiece there is a chart of the prophetic Seventy Weeks, by the late Sir Edward Denny, Bart. The contributors include Revs. J. S. Mabie, D.D., G. D. Hooper, and S. Schor; Pastor W. Fuller Gooch, and Messrs. Cheyne Brady, E. A. Rawlence, and W. Scott. Students of prophecy, to whatever school they may belong, will find many excellent Scripture studies in these pages.

CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.

Memorials of a Gracious Life, with the Diary and Letters of George Cowell. By his daughter Ruth. (W. H. & L. Collingridge.) Rev. James Ormiston writes a hearty introduction to this deeply interesting book. Mr. Cowell, of whom an excellent portrait is given as a frontispiece, was for forty-six years the contributor of "Wayside Notes" to The Gospel Magazine, and at length succeeded Dr. Doudney as editor of that venerable monthly. As a preacher of the Gospel he was also widely known, pen and tongue alike being devoted to the experimental enforcement of spiritual truth. At the bedside of the dying, in places of worship and rural mansions, he was ever ready to expound the Scriptures in such a way as to exalt Christ and provoke his hearers to humility of soul. He performed a gracious ministry during a long life of seventy-two years; and Miss Cowell has not only made good use of the biographical materials at her disposal, but given some of his sermon outlines and Bible notes, as well as diary extracts and poems. The letters are in many cases very beautiful.

Edward Hoare, M.A.: A Record of his Life, based upon a brief Autobiography. Edited by Rev. J. H. Townsend, D.D., vicar of Broadwater Down, Tunbridge Wells. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.) In compliance with the express wish of the family, the life of Canon Hoare has been compressed into somewhat small limits. Much could have been said, and much would have been welcome, about such a remarkable man, distinguished in social relations and influential in Christian life and work. What has been brought together in this compendious volume is from the pen of a warm admirer of the Canon, once his curate, and for long years his firm friend. Every stage in the record is interesting: the Quaker origin, the University career, ministerial service at Pakefield, Richmond, Holloway, Ramsgate, and finally (for forty-one years) at Tunbridge Wells. Faithful to Scripture, and true to Reformation doctrine, the Canon was a power in the Evangelical section of the Church of England, while enjoying the respect of all parties and schools. Dr. Townsend gives most readable specimens of his correspondence, and a good idea of his wideness of Christian sympathy and organising and teaching power.

A pathetic interest attaches to the closing chapters, one of which describes the second illness and blindness of this revered servant of God. When, in 1888, at the age of seventy-six, failure of sight came on, Canon Hoare at once adjusted his life and duties to the new state of things, and in order that he might still teach "in words which the Holy Spirit teacheth," he began the task of learning the Bible by heart! This having been continued for some months, he yielded to the advice of others and learned to read the raised type prepared for the blind. For the remaining years of his life (he died in 1894) he thus kept up his acquaintance with Holy Scripture, and did not suffer blindness to stop his work. The Canon was a great worker and a powerful mission preacher, a man after the type of Simeon and Carus; and the excellent portrait given in this volume will enable many to recall the figure which was so long familiar at Church Congresses and clerical and missionary meetings.

Short Biographies for the People. The tenth volume of this admirable series contains comprehensive sketches, with portraits, of twelve worthies of ancient and modern times, including Granville Sharpe and Zachary Macaulay, George Herbert and John Berridge, John Macgregor and Horatius Bonar, Savonarola and Blaise Pascal. Each is well written, and the whole make a useful book. (1s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.)

Gleanings about Jesus Christ and Early Christianity. By J. H. Alexander. (2s. 6d. Nisbet.) The aim of this little work is to bring together, in a plain way, the testimony of ancient writings (apart from the Holy Scriptures) to the life of Christ and the planting of the Church. The performance is not equal to the purpose, the pages affording evidence of inadequate knowledge, lack of judgment, and carelessness in execution.

Present Day Tracts. vol. xiii. The essays in this volume include, "Life and Immortality brought to Light by Christ," by Dr. Wm. Wright; "Hereditry and Personal Responsibility," by Rev. M. Kaufmann, M.A.; "The Historical Deluge in its Relation to Scientific Discovery, and to Present Questions," by Sir J. Wm. Dawson; and "The Early Witness to the Four Gospels," by Rev. S. Walter Green, M.A. Other subjects relate to the unity and completeness of the Scriptures, and the Jews as witnesses to the Bible. The treatment, apologetic and evidential, is uniformly helpful, and the volume is equal in worth to its excellent predecessors. (2s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.)

Little Books on Religion is the title of a series of attractive and handy volumes, edited by Dr. Robertson Nicoll. (1s. 6d. each. Hodder & Stoughton.) Christ and the Future Life, by the late Dr. R. W. Dale, contains short and helpful chapters on John xiv. 1-6 and Acts iv. 33. The Visions of a Prophet: Studies in Zechariah, by Dr. Marcus Dods, combines exposition with practical lessons. The Seven Words from the Cross, by Dr. Nicoll, comprises finely conceived and carefully-expressed meditations on the dying utterances of our Lord. The Four Temperaments, by Dr. Alexander Whyte, is the most notable of the series from a subjective and ethical point of view. Nothing could well exceed the trenchant force and literary freshness of these homely yet profound homilies. The Upper Room, by Rev. John Watson, throws many beautiful and unexpected sidelights on one of the most memorable incidents of the Saviour's closing earthly days.

Under the Czar and Queen Victoria: The Experiences of a Russian Reformer. By Jaakoff Prelooker. (7s. 6d. Nisbet.) The author of this work is a Jew by race, and was for some years associated with a movement in Russia, known as "New Israel," the object of which was (to use his own words) "to unite a reformed synagogue with the reforming dissenters from the Greek Orthodox Church." He is now promoting in Great Britain a society for the promotion of Russian reformation, and this book would appear to have been written to enlist support for that undertaking. While carrying on propaganda in his own country for the recognition of "a common brotherhood of religion"—a somewhat hazy object to aim at—the author met with many hindrances, and at length sought freedom in exile. His story is not particularly exciting, and what he has to tell of the Molokans, Standists, Dukhobortsies, and other dissenters from the Orthodox Church, is somewhat slight. Yet the story is full of interest, and should arouse sympathy for Russia's millions, on the one hand kept down in ignorance, on the other disallowed liberty to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. The illustrations are numerous and excellent.

Requests for Prayer.—For blessing on the visit of Rev. Thomas Evans to various Baptist Chapels in Wales.—For a young men's Bible class.—For a mission by Mr. William Forbes at Gloucester, to commence on Sunday, 19th.—That God would restore to health a Christian solicitor, who is in a critical condition.

Young Abstiners' Union.—The annual gathering was held at the Queen's Hall, Langham-place, on Saturday. The chair was occupied by the president, Mr. T. F. Victor Buxton. The report, presented by Mr. Coots, stated that increased activity had been shown by the branches during the past year. The committee were, however, sorry to report a slight decrease in the total membership, the increase in certain sections of the society being outweighed in some branches by a constant decrease in the class of members ranging from sixteen years of age and upwards. After various addresses, and the report adopted, Mr. Fred. Smith (United Kingdom Band of Hope Union) gave a dissolving view lecture, entitled "The Temperance Sketch Book." Mr. and Mrs. Buxton afterwards provided tea for the members of the Union and their friends.

Temperance Notes.

MEETINGS to be addressed by Temperance veterans, known as the "Old Guard," are being arranged for different centres of London.

The Leicester Young Men's Gospel Temperance Mission have concluded a week's house-to-house visitation, distributing 1000 tracts, and taking 140 pledges.

Provost Hiddleston, of Annan, addressing a conference, said that in all his experience as a magistrate, extending over twelve years, he never remembered having a teetotaler before him.

On the recommendation of the magistrates, nearly all the public-houses in Edinburgh and Glasgow were closed on New Year's Day. The hotels and railway bars remained open, and did a roaring trade.

The newly-formed North Metropolitan Union of the British Women's Temperance Association announces its first bi-monthly conference and public meeting for Friday, January 24, at Rectory-road Congregational Church.

Dr. Charles A. Eastman's work in the Sisseton Indian reservation is reported as showing good results in its influence upon young men to keep them from the use of liquor and encourage them to develop individual character.

It is announced that on the eve of the meeting of Parliament a reception will be given under the auspices of the National Temperance League to the teetotal members of the new House of Commons, who number about forty-three.

The annual prayer and praise meeting of the Manchester Women's Christian Temperance Association and Police Court Mission was held on Wednesday, and was well attended. Addresses were delivered by Miss Roberts, of Tientsin, China, and Rev. F. Wainwright.

There was a large gathering of Band of Hope workers at the annual New Year's gathering in Exeter Hall. Mr. F. Smith, who presided, congratulated the audience on the position of the Union, remarking that they had doubled their membership in twelve years. The New Year's address was delivered by Rev. P. Watson, vicar of Earlsfield, and an address was also given by Dr. Lees.

When Sir William Harcourt introduced his Veto Bill, some Tory members were indignant that he should speak of intemperance as a curse affecting both rich and poor. Mr. James Whyte publishes figures to show that Sir William did not overstep the mark. He quotes from statistics compiled by an investigation committee of the British Medical Association to the effect that while labourers and artisans lose ten, nine, and thirteen per cent. respectively of their number through drunkenness, the independent classes lose upwards of twenty, the mercantile thirteen, and tradesmen sixteen per cent.

Two years ago he accepted the pastorate of Westborough Church, Maidstone, and was succeeded at the Memorial Hall by Rev. Henry Grainger.—At Hitchin, on 13th inst., Mr. JAMES HACK TUCK, well-known Quaker banker and philanthropist, who took great interest in the social life of the Irish peasant, did much valuable work in Ireland during the famine period, and helped largely in the distribution of seed potatoes when the crop failed a few years ago.

Hakodate, Japan.—Mr. Walter Andrews, of the C.M.S. writes:—"We are establishing a library here for the use of our Japanese clergy, catechists, and other workers. We should be so glad of any theological books of which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN may have no more further need. They would be valued here and be useful. Any books which the owners can spare us should be sent to the care of Mr. H. Malaher, Missionary Leaves Association, Islington, who will kindly forward them to us."

In these days, when native races are in danger of extermination, it is refreshing to read that in Canada the treatment of the Indians has been ideally just, and has produced the happiest results. Twenty years ago treaties were entered into with them which have been faithfully observed. Now they are tranquilised, and not only are free from discontent and disaffection, but are thoroughly attached to the white man's government. Could we everywhere learn to do simply what is right, we should find the need for self-defence pass away, and the heavy tax it inflicts would go with it, thus freeing us from oppressive burdens; besides which, we should have an increase of trade with people needing our goods, and living on kind terms with us. To protect and develop the native races would bring us increase of wealth.

Twelve hundred poor little people gathered together by the Ragged School Union were feasted at the Mansion House on the 18th inst. Praiseworthy attempts were made by the children to deport themselves in a seemly manner, but the use of forks puzzled many of them, and when the pudding arrived, most of the youngsters used their fingers only. All this may seem trivial, but it is also very pathetic, and brings home the dreadful condition in which so many of our poorest little brothers and sisters are reared in our very midst. All praise and honour to those who are at work among these outcasts, seeking to redeem them to a sense of the decencies of life and of the love of God for them. Those who do this "for the Name's sake" shall in no wise lose their reward.

The struggle of Christianity for pre-eminence is not only a conflict with false religious theories and wrong religious practices but, also, sometimes, with vested interests. Paul's difficulties at Ephesus with the makers of shrines for Diana are typical of Christian difficulties everywhere. The philosophies of India will be beaten long before the priests will discontinue the rites by which they gain their living. The most barren soil in India is at sacred places where the people live by means of the temples. The nations could gain universal peace to-day but for the men who have a pecuniary interest in upholding armaments; and temperance reform would be realised at once but for "the trade." The blow, to be effectual, must in every case fall on selfishness; or is the victory to be secured by gradually drawing away the little streams which feed the huge reservoirs of self-interest?

The after-glow of religion may be seen in the lives of many men and women who have either discarded religion as a personal guide and help, or who give it only a modified acknowledgment. The best that is in them comes from the fountain from which they turn away. Take from Carlyle the influence of the religion of his home, the thoughts and principles he imbibed there, and very little would be left. Macaulay used to say sharp things of Evangelicals. He first used the jibe "the bray of Exeter Hall"; but it was the stuff in his brave Presbyterian father and gentle Quaker mother that gave him his every quality of worth. Tyndall was brought up in a religious home. Spinoza, a lovable man personally, but the originator of speculations which trouble men's minds to this day, was trained by Jewish parents. Fichte and Kant were once candidates for the Lutheran ministry. It is not easy to step out of our past, or to shake off the influence of an all-pervading Christian atmosphere.

The appearance of Matthew Arnold's letters has raised again the old question of culture versus righteousness or religion. There ought to be no versus, and we believe there is none. Religion never is against true culture, the cultivation of the intellect in its proper sphere.

But culture is often turned against religion; that is to say, the depravity of the heart perverts and abuses the capacities of the mind. We know no more affecting sight than some of the efforts of mind when inspired and guided by true religion; such may be witnessed abroad in ten thousand homes where, until the Gospel came, there was the dense mental darkness and the degraded practices of heathenism. Mr. Arnold, who was a school inspector, would have had fewer schools even in England to inspect but for the elevating influence of the Gospel. Our peasantry and our working classes have, until very recently, been almost entirely dependent upon the churches and their auxiliaries for their mental food and stimulus. The Bible, never superseded, has prepared the collier to read our poets, our historians, and even our philosophers. The colliers of the North who have carried away the prizes of the University Extension Lectures owe nearly everything to the power of religion.

The cry is being raised that the new generation is soft and over sensitised. We think there is a good deal of truth in it, and that the softness is partly due to relaxed moral and spiritual teaching. Children are too often wheedled and petted, not ruled in wise love; men and women have been made to feel that they are conferring a favour on the Almighty if they listen to His call. The result is a pulpy condition, a very contrast to the resolute, enduring, daring men and women, who were trained in a firm belief in God's sovereignty. Whatever the faults of the old Calvinism, it did produce men of nerve and courage. We cannot accuse it of raising a generation characterised by any impatient unwillingness to do anything against the grain; it rather gloried in making everything go against the grain, thereby outraging nature sometimes. Hence probably the reaction of to-day. But another reaction is evidently beginning; let us hope to settle down into the safe middle course, in which we shall have men and women of firmness coupled with gentleness.

An attempt is being made to extend the usefulness of the Home Reading Union. At a meeting last week in the Mansion House, Sir John Gorst pointed out some significant facts showing the need of such an institution among the working classes. Inquiries made by the manager of the Ipswich Labour Bureau two years ago proved that out of some hundred unemployed youths, "only a few were able to read, and a still smaller number could write, while not a single boy could solve a simple arithmetical problem." These were mostly boys who had actually attended elementary schools up to the regulation limit, and some had passed the fifth and sixth standards. And yet in a few years they had forgotten everything for lack of keeping up the habit of reading. Any institution that could remedy such a lamentable state of things would be a boon. Ignorance and godlessness are nearly allied. The Home Reading Union, if once firmly established in the esteem of the working classes, would help greatly in preventing such ignorance.

But we believe the Sunday-school could do still more. It is a grievous calamity that at present it so largely fails to reach lads at the age when they are most in need of its teachings. The problem of how to adapt the Sunday-school to the needs of our growing youth ought to be faced more resolutely than it is at present. We are too content for the most part to lament the disappearance of the boys and girls just at the age when they are awaking to the temptations of life, instead of devising means to stem the tide of desertion. The nearest approach to a practical solution is found in the Christian Endeavour Society, especially in America. There the churches instead of (as with us) isolating each its own "Young People's Society" from its neighbours, affiliate it to one parent society, which has thus become a mighty national power for good.

Take, for example, the influence of the C.E. Society during the Chicago Fair in 1893. When the directors decided to open the Exhibition on Sundays, in defiance of Christian public opinion, the C.E. Society, tens of thousands strong, abstained en masse from visiting the Fair. Thus, besides contributing very heavily to the financial loss of the enterprise, it made the country feel that Christian opinion was not to be lightly esteemed. Only by cohesion could such a result have been achieved; and when our churches cast aside their insular prejudice, and follow suit, there will be less cause to lament the "leakage" of the youth of the land. "United we stand, divided we fall."

Reginald Radcliffe.

OUR readers will be glad to learn that the Memoir of REGINALD RADCLIFFE is nearing completion, and that the publishers hope to have the volume ready next week.

The name of REGINALD RADCLIFFE is so closely identified with the remarkable spiritual movement which took place in 1859 and subsequent years, that thousands in various parts of the world who were influenced by that awakening will welcome the portraiture of the man to whom, humanly speaking, they owe so much.

Others, again, who have listened to the story from the lips of their parents of the quickening power displayed by the Spirit of God in Great Britain during that period, will be glad to acquaint themselves with the details, as presented in this volume, of the mighty work which extended throughout the land.

REGINALD RADCLIFFE made the spreading of the Gospel the main purpose of his life. He was singularly apt in sowing the seed of the Kingdom, and remarkably successful in reaping the harvest. He always expected results from his preaching, and made preparation beforehand for the healing of those who would be wounded by the sword-thrusts of the Spirit of God through his utterances.

The courage, tact, and indomitable perseverance which he exhibited in his evangelistic tours both at home and abroad, as he laboured with intense earnestness for the salvation of his fellows, evinced a faith which

Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries, It shall be done!

Christian workers in various parts of the great vineyard will find not only a stimulus to their faith, but many practical suggestions for carrying on their work, in the story of the life of so eminent an evangelist as REGINALD RADCLIFFE.

Poor Convalescents.—The annual meeting of the society for the after-care of the poor when discharged from asylums, was held on Monday last at Aubrey House, Kensington. The report was very satisfactory. As many as 121 cases have been dealt with during the past year. The help given consists in providing them with a short period of rest previous to recommencing work, by placing them in a convalescent home or boarding them out in the country, and also in giving grants of money and clothing, and assisting them to find employment.

By MR. GEORGE MÜLLER.

WHEN the house was furnished and the helpers ready I gave notice that I should be in the vestry to receive applications for orphans. I waited half an hour after the appointed time, and was surprised that no one had come. I waited one hour and two hours, but no applicants came. I then left to go home, and on my way home I reflected. "I have prayed about everything—for a suitable house, for helpers, for money, for furniture, as to what should be provided, and God had answered all, but one thing I had never prayed for, viz., that God would give the orphans." I had taken it for granted that, with the many thousands of orphans in need, they would come. Thus the Lord was to teach me "in everything, by prayer and supplication, to make known my requests to God," and never to take anything for granted. On reaching my home, I went to my room and locked the door, and cast myself on the floor, asking God's forgiveness that I had not prayed about this. I examined my heart to see if there was vanity or self-seeking in working to establish an orphanage. Brethren had encouraged me to go on, but now I said, "Thou knowest, my heavenly Father, how I have searched my heart and desired only thy glory, but if now more glory will be brought to thy name by bringing all to naught, then, though I be put to shame, do it; but if otherwise, send me orphans to the praise of thy name." The next morning I received the first application, and in one month I had forty-two applications, while I had only room provided for thirty orphans.

When the third house was filled, all the money was gone. Then came days that I had been looking for, viz., days when God would be glorified by

ANSWERS TO PRAYER IN TIME OF NEED.

This was not the case a few times, or a hundred times. Thousands of times the day commenced with nothing to carry through the day, or nothing in hand from meal to meal, but God invariably helped. My most intimate wealthy friends never had a hint of our need, not one besides those actually engaged in the work, and who united with me in prayer. One day we had three prayer meetings from meal to meal for help, but I had to go home after the last prayer meeting with nothing in hand for the breakfast next morning (and we paid cash on delivery for everything). On reaching home, I expected to find something there, but there was nothing. The next morning I went down to the Orphan Houses early to see if anything had come in. When I arrived, my chief helper showed me £3 he had just received, between 6 and 7 a.m. The receipt of this sum in a time of such need was recorded in the next report, and after the report had been published, the donor came and said, "On the morning I gave the £3, I was expecting important letters at my counting house, and went down early in consequence; on my way it came to my mind, Should I not give something for the orphans to-day? but I decided to do so in the evening. Again the thought was pressed on my mind, Why cannot I do so now? still I went on, but after walking a mile further in the direction of my office, I could not go on, and turned back to walk at once to the Orphan House. When I had walked half a mile back, I stopped, and remembering my important letters turned again in the direction of my office, but once more I felt I could not go on, and then turned and went direct to the Orphan

House and gave the £3." This came before the milkman had arrived, and supplied our needs for the day. At another time we had four prayer meetings between each meal for the supply of the next, and at 10 p.m., because there was nothing in hand for the breakfast next day, I went home, hoping something had come in there; but no, there was nothing there. I went down between six and seven the next morning to share the need with my co-workers, and when not far from the Orphan House I met a gentleman who wished me "Good morning," and, after he had passed, came back after me and handed me some gold, and thus we were helped for that day. Another time I was taking my usual morning walk,

WE WERE THEN IN GREAT NEED.

I came to a certain turning and said, "Shall I go this way instead of the way I usually go?" I felt I must go the other way, when shortly afterwards I met a gentleman, a member of the Society of Friends, who, after shaking hands, handed me some gold. Now, I understood why God had inclined me to go home another way. Thus we went on, ever in need, but ever having our needs supplied, month after month, and one year after another.

Rallying Points.

IV.—CONFIDENCE.

"LET US COME BOLDLY UNTO THE THRONE OF GRACE."
Heb. iv. 16.

THE all-constraining incentive to this holy boldness is found in the remembrance of our great High Priest, the divine Man who was "in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (ver. 15). And truly there is no other thing so calculated to give us confidence in approaching the mercy-seat as the calm but certain knowledge that we there meet One who has Himself fathomed the deepest depths of temptation and sorrow, and has conquered in every battle with the adversary. One who, with profoundest sympathy, can gauge the power of the enemy and the weakness of the flesh, and who, in virtue of his own atoning blood, stands as our representative in the presence of God, with such words as these on his lips: "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me, and they have kept thy word... Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom Thou hast given Me."

"There is no office of Christ," says John Owen, "that Satan labours so hard to obscure as his priestly one. Satan cares little, comparatively, for Christ the Prophet and Christ the King as long as he can get men to forget Christ the Priest." And a well-known writer adds, "That Christ is carrying on the office of a Priest in heaven is the crown and glory of the Christian theology" (Bishop Ryle).

Let us come boldly, and let us ask largely, for He is purposed to do great things for us.

Coming "in his Name," it ill becomes us to stint our petitions, or to ask as if the Father grudged to give. Asking in the all-prevailing name of Jesus should surely mean this, amongst other things, that we ask as He would ask if He were the pleader; that we ask something which He, the blessed Son of God, can endorse, as worthy of the Father and of Himself.

We best please our fellow creatures perhaps if we ask but little at their hands, but the Almighty Giver loves to be entreated for great things.

"He giveth liberally and upbraideth not." He knows the greatness of the need, and wills to make his bequest in accordance with the largeness of our requirement. "Thou shalt see greater things" is the inspiring promise which should surely tempt us to larger demands upon his grace.

How terribly inadequate is man's response oftentimes. Our ability to give may be small, or interest and sympathy may be lacking, so that the help rendered may seem so hopelessly out of proportion to the requirements of the case as to remind us of the little girl who wrote, we are told, a letter to her pastor after this fashion:—"I hear that you wish to build a large church, so I send you twopence-half-penny, and when you want more let me know."

But with God are boundless resources, and boundless is his delight in giving. "My grace is sufficient for thee" bears any stress we may put upon it. It is only our own faithlessness which limits the supply. "Ye have not, because ye ask not" (James iv. 2).

For his honour's sake, and for the sake of this poor sin-stricken earth, "let us come boldly," and plead as we have never pleaded yet. "Let us come boldly" for our nation, in these days of darkness and upheaval (not forgetting, either, to recognise in any lifting of the clouds his answer to our appeal). For the heathen world "let us come boldly," and for the various forms of sin and suffering around us. For the Church of Christ, assailed on the right hand and on the left hand, and yet, alas! most of all assailed from within; yea, for the Church of Christ "let us come boldly" to the Great High Priest, who alone can effectually deal with her necessities and extremities.

And then, for ourselves, for our dear ones, for many another near and tender claim which presses upon our hearts individually, "let us come boldly," for we have the Divine warrant so to do. Let us "come boldly," above all for fulness of spiritual blessing. "Why should you live any longer an impoverished life? The whole Godhead is within your reach. God gives you Himself when you receive his Son. What more can the human spirit need than the fulness of the blessed God? Is there not light and heat enough in the sun for one violet?" (Rev. I. B. Meyer).

Shall our tardy feet for ever hold back from "running" in the way of his commandments? Are we content to abide in spiritual poverty? Will not the Israel of God "possess their inheritance" on the resurrection side of Jordan? Let us for all these things "come boldly to the throne of grace," and who shall foretell the result?

Here below, grace is the guerdon of the "lowly." It is, for the most part, in unobtrusive ways and quiet haunts that its fragrance is known.

Through the strait gate of life she passes
With sandals on her feet.

The most gracious purposes of the most gracious human hearts are necessarily limited and circumscribed. But here, in Christ Jesus, grace is enthroned. Here only can it wear its regal robes, and sway its royal sceptre. From the "throne of grace" is there, then, aught too great to expect? "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." "Therefore let us come boldly."

All skirts extended of thy mantle hold,
When angel hands from heaven are scattering gold.

LUCY A. BENNETT.

Much feeling has been aroused in Ireland because the Postmaster-General has thought fit to remove Mr. Ralph Sampson from the assistant postmastership in Sligo, and transfer him to another town solely on the ground that a member of his family let lodgings in their private house to the agents of the Open-air Mission, the only object of which is to preach the Gospel to all without distinction of class or creed.

Letters from Africa.—I.

I AM very much of a fair-weather sailor. Once a friend sailed from Boston, and I from Quebec at the same time. He had storm and fog; I had neither. Sometimes there had been a storm the day before we started, sometimes the day after our arrival; but in sixteen passages across the Atlantic I have never encountered any seriously bad weather.

I intended in former letters to have mentioned our remarkable passage in the Cunard steamer Lucania, leaving New York on Saturday, September 14, and arriving in Liverpool at five on the following Friday afternoon, enabling passengers to reach London the same night. There was neither fog nor storm, and the distance from Queenstown to Liverpool (240 miles) was run in ten hours—a record passage. The vessel was run at the high speed of twenty-four miles an hour to enable her to clear the bar at the mouth of the Mersey before the tide fell too low, and to obviate the necessity of passengers being transferred to a tender in the Channel.

The voyage to the Cape is not accomplished at such high rates of speed, and the passage of The Moor, of the Union Line, which left Southampton on Saturday, December 7, for Capetown, was a somewhat disappointing one. We carried the Christmas mails, and it was intended and hoped that they should be landed on Tuesday, Christmas Eve. We had, however, to stop on the day after we left Southampton, and again on the following day, for some trifling repairs, which occupied together from three to four hours, and on Saturday morning (December 14) about 2.30 the top of the high pressure cylinder gave way with a noise which awakened light sleepers and startled those who were awake. This caused a stoppage of twenty-seven hours, and put an end to the hope of reaching Capetown on Tuesday, and as we continued our voyage at the moderate speed of twelve to fourteen knots an hour, we did not arrive at Capetown until Friday, December 27, at two o'clock.

We had everything to be thankful for as to weather; notwithstanding a little rolling in the Bay of Biscay, and a strong gale from the south-east as we neared the Cape, we had a most favourable passage. On the American liners the captain has to be constantly on the bridge, and often he and his officers have a most anxious time; but here the weather is generally so fine that the officers' duties are far less severe.

But whether the voyage be to America or the Cape, gambling is common to all the steamers. Some promising and capable young men, as well as some used up old ones, will generally be found to throw all their juvenile or senile energy into pools and sweepstakes, and some who would think it beneath their dignity to sell an honest loaf for an honest sixpence, are quite at home in auctioneering speculations to the highest bidder, and in collecting gambling debts with punctuality and despatch.

A young fellow buys a number, for a shilling, in a sweepstake as to the day's run. The number is put up to auction, and he bids for it up to, say fifteen shillings, but as he cannot afford another shilling he refrains, and it is knocked down for sixteen shillings to the next bidder, and proves the winning number. Another, presumably able to back his opinions to any extent, wins the sweepstakes twice, clearing £20, less or more, by the transactions. One day the pool amounted to £30.

As I was journeying to Northfield in the summer a fellow passenger by the Umbria made use of some forcible expressions in censure of the gambling he had witnessed on board that vessel, and energetically hoped that Prebendary Webb-Peploe, or somebody else, would write to the papers about it. If the subject is mentioned here, one is reminded how common it is on land, and the moral was pointed to me, by one who knew, by reference to the annual fêtes at a town in the Eastern counties, where archery practice takes place under mere chance conditions, in the profits of which the school funds of the Church and the Wesleyans participate; the gains being devoted to keeping a Board school out of the town. The case, as I was informed, was brought before the Wesleyan Conference, and participation in such profits was prohibited. But the local Wesleyans, a backslidden tribe of "the people called Methodists," proved recalcitrant and disobedient, and went on their own way in spite of the wise and righteous counsels of Conference. They also ungenerously made themselves disagreeable to the faithful man of business who appealed to Conference against the gambling and other disreputable means of raising money for "Christian" work.

I have daily conversation with Rev. Andrew Murray, which is as enjoyable as it is profitable. He is a man of prayer, and his prayers at our Bible-readings are not the least edifying part of the exercise. Those who have known him long at home in Africa, speak of him as a saintly man; and those around him on board ship talk of the quiet and holy influence of his life. The test of men which I find myself applying, more perhaps than any other, is the question whether one would like to be shut up in a barren island with them; and I think that a companion like Andrew Murray, in such a solitude, would bring one daily nearer God.

We had daily Bible readings, with Rev. Andrew Murray, for about three-quarters of an hour each morning, beginning and ending with prayer. There are several Christians on board, and about a dozen, sometimes more, met each morning to read the 1st Epistle of John, in the second-class saloon.

By-the-way, the second-class accommodation is good, and the passengers have but slight experience of roughing it. Anything of this kind (at least in such weather as we experienced) in the second or even third class, is likely to arise more from any black or brown sheep among the passengers themselves than on account of the accommodation: though eight in a cabin may probably infringe the counsels of perfection of the Board of Trade.

Miss E. A. Holt, one of the passengers seeking a warmer climate for the winter, is the youngest daughter of the late Hon. Thomas Holt, a retired Australian merchant, formerly a member of the Government and then of the Legislative Council of New South Wales. His large-hearted Christian philanthropy, exercised in many ways, notably in providing dinners and other comforts for thousands of the poor of England, will be remembered by our readers (see THE CHRISTIAN, Sept. 28, 1888). Miss Holt is accompanied by Miss Jacob, a Mildmay deaconess, to whom a sister deaconess gave a text, not knowing that she was about to undertake a voyage. The words were from Psa. cxxxix. 9, 10: "If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." An illuminated copy was hung up in their state-room, and as they awaked in the morning it was God's first fresh word to them. The giver did not know what the Spirit of Christ which was in her did signify when she was led to choose this appropriate and encouraging message, but He knew who holds the waters in the hollow of his hand; and "he that is wise and will observe these things (these continually recurring tokens of his remembrance of us), even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord."

I took the opportunity of the enforced leisure of the voyage to read Mrs. Oliphant's "Memoir of Laurence Oliphant and of Alice Oliphant his Wife." A painful and pathetic interest attaches to the name of this brilliant man from the time of his extraordinary and infatuated submission of his whole being to the directorship and dictatorship of Thomas Lake Harris, "the obscure Swedenborgian preacher, the uncultured American, who thus assumed over him the authority of God Himself." This was exercised in his absence as well as his presence, and its character and extent may be understood from the following extract from one of Mr. Oliphant's letters:—

"Father's presence is an awful pressure, though it is a blessed one. Because he feels our states so terribly, the watchfulness over ourselves has to be unceasing. So it should be always, but somehow I am so miserably finite, and I do not realise the Divine presence checking me so much as the human one."

On this Mrs. Oliphant, the author of the Memoir, remarks: "Hence, by that subtle influence of 'feeling their states so terribly,' the prophet kept them in awed subjection while in his presence, as well as absolute obedience out of it—a sway scarcely comparable to any other tyranny known to man..."

"But the possession of a power like this, so much beyond that which should be entrusted to any man, must be more demoralising to the holder of it than to its subjects. They suffered loss, and were subjected to much keen and some contemptuous criticism; . . . whereas their prophet could do nothing but fall, fall, from his high estate, into the abyss where broken idols and exploded pretensions must infallibly go."

This reminds me of the words (I think of Sheridan) concerning "that which always does and always must corrupt and degrade the human heart—despotic power."

Of all despotisms spiritual despotism is the most corrupting and the most degrading; and if there is need, as there is in these days, to assert the right and duty of private judgment against all who seek dominance over it, there is no less necessity to warn all despots that the degradation which such tyranny inflicts falls more fatally upon themselves than upon their victims.

Another and more pleasant passage from this book will delight my dear friend, Miss Fanny Crosby, as well as all who know her beautiful hymn referred to, or the child-like faith which it expresses:—

"A day or two before his death he called his faithful nurse early in the morning, probably in that rising of the energies which comes with the brightness of the day, and told her that he was 'unspeakably happy.' 'Christ has touched me; He has held me in his arms. I am changed; He has changed me. Never again can I be the same, for his power has cleansed me; I am a new man.' 'Then he looked at me yearningly,' she adds, 'and said, "Do you understand?"' As he lay there dozing, smiling, with the look of this exultation never leaving his face through the long last hours that followed, he was heard to hum and sing in snatches the hymn, 'Safe in the arms of Jesus.' Who knows where he had learnt it? Perhaps at some American revival or camp meeting, where the keen observer would catch up unawares, and with a smile at himself the homely strain, which thus floated back to the memory of the dying—the hymn of the humblest believer, the simplest certainty of a faith unencumbered with any new lights."

The only new light which any sinner needs is the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

I am going to spend New Year's Day with Mr. and Mrs. Murray and their family at Wellington.

R. C. MORGAN.

Kentish Town, N.W.—The New Year's meeting of the Dickinson-street (L.C.M.) Hall was held on Wednesday week. Mr. John Griffin Chalk, the missionary who presided, told of the triumphs and struggles of the work. Much encouragement was felt by all.

An Eye on Heaven.

By THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

A WISE man who is setting out for a foreign country—especially if he intends to reside there—will study the localities in that land, and seek to become acquainted with the language and the customs of its people. His thoughts will be much upon it. But do the great majority even of true Christians spend much time or thought about heaven? Yet it is to be their dwelling-place through innumerable ages. At no distant day—perhaps within a few days to some of us—the veil that hides the eternal world may drop, and the gates of the Father's house may open before our astonished vision! If heaven is ready for Christ's deemed people, then surely they should be making ready for heaven.

We ought to be thinking more about our future and everlasting home. If our treasures are there, then our hearts should be there also, in frequent and joyful anticipations. John Bunyan tells us of his Pilgrim that "his heart waxed warm about the place whither he was going." This world is not our rest. It is only our temporary lodging place, our battle ground to fight sin and Satan, our vineyard in which to labour for our Master and our fellow-men until sundown, our training-school for the development of character and youth in grace. A thoroughly spiritual person who makes Jesus Christ real and the powers of the world to come real, and who has set his affections on things above, must inevitably have some deep meditations about his home and his magnificent inheritance. He loves to read about it, and gathers up eagerly the few grand, striking things which his Bible tells him about the jasper walls and the gates of pearl, and the trees that bear twelve manner of fruits, and the crystal streams that flow flashing from beneath the throne of God. Among his favourite hymns are "Jerusalem Golden," and the "Shining Shore"; they are to him like rehearsals for his part by-and-by in the sublime oratorios of heaven. Sometimes when cares press heavily, or bodily pains wax sharp, or bereavements darken his house, he gets homesick, and says: "Oh, that I had wings like a dove; when would I fly away, and be at rest!"

Such devout meditations do not prove any man or woman to be a dreamy mystic. They are not the pious sentimentalisms of mourners to whom this world has lost all its charm, or of enthusiasts whose religion evaporates in mere emotion. The hundred-handed Paul constantly reminds his fellow-workers that their "citizenship is in heaven." The bodily Samuel Rutherford, who was said to be always studying, always preaching, and always visiting the sick, found time to feed on anticipations of Paradise; he tells us that he often longed to "stand at the outer side of the gates of the New Jerusalem and look through a crevice of the door and see Christ's face." He exclaims: "Oh, time, run fast! Oh, fair day, when wilt thou dawn? Oh, shadows, flee away! Oh, well-beloved Bride-room, be thou to me like the roe of the young hart in the mountains!" No man in modern times has written any volume so full of heavenly aspirations as Richard Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest." Yet Baxter was one of the most practical of philanthropists. While meditating on the Better Country, he wore his busy life out in striving to make England a better country; and the town of Kidderminster was revolutionised by his ceaseless labours for the bodies and the souls of its inhabitants. Intense spirituality and intense practicality were beautifully united in the late Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston. If he kept one eye on heaven, he kept the other eye wide open to see the sins and the snares and the sorrows of his fellow creatures all around him. I verily believe that if we thought more about heaven and realised more its ineffable blessedness, we would strive harder to get others there; we should not be content to travel thither on a path only wide enough for one.

It is no wonder that some professed Christians do not catch any more distinct glimpses of the celestial world. Their vision is obscured. As a very small object when held close to the eye will hide even the sun at noonday, so a Christian may hold a dollar so close to the eye of his soul as to shut out both Christ and Heaven, too. Fishes down in the Mammoth Cave become eyeless at last; and so will any of us lose even the faculty of seeing if we shut ourselves in a cavern of grinding worldliness, or utter unbelief. Perhaps some reader of this article may despondingly say: "Well, I never get any sight of heaven; I am all in a mist; nothing but clouds and darkness before my eyes." My friend, look where you were standing. You were in Satan's marshy grounds and among the quagmires where the fogs dwell continually. Ever since you left the "King's highway," ever since you forsook the straight path of duty, ever since you quit honest praying and Christian work, and God's Book for your ledger, and the service of Christ for the service of Mammon, you have strayed away into the devil's territory! Heaven is not visible to backsliders. And never until your feet take hold again of that straight path of sincere, unselfish obedience to Jesus Christ, and your eyes get washed out with some sincere tears of repentance, will you have any fresh, gladdening glimpse of that rest which remaineth for the people of God. Throw off your load, my friend, and the sins that so easily beset you, and, getting your feet again in the track, "run with patience the race set before you, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith." When you get your eye fixed again on Christ, you will no longer complain that heaven is utterly out of sight.

Those whose conversation is in heaven, and who keep it constantly before them, have abundant source of spiritual joy. They renew their strength as they push upward and heavenward. What is it to them that the road is long and sometimes the hills of difficulty are steep, that there are often lions in the way, that there are crosses to be carried, that there are some valleys of the death shadow to be threaded, and that not far ahead is that river over which there is no bridge? All these things do not disturb them. Heaven lieth at the end of the way, clothed in its purple and its golden light. The Mount Zion is there—the city of the living God and the innumerable company of angels, some of whom may turn out to be old friends who have had their eye on us ever since we were born into Christ. From the hilltops we can, with the spyglass of faith, bring heaven so near that we can see its bulwarks with salvation strong and its streets of shining gold.

These views of the certain and assuredly promised inheritance of glory ought to quicken our zeal prodigiously. The time is short—and shortening every day. If we are to have treasures there, we must be securing them—no time is to be lost. If we are to lead any souls there, we must be out after them. If we are to wear any crown there, however humble, we must win it. Christian zeal depends on inward warmth; and much of that heat must come from heaven. "When," exclaimed grand old Baxter—"when, O my soul, hast thou been warmest? When hast thou most forgot thy wintry sorrows? Is it not when thou hast got above, closest to Jesus Christ, and hast conversed with Him, and viewed the mansions of glory, and filled thyself with sweet foretastes, and talked with the inhabitants of the higher world?" Certain it is that he who loves not Christ and his fellow-men loves not heaven; and he who loves not heaven is not very likely to see heaven. A true life is just a tarrying and a toiling in this earthly tent for Christ until we go into the mansions with Christ. Fellow-workers, the miles to heaven are few and short; let us be found busy in heart and hand when the summons sounds, "Come up hither!"

Moments.

"What is man that Thou shouldst magnify him? And that Thou shouldst set thine heart upon him? And that Thou shouldst visit him every morning, and try him every moment?"—Job vii. 17-18.

(Arranged to air of "Scatter Seeds of Kindness," S. S. and S. No. 12.)

THERE are moments quickly passing,
Precious moments passing by,
Moments of the brightest service,
Service for the Lord on high.
Shall we let them pass unheeded?
Will our helpless hands hang down?
While for us each treasured moment
Treasures up a golden crown?
Then let us seize the moments,
Then let us seize the moments,
Then let us seize the moments,
For the service of our King.

There are moments quickly passing,
Opportunities which rise,
Nevermore to cross our pathway
As we journey to the skies.
Opportunities, God-given,
With these precious moments flow,
Oh, if we are watching, waiting,
We will seize them as they go.

There are moments quickly passing,
Life is of these moments made:
In the unscaled height of ages
Moment is on moment laid.
Oh, let us be up and doing
In the service of our King,
And with every treasured moment
To his feet a treasure bring.

There are moments quickly passing,
Soon our little day is done;
Soon beyond the far horizon
Fast will fade the setting sun.
Let us use these golden moments,
Which the Lord to us doth give,
Till at last with Him in heaven,
We the life of lives shall live.

A Good Work among Boys.

SOME years ago meetings for men were held in Clifton, but it was felt that they were too large to include all ages, so a Bible class for boys of the "better class" was started at Apsley-road, under Mr. A. Woodward. Afterwards it was removed to All Saints'-road—General Davidson's, who kindly lends a room for the purpose. There Mr. A. J. Heath took the lead, which he has continued until the present time, General Davidson being the president. A similar meeting is held for girls at Apsley-road by Mrs. Shove. The members of the boys' class now number about sixty, but there have been nearly one hundred at times.

A fortnight's mission has just been held in connection with this class, which has proved most successful. The numbers have been comparatively few at the week-day meetings, but the blessing has been great, no less than forty or fifty boys having come out. Meetings have been held at 9.30 in the mornings and 7.30 in the evenings, with games in the afternoon. On Wednesday week Mr. Arrowsmith visited the work, and gave a capital address. On another occasion a missionary address, with lantern views, was given by Mr. Hodgson, which was very well attended. On Monday week a winding-up conversation was held with music, which the boys seemed to enjoy immensely. At the close many of those who have received good during the mission stood up and gave their testimony, whilst others joined in prayer.

A closing missionary meeting was held at the Blind Asylum Concert Hall on Wednesday night. Addresses were given by Mr. Stoke, from China, Mr. Hodgson, and one or two others who had taken part in the mission, and intend going as missionaries. These included Mr. Cheeseman and Mr. S. Jenkins, the secretary of the class.

The mission is now over, and on Sunday the ordinary meetings were resumed at All Saints'-road. It is fully anticipated that good results will be reaped from these special efforts, and that the whole work of the class will receive new stimulus and revival. The leaders look forward with hopefulness to the coming in of fresh members and the extension of a work which God has been pleased to bless among poor boys in Clifton and Bristol. Any parents visiting in or near Clifton may obtain further particulars from Mr. E. W. Perry, Avonleigh, Stoke Bishop, Bristol.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, January 20.

"EVERY PLACE THAT THE SOLE OF YOUR FOOT SHALL TREAD UPON."—Josh. i. 3.

ALL the land was given, but every inch of it had to be claimed. Israel had to put its foot down upon the land, whether wilderness or Lebanon, plain or hill, and say, "This is mine by the gift of God." And as the right was asserted God made it good. No man was able to stand with them in the lot of their inheritance.

The settler who has purchased a plot of land in the Far West claims it to its furthest borders, and, if needs be, invokes the aid of the Government to make good his purchase. So with our possessions in Christ. All spiritual gifts are ours in the Risen Saviour. From the wilderness of the earth even to the river that makes glad the city of God, and unto the glassy sea on which the sun never goes down, is our border. But we must put the foot of faith down and say, "All things are ours; we have been blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ. He hath given us all things that pertain to life and godliness."

Let this be the beginning of a new life for thee. Reckon that thou art on the resurrection side of death. Do not look at temptation or difficulty, but claim by steadfast faith whatever God has taught you to feel the need of. Do you ask how that strong courage may be yours? The answer is at hand. Meditate on the Word of God day and night, and depart not from it to the right or left. The strength of the inner life finds nourishment only in the Word of God.

MONDAY, January 27.

"THIS LINE OF SCARLET THREAD."—Josh. ii. 18.

It speaks of the precious blood of Christ. Scarlet is the colour of Calvary. Twine it round the window through which thou lookest out on thy foes, and away to the river of death. Nothing can hurt the soul which has put the precious blood of Christ between it and condemnation or alarm. Let every outlook to the future be associated with a remembrance that his blood was shed for thee, and be thou thankful.

That scarlet thread had been the means of salvation to the spies. By it they had been let down to the ground and saved from death. It must have been strong. So the blood of Christ avails, not only for us, and for all who shelter with us in the house, but for others who find it the means of life as they receive it from our hands.

Let us see to it, that like Rahab, we gather father and mother, brethren and friends, to share with us the shelter and safeguard of the precious blood.

But, after all, it was not the cord that saved, that was only the emblem and type. Behind it on the one hand was God's oath, spoken through the spies, and on the other was Rahab's faith. The true safety of that house on the wall stood in the moral attitude of one woman in it. Rahab believed God who had dried up the water of the Red Sea, and who was God in heaven above and in earth beneath. This faith raised her afterwards from her life of shame to become the ancestress of Christ. Such wonders does the blood of Christ work in outcasts from the commonwealth of Israel, bringing them nigh.

"WHEN THE SOLES OF THE FEET OF THE PRIESTS THAT BEAR THE ARK OF THE LORD SHALL REST IN THE WATERS OF JORDAN."—Josh. iii. 13.

The floods of the Jordan were high; so may be the floods of trial and sorrow that sometimes overflow their banks, so the floods of conviction of sin, and so, to some at least, the waters of death. Possibly this overflowing is needed for the time of harvest; the width of golden grain in the Jordan valley was no doubt to a large extent dependent on the far-spreading of those waters. How the heart trembles, as we hear the gurgling and rushing of the floods. Hark, how they lift up their voice!

But, when the priest's foot touches them they shrink away. Jesus has stepped down into these floods as our High Priest. In Gethsemane their overflowing tide washed around Him. At Calvary the water-spouts went over his head. In the grave He seemed momentarily to have succumbed. But since then they have been cut off. Through the ages He has stood, bearing the ark of propitiation, and arresting the tumultuous floods. "Thus far and no further."

Sinful soul, deeply convicted, "Look for the Priest," on whose person the storm broke, and by whom it has been checked and stayed! Tried believer, be sure that the water-floods cannot pass Jesus, to reach or drown thee! And when death approaches thee, O fearful and trembling one, thou wilt find Jesus standing between thee and its might, making a path by which thou shalt pass o'er dry-shod.

WEDNESDAY, January 29.

"THOSE TWELVE STONES WHICH THEY TOOK OUT OF JORDAN, DID JOSHUA SET UP IN GILGAL."—Josh. iv. 20.

They had lain in the river's bed, they now stood on the Canaan bank of the river. They were a perpetual memorial of where the people had been, of the grace which had brought them forth, and of the position to which God had conducted them. Children in after days would gather round those mighty boulders and be instructed, and it is a great matter that the deliverances of God should be graven as with a pen of iron on the soft and yielding surface of the child's heart; thus the coming generation shall revere and love the name of Jehovah. "Come ye children, hearken unto Me," should be the perpetual appeal of one generation to the next.

The story of these stones is told again by the Apostle Paul in Ephesians ii. We were dead in trespasses and sins, and lay hopelessly in the grave, like stones in the heart of the river of death. But we were brought forth by God's mighty hand and outstretched arm. We were raised up together with Christ. The resurrection of Jesus is the memorial stone of our position in the sight of God; from this we should never recede. How those old stones would have cried out if Israel had gone back over the Jordan! And does not Christ's empty grave protest against our living amid the pleasures and cares of the world from which He has gone, and going, has taken us also? This is not our rest; let us make good our standing in the risen Christ.

THURSDAY, January 30.

"BEHOLD, THERE STOOD A MAN."—Josh. v. 13.

When Jericho, its fortifications looming dark through the night, must be assailed, then the Divine Man may be looked for. Only let circumcision do its keen work of separation, so that there be nothing of the flesh with its energy and pride to vaunt itself before God; then as we stand face to face with some imminent peril, God will be revealed as our very present help. Not weeks before our need, not before the Jordan has been crossed in faith, not before circumcision has been performed, but when all God's demands have been met, and to-morrow calls for action, then behold there will stand the Man Christ Jesus, not by Himself, but as Captain of the Lord's host, awaiting in mighty legions on the wing for his least word.

It is sometimes thought that the Divine Warrior had come to supersede Joshua; this is not so. He was Prince of another host than Israel. His host was the celestial armies, which were going forth to war against Canaan. As long as Israel was true to God, these were its allies. Look up, Christian soul! Thou thinkest thyself alone; or countest sorrowfully thy poor array; but in very deed, the Man of Calvary and of the throne is beside thee. A heaven owns his authority, and will supplement thine efforts. Be reverent, obedient, full of faith and prayer. Keep step with the goings forth of God. Thou shalt have light work to do. Before the impact of his might, thy Jericho shall fall.

FRIDAY, January 31.

"EVERY MAN STRAIGHT BEFORE HIM."—Josh. vi. 20.

We must be sure that our way lies through and beyond Jericho, and that God has called us to take it. When that is ascertained, we may be perfectly certain that the frowning walls of difficulty, which rise between us and the further land of promise, will fall down flat.

There must be times of waiting. Israel waited a whole week. We may have to wait still longer. Let patience have her perfect work. There is no such teacher as she is; her pupils become perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Patience worketh experience, and experience hope.

There must be times of obedience. The people could not understand the meaning of these repeated marchings around the walls. They were not, however, asked to understand, but simply to obey. First the priests and ark, then the warriors. We must subordinate our armed activities to the slow and reverent pace of faith, hope, and love.

There must be times of exultant Faith. There was no quaver or hesitation in that cry. The Word of God, as communicated by Joshua, hushed every doubt and misgiving. In confident assurance, the people shouted, and according to their faith, so was to them. "By faith the walls of Jericho fell down." There are no walls of superstition and sin strong enough to resist Faith's shout, when God says that her shouting time is come.

SATURDAY, February 1.

"THE LORD SAID UNTO JOSHUA, GET THEE UPON JERICO."—Josh. vii. 10.

There was something very beautiful and impressive in that prostrate form. And as the awe-stricken people gathered around in silence to contemplate their leader thus prone upon his face, it must have greatly touched them.

There was cause for soul-anguish. Joshua had counted on unbroken victory through the might of his covenant-keeping God; but here it appeared either that God had deserted his people, or that He could not cope with the gods on which the Canaanites depended. In either case, Israel was in awful peril; obviously she had not strength sufficient to cope with the seven nations of Canaan. If left to herself, she must inevitably be cut off. But even this prospect alarmed Joshua less than the discredit that would attach to the name of Jehovah.

There are hours in our life when we are called from the exercises of devotion, good and God-honouring, though they may be, to deal with the sin of our people, or to cut out some source of failure and defeat. Our place then is no longer before the ark, but arraigning the people by their tribes, casting lots for the offender, or consigning the accused thing to fire. Child of God, do not be content with weeping and praying before God; diligently ascertain and put away the accursed thing which has hidden his face from you.

Sunday Rest.—The New Year's address issued by the Working Men's Lord's Day Rest Association states that, whereas in 1867 out of 25,902 postmen only 4941 rested on Sundays, in 1894, out of 136,447 postal employees, 95,175 rested on Sundays. The defeat of prominent Sunday opening candidates at the General Election; the prohibition of Sunday games in the parks by the London County Council; the failure of Sunday opening proposals in the Common Council, Manchester, Oldham, Lancaster, Tunbridge, Ipswich, Colchester, and Leeds, and the closing of museums, public reading-rooms at twenty towns where they had been experimentally opened on Sundays, are some of the topics noticed. 452 sermons, seventy-five lectures and meetings, the issue of 167,000 publications, the despatch of 42,000 postal packets and parcels, etc., are some of the association's operations. The secretary is Mr. Charles Hill, 13 Bedford-row.

THE CHILDREN'S PAGE.

All communications referring to this department must be addressed to UNCLE TOM, the Children's Editor, 12, Paternoster-buildings, London.

"It Won't Come Sweet."

LAST week we had the first of our "talks by the seaside," but as it is often rather cold there in the winter, we will not go to the sea for our subject this time, but sit by the tea-table instead.

I am going to let someone else who is interested in this "children's page" write to you to-day. I cannot give you his or her name, because I do not know it myself, as it was not contained in the envelope in which the rest of it came by the post. But I think it will very nicely follow up the lesson we learned by the sea about our temper, for it shows how our lives may be made sweet and pleasant to ourselves and to other people as well. Now for the story and what it teaches. The writer says:—

We were sitting round the tea-table one evening, and Jennie, Cissie and Bertie, the little children of our host, sat with us; and though we talked clearly and loudly, yet we could not help noticing Cissie as she vigorously stirred her tea, until there seemed some danger of her making a hole in the bottom of her cup.

She sipped and made a wry face, then stirred again. Once more she sipped and stirred, and this was repeated several times. Then, in a sorrowful tone, and holding her spoon in her hand, she said to her mother, "Mamma, it won't come sweet!" Of course we all laughed. "Oh dear!" said her mother, "I quite forgot to put you any sugar," and she quickly mended matters by dropping two nice lumps into her little daughter's tea.

Now I expect many of us have been stirring away at our lives to make them purer and sweeter, but, like Cissie's tea, they "won't come sweet!"

Our lives are not naturally sweet. Solomon said years ago, "The heart knoweth its own bitterness"; and in the story of Ruth you may remember how Naomi said, "Call me not Naomi (pleasant), but call me Marah (bitter)." Selfishness, falsehood, temper, pride, envy, are like the bitter tea-leaves that make our lives distasteful to ourselves and others.

Nor will stirring make them sweet. Perhaps some of you have been trying lately to be sweeter in your temper, purer in your life, kinder in your words. I daresay some of you elder ones went to the Watch Night service and made good resolutions for 1896. But you have broken them already. Just as Cissie found all her stirring useless, so all our resolving and doing will fail to make us pure and holy. No amount of digging and pruning can make the fruit of the crab-tree pleasant; and no amount of training, even in the sheep-fold, can change a wolf into a lamb.

But what stirring will not do, sugar will. The mother knew the cause of the bitterness and the remedy as well, and the lump of sugar did in a minute what the stirring would not have done in a month. So we need the sweetening influence of the love of Jesus in our hearts before they can "come sweet." But when his love comes in we shall feel (like the two disciples on the way to Emmaus—Luke) our hearts burning within us.

Now we may stir; for what was useless before is now necessary. We cannot work for our salvation, but having learned to love Jesus we can work for Him. Let us, as Canon Kingsley quaintly wrote:—

Do the thing that's nearest,
Though it's weary whiles
Helping, when you meet them,
Lame dogs over stiles.

This will make the sugar dissolve and spread, and soon our whole lives and homes will be full of the love of Jesus. This will make those around us happier and better too.

"Why is it, my dear," said Dr. Doddridge to his little daughter, "that everybody seems to love you?" "I don't know, papa," she replied, "unless it is because I love everybody." This is the secret of all lovable and happy lives, for dropping the lump of sugar into others' lives sweetens our own. Loving, helping, blessing another is the stirring which will make the sugar spread in our own cup.

"Whatever are you laughing at?" asked a gentleman of two lads swinging on a gate. "I don't know, sir," said the elder. "I makes Jim glad, and then I gets glad myself." Thus the true secret of happiness is to do a kindness to someone every day, for

Kind deeds pay back a hundredfold,
Like good seed freely sown;
And sunshine made for other hearts
Is sure to warm our own.

The Bible Searcher.

Answers to these competitions are acknowledged in two lists:—

1. Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue. 2. Those received later, in the one following.

But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the competition appears.

IHAVE been particularly interested in the letters I have received this week. I will tell you about a few of them.

MAUD RUSPINI (Tulse Hill) sends some verses she has composed, and I expect some day she will be able to write for magazines and periodicals in prose and poetry.

ETHEL DOUGLAS-HAMILTON (Boxmoor) says: "I want to learn as much of my Bible now as I can, as when I am grown up I hope to be a missionary." Let us all pray sometimes that her desire may be realised.

A FATHER writes from Gipsy Hill and says: "My children, ages from eleven to fourteen, have much enjoyed doing the work you have set them for the last two Sundays, and I hope you will be as successful every week in interesting them as you have so far."

KATIE CLARK (Glasgow) tells what hymns were sung at the little home service, at which the "Children's Page" was read. They were numbers 345 and 294 in Sacred Songs and Solos. The last one speaks of Jesus as our Friend, and that is just what He wants to be to each one of us.

ALEC and FANNIE WARING (co. Kerry) are very anxious to see my portrait in THE CHRISTIAN, and say "that would be grand." Now that is very kind of them; but as I have not had a photograph taken since I was a young man I am afraid they would be disappointed, so I have decided not to do so; for the present at any rate.

DAISY PULLEN (Finchley) had to write her verses in bed, poor child. She thought the hardest part was to find out the book in which the hidden text was to be found. But after a diligent search she succeeded.

FLORENCE and BEILE DANCE (Chatham) are two little girls who find out texts together because one of them has had cataracts on her eyes and cannot write. ETHEL BURCH (Gosport) sends her answers from a sick bed, and says, "I am still under the doctor, as I have something the matter with my heart, and cannot go to school. I have to take great care of myself. Please excuse the writing as my hand shakes on account of rheumatism." I should like all you boys and girls who are healthy and strong to ask God to make these three little girls well again.

Some of my young friends ask me to look at their papers again, because they are sure they answered right, and yet their names are left out. Now, I have three friends who examine them all very carefully, besides myself, so that no mistake shall be made; and I have been quite sorry sometimes to see how nearly right some of the answers have been, and yet not quite. You had better keep an exact copy of the answers you send, and compare it with the answer which appears in THE CHRISTIAN the next week; then you will be able to tell whether I am wrong or you. Some children get THE CHRISTIAN a few days late, and are therefore unable to send their answers in time. I am sorry I cannot extend the time; you must ask your parents to get you a copy on the day it is published, which I am sure they will try and do. If you are going back to school, ask to have it sent to you there, so that you may not get left out.

Loving Deeds.

Oh, never deem that little deeds

Of kindness e'er shall fail

Upon the barren soil of life,

And bear no fruit at all.

For as the shining drops of dew

Refresh the drooping flowers,

So loving deeds give strength and light

To hearts in darkest hours.

And He who took the grains of sand

To make the ocean's shore

Doth take the kindly deeds of men

To make a path before

The struggling souls upon life's sea,

Who seek amidst the din

A place where they can safely tread

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANA.

THE LAST PHILISTINE WAR.

THE WONDERFUL GRANTING OF DAVID'S PRAYER
AND THE PSALMS TREATING THEREOF.

THE last war which David was compelled to fight against the enemies of Israel, and by which the victory over all the neighbouring tribes was completed, was one of three years' duration against the Philistines.

It is this war of which a description is given in 2 Sam. xxi. 15—22. The whole of the twenty-first chapter should be read with care in order to understand the important connection of events—how the description of the three years' war is added to the previous account of the three years' famine, and prefixed to the succeeding chapter (xxii.) in which Psalm xviii. is included. This Psalm then, from certain allusions, evidently contains an account of the event which turned the scale in this the last of David's wars against the heathen.

The Philistines, who had already been partially brought into subjection by David (2 Sam. viii. 1), now rebelled. No doubt they were led on to do so by the three years' famine which, according to 2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, was come on Israel as a judgment because of Saul's slaughter of the Gibeonites. In spite of the promise made to them by Joshua, Saul had endeavoured to extirpate all the Gibeonites within the boundary of Israel. The famine only ceased after David, at the demand of the Gibeonites, had surrendered to them seven of the sons of Saul, who were hanged, or, more correctly speaking, crucified by them in Gibeah as an atonement for Saul's crime.

The Gibeonites, in defence of their demand, might have pleaded the Lord's word to Moses (Num. xxv. 4), when the people had allowed themselves to be persuaded to whoredom and idolatry by the Midianites: "Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before Jehovah against the sun, that the fierce anger of Jehovah may be turned away from Israel." The Gibeonites use exactly the same words, "Give us seven men and we will hang them up before Jehovah." While Israel now had bad crops the Philistines were in possession of abundance of corn (comp. a similar case in 2 Kings viii. 3), and the temptation therefore at this time was great for them to try and throw off the yoke. This they attempted to do in the three years' war with the Israelites.*

The war was the more perilous, not only because David had "waxed faint" (2 Sam. xxi. 15), but also because, during the first year's war, his life was threatened by the Philistine giant Ishbi-benob, who had procured a new sword for the purpose of avenging on David the death of Goliath.

David was saved in single combat with him by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 17.) Then David's men vowed that he should no longer go into battle with them, that he might not "quench the lamp of Israel"; and yet it was David who, in the prayer recounted in 2 Sam. xxii., and Psalm xviii., later on saved both the army and Israel.

Immediately following on the account of the Philistine wars is placed Psalm xviii., the only one of David's psalms which is quoted in the historical account. The introduction to the psalm, is, as will be shown later on by its strophical divisions, a part of the psalm itself. The words "from the hand of Saul," have led to the supposition that the psalm was intended to represent the whole series of David's deliverances from the time of Saul onwards, in a general picture under the allegory of a frightful storm. But it is expressly stated "in the day that Jehovah had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul." The deliverance from Saul's hand, and from that of all his enemies must have happened on one and the same day, and that day is emphasised in Psalm xviii. 18. The words "out of the hand of Saul," then, find their explanation much more in the fact that the famine caused by Saul's guilt had also occasioned the repeated incursions of the Philistines; and God, in saving David from both the one and the other, delivered him practically and finally "out of the hand of Saul," who was the cause of all that occurred.

No less misleading is the opinion that David's deliverance may have been poetically depicted in the psalm, in a picture of the intervention of God by means of supernatural phenomena, by which it was not actually accompanied. The reader is by this view thrown backwards and forwards between idea and reality without being able to gain a sure footing on either. Other psalms prove that David, at war with the Philistines, "the sons of the stranger" as they are called (Psalm cxliv. 7, and xviii. 44), did solicit just such supernatural aid of God. Is it not that of which Psalm xviii. tells us? The historical writer included this very psalm in order to let David, in his own words, describe what occurred in this supreme hour of his life. By this obvious historical assumption, no fewer than seventeen psalms find their proper places which have hitherto been adrift, and have been thrown hither and thither by the interpreters.

By various characteristics and allusions the connection of this psalm in 2 Sam. xxii. with the previous historical account of the Philistine wars, is brought to light.

1. At the end of Psalm xviii. (verses 44, 45) are mentioned the Philistines—the sons of the alien, or the stranger—as those against whom the war was being made, and to whom the song refers.

2. When, in 2 Sam. xxii. 18, the words occur, "my strong enemy," and again in v. 49, "Thou hath delivered me from the violent man," our thoughts are directed to Goliath the Gittite (2 Sam. xxi. 19), who, in 1 Chron. xi. 5 is furthermore mentioned as Lahmi, the brother of Goliath, who rendered so dangerous the third and last battle, which alone can be referred to in the Psalm.

3. In 2 Sam. xxii. 29 we find the words, "Thou art my lamp, O Lord," which in Psalm xviii. are changed to, "Thou wilt light my lamp" (v. 28). This manifestly refers to the soldiers' words, "that thou quench not the lamp of Israel" (2 Sam. xxi. 17). David humbly lays at the feet of the Lord this name of honour given him by his warriors, when they feared that by going into battle he might quench the lamp of Israel. It was just at this time that Jehovah let it shine, and proved Himself to be the lamp of David.*

4. This assumption is now confirmed by a whole series of psalms, which can only be understood on the supposition that David, during this last war with the Philistines, under the pressure of the famine, and the fear of the terrible Philistine giants, craved of God supernatural assistance (Psalm cxliv.) and, moreover, experienced it, as is plainly described in Psalm xviii. and 2 Sam. xxii. 15.

5. But also the second supposition which the historical sequence in 2 Sam. xxi. brings to light—namely, that it was the famine and consequent weakness of Israel which caused the Philistines to break their oath of allegiance (Psalm cxliv. 8 and 11), and, under their united kings, to stream into Judah, is confirmed by Psalm xviii. and Sam. xxii. 19: "They came upon me in the day of my calamity." Is not "the day of my calamity" the self-same day as that mentioned in the heading of Psalm xviii.? It is the same day as that which in Psalm xx. 1 is called "the day of trouble," and, again, in Psalm lxvi. 14 is mentioned in the words: "When I was in trouble." (Compare also Psalm xxxiii. 10, 19.)

(To be concluded.)

* The usual word or, "light," is not used here as might be expected, but the less common word nér, used by the soldiers, and which really means "lamp."

Jews in Paris.

WE HAVE again had the privilege of seeing a member of the House of Israel added to the Church of Christ through our humble instrumentality. The case is one of more than ordinary interest.

In the early part of last year, while passing our Mission Hall, 2, Rue du Roi de Sicile, a son of Abraham was attracted by the singing of a hymn. He entered and listened to my discourse on Matt. xi. 3, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" I spoke to him after the meeting, and pressed upon him the prophetic evidences of the claims of our Lord to the Messiahship, and called his attention to the historical facts which corroborate the same. From the few remarks he made I observed that he was an educated man, and at the close he frankly said, "You have convinced me that Jesus is the Messiah, and I thank you for it." He accepted a New Testament, and promised to come again. He did so, and at length received a course of regular Christian instruction.

The inquirer being a medical student in his third year, and much occupied, I had to make special arrangements for his instruction. He paid great attention, taking notes and writing papers on the different subjects. He became more and more interested and earnest, and at last expressed a wish to confess Christ openly. On Sunday, December 22, he boldly and solemnly confessed Christ in baptism, before a large congregation, at the Embassy Church, Rue D'Aguesseau, the chaplain, Rev. Dr. Noyes, administering the rite. A few days before his baptism he told me that he intends to work for the Lord as a medical missionary, as soon as he has finished his studies.

Our work in general has of late expanded and increased in every branch. A few days ago, at our Christmas treat for women, we had thirty-three present. It was a very interesting and cosmopolitan gathering, including Poles, Russians, Hungarians, French, Dutch, and Germans. They paid marked attention to an address on "The Advent of our Lord." A much larger number attend our Sunday-school, and the children take great interest in the lessons.

Chamberi Mission.

WE reached Madrid on October 25, and were cheered by a warm reception from about seventy members of the Chamberi Church who had met for their usual quarterly gathering. The schools have been reopened. Previously we had the eight teachers for conference and prayer. It is truly a cause for thanksgiving that they are all Christians. They spoke of the general good conduct of the children, and of their attention at the daily Bible class; they were also much encouraged about the spiritual condition of several of the elder ones.

On New Year's Day there was a special time of prayer, after which I preached to a good congregation. One of the members died last week. I visited him frequently; was thankful to receive up to the last his testimony to God's peace, and to witness his love for the precious Word. The purchase of a portion of the property on which our chapel and two schools stood is a triumph indeed, and most gratefully do we acknowledge the Lord's hand in guiding us to such premises. It is important to secure the other portion immediately: £1000 we still require. Mr. A. Boake, Stratford, London, is treasurer of this purchase fund.

CHAS. E. FAITHFULL.

Paseo de Areneros, 6 prowl., Madrid,
Spain, Jan. 13.

Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, in a recent letter to the Arbitration and Peace Society of the United States, says:—"You will know what dreadful things have been taking place in China, and can imagine how full our hands and hearts are. Pray earnestly for us. Oh, if Christians would only pray instead of fighting, God would have a chance of blessing us. The spirit shown by our own missionaries, in and since the riots, has been very lovely. The mistaken views of some Christian people are, to me, as saddening as riots. I long for the coming of the Prince of Peace, and for the ending of these awful scenes of bloodshed and war."

* It must be assumed that the three wars with the Philistines, of which an account is here given, took place in successive years; comp. 2 Sam. xi. 1 (B.V.), "And it came to pass, at the return of the year, at the time when David went out to battle," etc. Also that the three wars were immediately on each of the three years of famine. Without this, it is hardly probable the Philistines would have ventured an attack.

The Late

Mr. John Gifford, Edinburgh.

THE friend whose portrait we give to-day was born at Edinburgh on May 5, 1821. He had the great privilege of a godly parentage. His father, a shrewd, active man of business, took his share in the public affairs of the city, especially in connection with the Merchant Company, in which he was "Master," or President, in 1840. This office his son filled nearly fifty years afterwards. Mr. Gifford had a tender memory of the home of his boyhood, especially of its unintermitted morning and evening family worship. "Many a prayer" (he once wrote) "did father and mother send to God on our behalf."

His business life began at the age of fifteen, when he became an apprentice of the National Bank of Scotland. By successive steps he rose to the position of cashier, where he was responsible, to a large extent, for the business at the head office. In 1884 he retired, after forty-eight years of service. His business qualities and courteous manners made him a great favourite with the customers and employes, by whom he was much beloved. His influence was exerted constantly, both for their temporal and their spiritual welfare, and there is reason to believe not without results.

Long before his retirement from the service of the Bank he was well known in Edinburgh in connection with religious and benevolent organisations. Even in the busiest period of his life much of his spare time was devoted to their work. His name could be found for many years on the committees of the Destitute Sick Society, the Magdalene Asylum, the City Mission, Carrubber's Close Mission, etc.

He did not merely "give his name" to a committee, but always gave his labour also. In 1873 he was elected one of the "Assistants" or directors of the Merchant Company, and from 1887 to 1889, as already mentioned, he filled the office of Master. One department of the work of that corporation is the superintendence of the large educational institutions which have grown up under its fostering care, now attended by nearly 6000 scholars. In everything connected with this department Mr. Gifford took a prominent part.

Mr. Gifford had no sympathy with the sentiment that Christian men should eschew politics, as being "of the world." When more at liberty than during his bank connection, he took his share in them as part of the duty of a Christian citizen, regulating himself in all such matters—as in business and in family life—by Christian principle.

While still in his apprenticeship, at the age of seventeen, he began teaching in the New North Mission Sunday-school, Castle Hill. His uncle, Mr. Alexander Gifford, had long conducted a Sabbath evening school in Quarry Close, Cross Causeway, which had been originated by him and his brother (the father of Mr. John Gifford). In 1853, the latter joined his uncle in the management, and after some time became superintendent. His interest in Sunday-school work, and in that school in particular, never ceased till his death, having continued for a period of nearly sixty years. With Mr. William Dickson, Mr. David Dickson, and Mr. Charles Inglis—all now departed—Mr. Gifford helped in the origination of the Edinburgh Sabbath School

Union; and was the first editor of its magazine, and furnished the Notes on Lessons for Sunday-school teachers. It is due to his memory to record what he said of them. "These were the first I know of, though now they have extended over the world." He said, in words well worth recalling:—

In the Sabbath-school work I found a great reward. It taught me to know my Bible, to think of and feel for my fellow-creatures, and humbly to serve the Lord with his true disciples in doing good.

Mention must be made of another work in which he took a warm interest and an active part till his dying day—the Carrubber's Close Mission. This mission had been instituted in 1858 by Mr. Gall, and was moving along the lines proposed by him, when it was overtaken by the wave of the memorable revival of 1860. In Mr. Gifford's words:—

Suddenly the Prayer Meeting became a place of revival; crowds of hearers and many anxious souls made additional workers necessary. The whole scene was new to me. The style of speaking, singing, praying was unusual, especially "the second meeting"—asking people about their souls; kneeling with one before many onlookers, and urging submission to Christ was startling—almost offensive.

(From Photograph by Mr. J. Moffat, Edinburgh.)

I remember deliberately considering, "Shall I join, or draw back?" I found it was only the modes and the accessory circumstances that were peculiar, and I willingly gave what help I could.

There were twenty or thirty enquirers each night. To relieve Mr. Jenkinson, who was more constantly there than anyone, I offered to take the Tuesday evening meeting if he would stay at home. He agreed, and since 1861 I have kept that evening for that work. It has been always interesting to me—deeply so, as a border land between this world's territory and Christ's; where the fight was to be fought, and souls won. Many, many a soul has Christ gained to Himself there.

These notes were written in 1882, Mr. Gifford continued to have charge of that Tuesday meeting till within a few months of his death, when, from failing health, he was unable to come out in the evening, a period of thirty-four years. Besides this weekly service, on the death of Mr. Jenkinson he undertook the Young Women's Bible Class on Sunday afternoons. This he conducted most successfully for several years, and thus gathered around him a band of earnest and devoted Christian workers to whom his memory is specially dear.

As a young member of the New North Free Church congregation (under the pastoral charge of the late Dr. Charles Brown), and later as an elder in the same church, under Rev. Dr. R. G. Balfour, the present minister, Mr. Gifford was zealously active in all the good work undertaken by the congregation.

Mr. Gifford was blessed with a remarkably strong constitution. Some months before his death there were indications of a complaint which could have only a fatal issue. Four weeks before his death whilst yet apparently comparatively well, he wrote to a friend: "All these tell we are getting near the gate of the grand new life." At the end, however, he was spared all suffering. For a few days speech failed him. Five minutes before the close he opened his eyes wide, and gazing intently forward seemed to raise himself slightly, then lay back, and shortly after "entered in through 'the gate' into the city."

One characteristic of the deceased to which reference has not been made, was his singular equanimity of temper. A servant long in his employment was asked if she had ever seen her master in low spirits. "No, never," was the ready answer. He also had, what is of no small value even in the matter of Christian influence, the lively sense of humour which is almost always associated with a pathetic heart. It is often too true that where that is wholly wanting, usefulness in recommending a Christian life is sadly impaired.

Rome in Canada.

IN a recent letter Pastor Chiniquy writes to us from 65, Hutchinson-street, Montreal:

I am happy to tell you that the number of converts from Rome, now, is much more than 45,000! and it is rapidly increasing every day. We do not count less than 100 young ministers of the Gospel, all converts, with whom it is my privilege to work. We have helped thirty-seven priests to give up their errors to accept the Gospel.

We have now six large institutions or colleges, where more than 1000 young men and girls, all born in the Church of Rome, are receiving a Gospel education, and preparing themselves to scatter the good seed of the Gospel among their relations and friends in a near future. We are in need of 100 more young ministers, for the new fields which are constantly opening. We are also in need of new modest churches or halls, where we can gather the new converts, and address them. Such a mighty work in our young country is much above our means. It would have been a wreck long ago if our English Christian friends had not come to our help, and strengthened our feeble hands.

I intend, this year, to send my booklet, "The Perversion of Dr. Newman to the Church of Rome; in the Light of his own Explanations, Common-sense, and the Word of God," to every one of the friends who will extend to me a helping hand, and be kind enough to send me his address. It will do them good to understand the true, though secret and mysterious reasons, which caused him, with all the other perverts of our day, to exchange the saving light of the Gospel for the dark night of Popery.

The Mother of Manuel Matamoros.—Mr. Wm. Greene, 3, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W., writes:—After much difficulty we have opened the memorial hall built in remembrance of Manuel Matamoros at Malaga. Mrs. and Miss Browne have given about £200 towards the building, and it is opened without any debt. As Miss Browne has emptied her purse on the hall, she can no longer help the mother of Matamoros, and I make this appeal, hoping it may be heartily and lovingly responded to. This lady, now nearly eighty-eight years old, is worthy of our deepest Christian sympathy, as to her solid Christianity, the faithfulness of her son is principally due. In a letter received from Malaga, dated January 7th, she says that they are in the greatest straits.

Mr. Varley in Sydney.

THE recent visit of Mr. Henry Varley to Sydney was marked by new developments in evangelistic enterprise, which show that there is a feeling growing up in the minds of many good men that new methods, as well as the right spirit, are needed to meet the changing requirements of the time. Mr. Varley's long experience in evangelistic work, and extensive knowledge of men in many countries, have taught him the need for a more direct and practical mode of attack upon the enemy than the evangelists of a past generation would have deemed permissible. His conservatism of character, which is an element of his strength, does not suffer, in our eyes, by the readiness he has displayed, in recent years, to adapt his method of dealing with certain forms of sin specially noticeable in these colonies so as to meet their peculiar needs. Being oppressed by a sense of the evils of gambling, intemperance, and impurity, which are eating out the moral life of great numbers of people, who systematically stay away from public services, and never hear anything to arouse them to a sense of their sin, he has boldly gone down to places where gamblers and sinners congregate, with warning words, which during the last few weeks have impressed many thousands.

At 108, King-street, one of the busiest parts of Sydney, and specially favoured by gamblers and intemperate men of all grades and conditions, Wisdom has lifted up her voice. One of the sights in that thoroughfare was the constant crowd of curious observers gazing at the shop windows, and reading intently telegrams, bills, placards, and calico signs, covering the whole front of the spacious window and building. They had never seen it in this fashion before, many being fairly baffled in the attempt to make out "whatever the man could mean" by making such a display. It was amusing to watch the faces of the people as they stopped to read the striking and original sentences at the foot of some well-known cartoon which Mr. Varley had pressed into his service, and invested with a new and hitherto undreamt-of meaning. The full significance of this new departure in Christian warfare was not long in manifesting itself to the betting fraternity, who cleared away from the locality as if smitten with a sense of shame. Here was a man occupying a shop, recently closed by the police as a gambling den, for the purpose of carrying on a crusade against the gambling demon, which has spread its black wings and blown its hot breath over tens of thousands, and not in the least ashamed either to employ methods objectionable in the eyes of many "precise Christians" who are afraid to offend the devil.

Mr. Varley had his reward for his expenditure of money and time in the profound impression he has made upon one of the greatest gambling centres in Christendom. The whole population at times goes mad over racing and other events, which mean the loss of money and the deterioration of character to thousands.

Mr. Varley has been too long before the Christian world to require any descriptive sketch from my pen, which does not lend itself readily towards flattery; but it is no exaggeration to say he is made of stuff out of which England's greatest sons have been fashioned, embodying qualities which would make him a leader and commander in great enterprises. His pugnacity, however, which other circumstances might have directed against England's enemies, who would fain despoil her of her fair possessions or restrict her expansive power, is employed under the guidance of God's grace in assailing her spiritual adversaries. Everyone who knows Henry Varley privately can bear ungrudging testimony to the essential kindness and gentleness of the man whose one aim in life is the salvation of man. Though an ardent believer in the second coming of Christ as commonly understood, he lives and acts as if the world's redemption depended on his exertions. Many who cannot embrace Mr. Varley's theology have learned to recognise in him a gifted man who has gained a great influence over tens of thousands of people in many lands. JAMES HILL, N.A.

Bourke-street Congregational Church,
Sydney, N.S.W.

The R.S.U. at the Guildhall.

ON Friday evening this ancient hall witnessed a strange and motley gathering. Some 1200 children, from the poorest corners of London, mustered by the workers of the Ragged School Union, were invited to dinner, and afterwards entertained with a pleasing variety of shadow pictures and "Punch and Judy."

Organised under the auspices of the Ragged School Union, and financially supported by the members of the Corporation, with Mr. Alderman Treloar as the leading spirit, the gathering may now be looked upon as an established affair, this being the third season that the event has taken place, and it is hardly necessary to say that it is looked forward to by both teachers and children.

At half past three the children were to assemble at the entrance of the Guildhall in King-street, but before the bells chimed the half-hour the little guests had begun to arrive, and were marshalled into battalions for taking up their position at the tables. In hundreds they arrived from Costers' Hall (Hoxton), Haggerston Drift, Spitalfields, and Commercial-road, while fifties came from the Borough, Royal Mint-street, Banner-street (St. Luke's), Lansdowne-place (Bow), Hoxton Market, Lambeth, Fox-court (Leather-lane), Hatfield-street

Mission, Gospel Lighthouse Mission (Borough), South London Mission, Radnor-street (St. Luke's), Ashley Mission (Bethnal Green), Deptford Ragged School, Johnson's-court (Whitechapel), and George-yard (Whitechapel).

Half-an-hour was fully occupied in seating the youthful visitors, and when silence had been obtained grace was said by Archdeacon Sinclair. The teachers took up the office of stewards, and plates of roast beef, with the accompaniment of hot potatoes and bread, were soon passed round, followed by plum pudding. The youngsters were soon working with a will, and here and there they might be seen discarding, as cumbersome and ineffective, the use of the knife and fork for the spoon, or oftener still reverting to those useful appendages provided by nature—hands. Interested spectators, amongst others, of the busy scene were the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, Mr. Sheriff Pound and Mrs. Pound, Mr. Sheriff Cooper and Mrs. Cooper, Mr. Alderman Treloar and Mrs. Treloar, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Alderman Alliston, and Lady Ellis.

After the entertainment, which the children greatly enjoyed, useful and earnest words were spoken by Mr. Stone and Alderman Treloar.

It is understood that any surplus there may be after all the expenses have been defrayed will be handed to the Ragged School Union, who will expend it in giving similar dinners, on a smaller scale, in some of the poorest parts of the metropolis.

It may be interesting to add that among the willing helpers were the teachers and scholars of the Allen Olney School, who raised no less than £20 towards the expenses of the gathering.

Bible Carriage Work.—Within the past few weeks, Mr. Northcote Willy has been labouring with the Liverpool carriage at Wath, Swinton, Mx-borough, and Denaby. He is now at Doncaster.

"Wars and Rumours."

"THERE shall be wars and commotions; nation rising against nation, kingdom against kingdom.... They shall deliver you up to be afflicted and shall kill you; and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake."

Surely, never were these words more applicable than at the present time. How many of our poor Christian brethren in Armenia have been butchered in cold blood for no other crime than that of being Christians.

Christ is calling loudly to his slumbering Church. When He cometh shall He find faithfulness on the earth? To the believer the hope of the Lord's coming should be three things:—

1. An inspiration to service.—The coming of the Lord will seal the doom of the world. Surely, if we have any love at all for the unsaved around us, the thought of this will stir us up to greater efforts to get them saved. Have we done all we can to point them to the Lamb of God? Have we been as earnest in pleading as we might have been with our unsaved friends, for instance? If we knew for certain He was coming at this hour a week hence, how earnestly we would strive with them and implore them night and day with tears to be reconciled to God.

2. A purifying influence.—"Every man that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself even as He is pure." "Seeing that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!" The servant who is ever expecting his master's return will be careful to do nothing which he would be ashamed for his lord to see. Oh, to so live that the world may know by our actions that we belong to Christ, that the sceptic and the ungodly man alike may have to confess, "That man lives up to his profession."

3. A comforting hope.—"Sorrow not as others who have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." What reunions at his coming! The Master comes to his garden and gathers the lily. Do not fret; that is only the stalk in the wee grave yonder; the flower is up yonder, brightening and beautifying the Heavenly Home with its presence.

Only a little while and "He that shall come will come and will not tarry." "Even so, come Lord Jesus." F. DAWSON.

True Preaching.

THE late Dr. A. J. Gordon often told of a Sabbath on which he went in the morning to hear a distinguished preacher who was celebrated for his Biblical knowledge. He came home delighted with the clear and brilliant expositions of the truth that he heard, but chilled with the icy coldness of the message. It was true, clear, scriptural truth, but as cold as an iceberg.

He went in the afternoon to hear another preacher distinguished for his fervour, and he came back delighted with the earnestness and unction of the preacher, but it was a fire of shavings, and there was not truth enough in it to make it lasting.

He went again at night, and heard a third preacher, and he came away not only instructed, but thrilled; because this sermon had been not only an exposition of scriptural truth, but it had also been alive with the power of God, and full of the fire of the Holy Ghost. It was not a fire of shavings, but of substantial fuel, and it left not only a memory of truth, but a glow of warmth that filled his heart with joy and love. This is the power of the Holy Ghost speaking the truth in love; the Bible ablaze with holy fire; the Word of God dissolved in unction and love, until it can be observed in every fibre of our being and become the nutriment of our life.—Watchword.

THE EVANGELIST.

"Why do You Want Him?"

By REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

"WHAT do you want Him—Christ—for?" This is a curious question, you will say, to put to anyone. Well, perhaps the answer you would give, though good enough in itself, I might consider quite as curious as you consider the question.

Your answer most likely will be, "Of course, to save me."

Yes, indeed, you do want Him for that, and so do I; but also for a great deal more than that, so far at least as many understand the word "saving."

"Well," you say, "what do you want Him for, over and above what we do?"

"You want Him, do you not, for death, and only for death, and what comes after death; and but for that would probably not want Him at all; I want Him for life, as well as death; and for the one, as much as for the other."

Christ may be wanted for death and judgment, but in no real saving way at all; indeed He is to some little more than a charm. Only too many have cried out "Christ! Christ!" upon a dying bed, without knowing why He came to earth, or, I might almost say, anything about Him.

I will tell you what I want this blessed Jesus Christ for, who, coming to our poor world, has put Himself so graciously within our reach.

I, too, do indeed want Him as a Saviour. I want his blood to cleanse all my sin; without that I could not face the judgment day. I want Him for the future, but I want Him for the present also: in life, in every day of life, as well as in the hour of death and in the day of judgment.

The blessed Jesus came to earth to be a Man, to live as a man (only sinless): the Babe in the manger being the life-start of the Man, who died upon the cross; and I want Him all his life long between these two.

I want Jesus to be my Example; I want something above what even the best of my fellow-men can afford me. Nothing lifts us up like a good example. Jesus' life as a man gives me the very best of all.

There was once a Hungarian king who was be-nighted with his followers. They were very weary, and wanted to lie down on the snow-covered ground, where they soon would have slept the sleep of death. The king commanded every man to tread in the footprints he himself should make. They felt that, wearied as they were, what their king could do they ought to try to do, and they followed in his steps and were saved.

I want to see the Divine thoughts about holiness gathered into a fact, and that fact I have in Christ's daily life. I can look closely at that life, and try in God's strength to copy it. I know that my poor copy is at best but blurred; but, the honest trial of God's children in the strength of the Holy Spirit He will always honour.

Then I want Him (reverently speaking) for my Companion. I want someone to talk to, and who will talk to me about all the great things of my soul; about heart affections, which are deeper, keener, than any earthly ones; a very living Christ.

A Spanish evangelist trying to comfort a woman who was suffering much in body, asked her "if she knew Jesus?"

"Oh, yes," she said, "and what is more I have Jesus." "Indeed," said he, "and where have you got Him?"

"In that oratory there," pointing to a small niche containing a figure of the Saviour. Here Jesus had eyes which saw not, and ears which heard not, and lips which spake not; but the One, who became Man on earth, is still Man in heaven; and I want Him to talk to me, and hear me, and look on me; and I want to talk to Him, as I cannot to any one on earth; for He only knows soul-concerns in their depth; and I wish Him to know mine.

I want One who will never desert me; who knows what the bitterness of desertion means, by having been deserted Himself. Life is full of changes, full of disappointments, full of failures; even the most faithful of our dear ones have to leave us; I want some one who will say, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5): and Jesus will be with me to the end.

And I want One who is always accessible; and the Jesus who is still Man in heaven is this. Any poor person, any sick person, any sad person might come to Him when He was upon earth; and they may come to Him now. I, a poor sinful man, may always come near to the glorified Man—Jesus Christ.

I feel that I want a living power in my life, and Jesus, the Man Christ Jesus is to be that power. He is the One to energise me to good; the One to restrain me from evil. The Holy Spirit takes of his things, and shows them to his people; and when the blessed Spirit does that, and teaches us about what Jesus would do, or would not do, we are helped to do or leave undone the like.

And there is one thing more that I greatly want Him for: that is, as the object of my affections. I feel that I have powers of love which the world cannot satisfy. Many people may be very dear; but, much as we may love them, and they love us, they cannot fill our hearts; it would be a bad thing for us, if they could. God has made us with powers of love, which must have something great to spend themselves on; the Holy Spirit fills us with the love of Jesus, and then makes us pour out our love to Him.

So, I want Jesus in life, as well as in death; and I want Him for eternity also. That would be a lonely eternity that had in it no Christ; the heart craves one supreme object on which to fix itself; and this is to be God in Christ.

Yes, I want the Christ to save me not only from the condemnation of sin, but also from its power, and love; and I want Him for his very Self, even when the thought of sin is not uppermost at all.

I hope that you will want Him thus. Oh! the more you want Him the more shall you be filled with Him. The man who feels that Jesus has saved him still wants Him ever more and more.

This is the man who would be able to give something like a worthy answer to the question, "What do you want Christ for?"—The Christian Irishman.

Pardon for the Captive.

Luke iv. 19.

IN Nazareth's synagogue He stood,
And read the sacred Word,
While every eye upon Him gazed,
The Christ of God—the Lord.

He read his mission to the earth,
And hasted on to tell
The day of grace had come at last—
"The year acceptable."

He closed the Book; nor further read,
For He had come to heal;
No "day of vengeance" He proclaimed,
'Twas love—pure love's appeal.

Deliverance for the captive soul,
And freedom for the slave,
As over all the ruined race
Should roll salvation's wave.

And still He speaks; though now on high,
Faith knows Him on the throne;
The year acceptable is still
His precious theme alone.

For He to Calvary's cross has been,
And paid the judgment score;
Mercy is free to save and bless,
The wide creation o'er.

ALBERT MILDANE.

London Barmmaids.

ONE of the most difficult, as well as most important, branches of the work of the London Y.W.C.A. is that carried on for the benefit of barmmaids and attendants at restaurants. This department has its habitat at 14, John-street, Bedford-row, where there is a home for barmmaids out of place, and where many varied endeavours are made to advance their best interests. The secretary of the work, Miss C. M. Gough, is indefatigable in her earnest and sympathetic efforts to help these working sisters, and to bring them under better influences than those which surround them in their daily calling.

A social gathering was held recently at Morley Rooms, in John-street, when nearly a hundred guests accepted the invitation of Miss Morley, who continues to show a lively interest in the work. To the regret of all she was prevented from being herself present owing to the death of her uncle, Mr. John Morley, of Clapton. She, however, wrote a kind letter to her guests, full of wise counsel and best wishes for the New Year. A very happy and profitable evening was passed. Several kind friends contributed to the brightness of the occasion by their skilled music, and Mrs. Brower narrated some experiences of foreign travel.

For twelve and a-half years this work among barmmaids has been going on, and Miss Gough has been privileged to see not a little fruit, in changed lives and in strength gained to meet the trying circumstances of an occupation marked by many spiritual perils. Some have been enabled to leave the temptations of bar-life, and other suitable avenues of industry have been opened up. With so many competing for the chance of earning daily bread, that is not always easy; but where the young woman has been led to a conscious experience of God's saving and keeping grace, the way is generally made plain. The work needs much sympathetic support, and it deserves it. We wish that similar efforts could be set on foot by Christian ladies in all our large towns, where so many young women are employed as barmmaids and waitresses.

Progress in Madeira.

We need sympathy and help in our efforts to give the Gospel to the vast population of this island. We wish particularly to call public attention to the work of one of our evangelists on the mountains here, among an illiterate people, who have been very eager attendants on the ministry of the Word for sometime. These people are anxious to have an evangelist permanently among them, who will also be able to form a school for the children.

For some time past much opposition has been experienced from the Roman Catholic clergy, who have influenced the Count on whose ground lives the friend who has been in the habit of receiving us. This good brother has been threatened with instant eviction if he continues to receive us. In view of this threat, our kind brother offered us as a gift a site away from the Count's ground, if we would consent to build on it. This we agreed to do, but were afterwards obliged to relinquish the gift out of consideration for the donor and his family, as the Count (instigated by the parish priest) again threatened eviction if we obtained the land.

Fortunately for us, a well-wisher, who was heartily disgusted with such high-handed proceedings, offered to sell us what we wanted of his land close by. We closed with the offer, and are now the possessors of the best and most convenient piece of land in the neighbourhood, right in the midst of the people, and very suitable for building. We purpose to put up a building to serve the purposes of school and chapel, with accommodation for the evangelist. For this about £150 is needed.

Wellington-road Hall, Stoke Newington.

—Dr. F. Montague Miller, in compliance with the wishes of many friends formerly worshipping at Wellington-road, has consented to resume the weekly gathering, for deepening of the spiritual life and study of the Scriptures, in the small hall, Assembly Rooms, Defoe-road, Stoke Newington. The first meeting of the series will be held on Tuesday evening, February 4, at 7.30. On a recent evening Dr. Montague Miller was presented with a chiming clock as a token of affection by friends who in the past have attended his meetings.

LONDON POVERTY.

Drink and Distress.

LITTLE as I have said, in this series of papers, on the evils of intemperance, it has not been for the want of material. The saddest and most pitiful of my recent experiences in the haunts of poverty have been the wrecked homes where the drink demon has worked dire disaster. The pity of it is that the genuinely sympathetic visitor scarce knows how to relieve the distress, which is so evidently caused by vice. Christian effort for the reclamation of the drunkard, by leading to Him who alone can save, is not without glorious result. But this takes time and patience, and meanwhile there are the famished children, and weary, heart-broken wife, or in some cases the hopeless husband, who sees his hard-won earnings squandered at the ginshop, and his little ones left hungry and ragged. The true worker feels keenly the distress of the children, yet finds it hard to extend present relief without affording fresh opportunities for self-indulgence. So strong is the craze for drink that frequently the once fond parent will not scruple to rob the family by pawning or bartering for drink the food or garments provided by charity. This the Christian helper has to guard against, and generally does so with some success, for the experience of many disappointments has given wisdom in this matter. Only the precautions required involve increased labour and pains; and often enough it seems so thankless a task that one feels tempted to abandon it in disgust.

One or two cases which have come before me will illustrate directly due to intemperance. These are typical of thousands. In a little mews, lying behind a West-end crescent, I was directed to an unhappy family in great trouble. The little boy who opened the door called his grandfather, who proved to be a frail old man whose working days were over. He spoke of his son's "misfortunes"—out of work, with six children, while the mother could earn but little. The broken panes in the windows, the crippled chairs, the ruined interior, the dirty, neglected aspect alike of the rooms and the children, spoke eloquently of a deeper cause. On pressing inquiries I found that the son "took a drop of drink." Losing his place as a coachman, he became a cabman, but forfeited his licence through intemperance. He got employment as a cabwasher, but lost that also. Unwarned by her husband's folly the wife trod the same sad way. Everything pawnable went for drink. Now, the old man wailed, "I'd hoped ne'er to see the inside of the work'us, with the little a daughter in America sends me now and then, but it's like it now. My son's wife was as decent and hard-working a woman as you could find, till she lost heart, and went wrong. It's these little 'uns I'm sorry for." Ay! there, and a thousand times over, it is the bairns who suffer.

Take another picture of a ruined home from Bermondsey. On the second floor we enter an empty room, where two children in deplorable rags crouch in the corner. The father was, not long ago, a commercial traveller and fairly well to do.

THE CUSTOMS OF HIS CALLING

led to tippling, the habit became formed, and intemperance led to his discharge. He tried again, broke down, and once more lost his place. Gradually he sank, dragging with him wife and family. Friends helped for a time, but tired of him. His hopeless struggles proved unavailing, and now he seems utterly abandoned to self and sin. There is at times a ray of hope in the fact that he knows and bewails his own folly, but he is a slave to the vice and escape seems hopeless; unless the faithful missionary could at last succeed in leading him to the Saviour.

Two instances will illustrate the ruin when the mother takes to drink. A miserable, wretched room in St. Giles' still haunts my mind with its tokens of callous neglect. Yet the husband seemed a decent fellow. The truth is, his wife wastes at the corner house every penny he earns, and has more than once sold up the few things in the room in her frenzied crave for gin.

So, again, in Lambeth lately, I stood in a gloomy cellar, where four little ones had been left to die by a drunken, worthless mother, who had once been very respectable, but had lost her very womanhood through drink.

But enough of this; the sad tale might be indefinitely extended, even from my own recent observations. Nor is this all. These instances of absolute ruin might be regarded as exceptional—due to hereditary weakness or the backboneless personality of the individual. But beyond and besides these, one meets with hosts of cases in which families are living in constant want, simply because every penny is wasted in the public-house. A riotous burst on Saturday night, something on Sunday to quench the burning thirst created, and the rest of the week in penury, unless an advance be had from the employer. Such is the weekly and ordinary round of thousands in this great city.

A STORY OF DELIVERANCE.

Efforts on behalf of such are by no means futile. Many have I met with who were once slaves to drink, but have been saved by grace, and are now standing firm, having lost the very taste for strong liquor. One such case must suffice. I cannot give it in all its detail, but it amply proves that the worst may be saved, that such effort is not vain toil, but that to be successful it must be patient, personal, prayerful, and persistent.

In a large Industrial Block dwell a family who, amid surrounding poverty, show signs of refinement and culture. A few years ago the father had a large and flourishing business, and owned considerable property. Intemperance gained hold of him, gambling followed, and eventually the inevitable ruin ensued. In despair he drank yet more deeply, till he became a common and noisy drunkard. Sinking to the lowest, they drifted into a vile slum, where a devoted L.C.M. missionary found them in gloomy despair. All workers know that such cases are amongst the hardest to reach. Remorse and shame oft make them morbidly averse to the intrusion of the Christian visitor. A dread possesses them that the past may be unveiled. Hence the missionary who lighted on the family, in his house-to-house visitation, had the door closed in his face. Nothing daunted, he called again and again, until some chance word revealed, what he had suspected from tone and speech, that they had fallen from good standing. Patiently he sought to win a hearing, and at length succeeded in gaining the confidence of the mother, so far as to learn something of the cause of their ruin. Laying himself out specially to catch the father, he got hold of him, only to find him surly and reticent. Often the missionary sought him, as oft to be repulsed. At last a little kindness during illness opened the door; but even then it wanted patience and tact to get a hearing for the Gospel which the poor man seemed to hate, for had he not been a Christian professor in the past, and what availed 'it to save him? By-and-by the long sad story I have hinted leaked out, with vehement declarations of dislike to religion. "I come," was the reply, "to tell you of the loving sympathetic Christ and not of mere religion." The outcome of many visits was conviction of sin, leading to conversion to God and from intemperance. Then followed full disclosure of the past, with earnest consideration what was to be done. In all this the missionary was consulted, as the true friend who had, spite of many rebuffs, patiently persisted with his message of hope.

I cannot detail all the upward steps. Suffice it that the family were moved into a decent Industrial Block, while work was found for father and boys. If they chose to live on present earnings they would now be fairly comfortable; but with general consent they are living sparsely and cheaply, resolved to pay off certain old debts before they seek comfort for themselves. From first to last it is a thrilling story—not told fully lest pain be given by its publication. The utter ruin brought by drink could scarcely be more sadly shown, while on the other hand the redemptive power of Grace is marvellously displayed. With salvation, hope dawned, resolve returned, and so far as may be the past is being redeemed.

Thus even in the hopeless hosts, enslaved by intemperance and vice, the Gospel wins its gracious triumphs; and the Christian labourer, amid much to dishearten, finds fresh assurance that the good tidings he bears have still energy to save and uplift the lost and despairing. Sunken and abandoned as the poor he seeks may be, no true servant of Christ loses faith in the conquering power of the Gospel he is honoured to carry to the sad and sinful who know so little of the possibilities of a new and better life.

PEARL FISHER.

Regent's Park Baptist College.

Dr. S. G. GREEN presided at the annual public meeting on Friday evening in the College at Regent's Park. The report expressed gratitude for the measure of recovery granted to Principal Roberts after serious illness, and notified that arrangements had been made which would spare his strength and yet secure the efficiency of the College. It was largely owing to Professors Green and Gould that the work of the session had been so little affected by the illness of the Principal. Rev. Vaughan Pryce, of New College (Congregational), had also kindly lectured during the session on Systematic Theology, continuing a subject upon which Mr. Roberts had been engaged. The financial statement was satisfactory, the receipts being £4,382, and the expenses leaving a balance on current account of £155. There are at present thirty-four students in the College.

The address was delivered by Rev. W. J. Henderson of Bristol Baptist College, in which he urged that the students ought to adopt a comprehensive plan of teaching in their ministerial life as supplementary to their pulpit work. Classes should be established to suit all kinds of their hearers, the chief being a Bible class to meet weekly, instead of the usual week-night service. As an illustration Mr. Henderson mentioned that a minister had begun with five men "taken out of the street," and now there were no fewer than forty classes, attended by 1600 men in the aggregate every Sunday morning at half-past seven. Such a system of classes would require hard work on the part of the minister. Dr. Angus, Rev. James Stuart, of Watford, and others took part.

The Pure Literature Society issue a plea showing that in view of the spread of education and the alarming flood of evil and debasing literature, the work of this society, in commending only reliable and wholesome books, and in making grants at half price to school and village libraries and similar institutes, is of the greatest importance, and has a strong demand and claim for support. The secretary is Mr. R. Turner, 11, Buckingham-street, W.C.

The Soho Mission is now carried on by a number of voluntary helpers, Mr. W. J. Benham being the secretary, assisted by special evangelists. Mr. W. Harrison, the former superintendent, has now his special work at the Orange-street Church, which is simply a mission in the interests of the poor. He found the building, which holds a thousand people, with about twenty worshippers and no funds. The work is growing, and already it is becoming a power amongst the poor of the district. He is gathering around him a good staff of Christian workers here, and is opening up much new ground for mission effort.

Missionary Prayer Union.—The quarterly meetings in connection with this Union were held in the West Cliff Tabernacle, Bournemouth, on Sunday, January 12. The sermons were preached by Rev. J. H. Anderson, formerly of Barisal. At the afternoon meeting, Mr. Feller, the secretary, gave a report. It was expected that about £24 would be sent to the Baptist Missionary Society. The letter from Mr. Hale, the missionary supported by the Prayer Union, was read both afternoon and evening. Mrs. Hale already proves a help-meet, having mastered much of the language difficulty before she started from this country. A few new members were added to the roll for the ensuing quarter.

Armenian Horrors.

THE Bible Lands Missions' Aid Society has issued a special supplement of The Star in the East, giving six letters from important centres of missionary effort, describing the sorrow and destitution that have followed in the wake of recent persecution and slaughter. Whether from Trebizond, Mardin, Marash, or Aintab, the story is the same. In one letter we read:—

"In the town nearly every Christian house was pillaged, and many were burnt, with the households, after the women and girls had been dishonoured. Among the many who were burnt were three notable Protestant families. Among others who were forced to accept the religion of Islam, was an Armenian ordained clergyman of the English Church, who, on his refusing the offer, was killed with torture. It is not known yet the number of the victims, as for the last twenty days no one has dared to go out. All the murders, pillages and outrages were committed by fanatical Turks, who were sent to protect the town. Those Christians who were wealthy are now dying through starvation, and have nothing to put on in the severe winter."

A correspondent sends us a letter received from a mission worker, who says:—"For the past three months all our mail, letters excepted, has been confiscated. Papers, whether or not they contain news regarding Turkey, are all put into the fire. So far, our town has escaped from the awful massacres which have prevailed in the country; but it has been and still is threatened. In the Christian villages around, all is death and desolation, many of them being now without a single inhabitant. Multitudes, in order to save their lives, are renouncing Christianity, and adopting the Moslem religion. As it appears to us, the Lord's work is being greatly hindered. Some of our preachers and teachers have been killed, and others imprisoned, while churches and schools have been torn down, burned, or converted into mosques. Although I am a British subject, I was recently imprisoned and subjected to shameful treatment for no other reason than that I am a foreigner. Yet we hope and fervently pray that present events will ere long result in the opening of a more effectual door for the Gospel in this land, which has never yet known peace or rest."

A lady missionary writes to an esteemed correspondent:—"The Moslems, having finished their noon-day prayer on Nov. 15, rushed out to begin their work of slaughter. Our poor Armenians are in great fear still. Every Friday they expect another massacre, as bad Turks constantly threaten them. On such days they hide away, and barricade their doors. We do all we can to reassure them, but they will not believe the word of the governor that there will be no more such work. The people are poor; thousands are out of employment. All the looms are idle. The churches and schools are closed, and the best citizens fear to go into the streets. The Government is giving two and a-half tons of bread each day to the poor, and we hope it will continue to do so; for if this help fails the suffering will be very great."

The husband of the writer of the foregoing, connected with an educational institution, writes:—"Through God's goodness we still live, and are well, though our faith and courage have been tried to the last degree. The afternoon of November 15 will never be forgotten by us—the hours during which we awaited the Lord's will, defenceless as we were, expecting every moment the crashing in of our gates, and the inpouring of the avalanche of death and destruction. But for the good hand of our God upon us, we must have perished by the guns, knives, and clubs of the mob. Bullets flew about us; the mad crowd were rushing for us; but some soldiers sent by the Governor just in time, together with some kindly-disposed neighbours, stemmed the tide, turned off the blood-thirsty rioters, and saved us. The Lord gave us fortitude in the trial, when it seemed that no earthly power could save us. We had inward agony, but kept outward calmness. We gathered the poor students and girls in our rooms, and engaged in prayer and the reading of Scripture promises. Knowing little of the extent of the calamity in other quarters of the town, what was our horror, the next day, when wagon-loads of dead bodies were brought out into the valley in front of us; all day long we saw corpses, to the number of a hundred, lying on that spot, and at length they were buried in a trench. Ever since that day the Government have kept a guard of thirty soldiers in our grounds, and no person goes through our gates without scrutiny. There seems to be a determination to protect the Americans, and none of them have fallen, though several have been shot at in mobs. We get no newspapers; so we do not know what is going on; we continue our work, having over two hundred boarding pupils."

A CALL TO PRAYER.

The following call to prayer on behalf of the persecuted Armenians is signed by a number of leading ministers belonging to different denominations, and is issued by the Information Bureau, 3, Arundel-street, Strand. We learn that copies are being sent to representatives of all the Christian churches throughout the world:—

"Christmas has gone, the New Year has come, and still the dreadful tragedy proceeds. An ancient Christian people is being plundered, starved, murdered, and martyred. This is happening in the sight of all Christendom; with its full knowledge; within the range of its public responsibility. Men are tortured, women are outraged, children are violated, homes are burnt; no one can doubt it; Consuls have reported it; Ambassadors have known it; eye-witnesses have placarded it; photographers have recorded the terrible proofs. These unhappy people for the most part are without arms, and it has only been in two or three exceptional cases that, after years of despairing appeals, they have turned on their oppressors.

"These outrages, barbarities, massacres, still continue. The protest of the European Powers has, hitherto, served only to intensify the horror or multiply the death. Thousands of men, women, children, homeless and foodless, are awaiting the terrors of an iron Asian winter. It is incredible, it is intolerable that Christendom should continue to look on in apathy and impotence at a sight so appalling.

"We most humbly and earnestly implore all those who influence the mind and direct the efforts of the Church of Christ scattered throughout the world to draw the whole force of the Church's Corporate Prayer into an entreaty to God the Father, and Christ our King, and the Holy Ghost the Comforter, that this shame may cease; that this crime may be stayed; and that we may no longer, by our selfish indifference, our hindering jealousies, withhold the righteousness and compassion of God from coming to the succour of his people who are keeping fast their faith to the death."

Bombay.—A conference in connection with the Student Volunteer Movement was arranged to be held at Bombay, January 9-12. Among the speakers were Messrs. J. R. Mott and R. P. Wilder.

Leeds.—At the sixth annual gathering of the Leeds Model Lodging-House Mission, which took place in St. James's Hall, nearly 700 people sat down to tea. During the past year the Mission held 435 services in the common lodging-houses, with a total attendance of 9290, or an average of 21 persons at each service. The work is appreciated, judging by the good behaviour and interest of those who attend the services. The leader of the Mission is Mr. E. J. Burrell, and the secretary Mr. H. Cann, 14, Howarth-place, Camp-road, Leeds.

Letters to the Editor.

SPIRITUAL CONVERSATION.

DEAR SIR,—The remark made in a recent issue concerning seasonable and suitable times for introducing spiritual conversation is very opportune. Doubtless the paucity of efforts and the deficiency of interest in this matter is one cause of the low spiritual atmosphere in the Church at the present time. May I make a suggestion to your readers which could be taken up or improved as each may prefer for the end in view—the glory of God.

The tittle-tattle of our average tea-table consumes much precious time, and to every devout soul this is much. Our circumstances are very varied, but at our tables a way can be opened up for usefulness which we may have little thought of.

Those whose homes contain believers only are to be congratulated; their lines have fallen in pleasant places, since their very meals are partaken of as reminders of the sacramental supper. Such need no advice in the matter. A majority, however small, will guide with a truly spiritual instinct, and even where there are the two or three the promise of a hearkening God is sure. For souls longing for the coming of Christ's kingdom this may prove to be a door opened, and should there be many adversaries it may manifestly be the more effectual.

Your remark about sanctimoniousness is much needed, but if we wait on God in this matter He will not deny us a large share of his guidance and help.—Yours, etc.,

Edinburgh.

THE INFLUX OF REPORTS.

DEAR SIR,—You ask what secretaries have to say on the question of publications. May I give our experience? Two years ago our quarterly magazine was superseded by a penny monthly. It has been proved to have the following advantages:—

(1) Interest is better sustained. We often lost supporters because they forgot our work in the long intervals between the issues of the quarterly.

(2) Contributions have increased. We are now able to make special needs known more promptly, and receive more responses. The change has certainly helped us to extend our work.

(3) The circulation has increased. Booksellers dislike quarterlies, and will not push them. Our committee are most anxious to avoid unnecessary expense; but a society which does not keep in close and constant touch with its supporters is not likely in these days to extend its work, and would find it difficult to hold its own.—Yours faithfully,

A SECRETARY.

SIR,—I have read the letters in your valuable paper on this subject, and having been engaged in philanthropic work for many years I should like to express the opinion that the fault largely lies with the givers of the money rather than with those who conduct the affairs of our various societies.

Until Christian people give their money more prudently than they now do, there is not the slightest probability of the apparent waste of money being curtailed. For example, a donor wrote me the other day that he could only give me two guineas instead of eight, as he was subscribing to 162 philanthropic societies. That means he must receive 162 reports; and from what I and others know, it is not reasonable to suppose that he could give more than an average of two guineas per annum to each society.

Another who had hitherto always sent me two guineas, wrote that she could only now send five shillings, as she was apportioning the amount of her former gift to eight different societies. That means eight reports for her.

In my judgment, these facts meet the criticisms of your correspondents; and I submit that, until the philanthropic public consolidate their gifts, matters must continue as they are.

This subject is continually before those who have the administration of charitable work, and it is a great grief to them that they have to spend so much money unnecessarily because people will not be more prudent in the distribution of their gifts. Surely it is better to give two pounds to one society, and to be truly interested in its work, than to send five shillings to eight different institutions.—Faithfully yours,

IN UTROQUE FIDELIS.

"For the Sake of the Name."

"FOR the sake of the Name."

So run the words on the page before me, and as the eye reads them the mind irresistibly ponders over the irony of that mass of work to which they would be inapplicable. For the sake of applause—for the sake of the newspaper leader the next morning—for the sake of a seat at the next election—for the sake of—Ah! the list would be a long and pitiful one—but for these things how many platforms are crowded, how many committees attended, and how much even charity administered?

But, thank God, there is a fair side to the picture also. Thank God "For the sake of the Name" is a watchword holding its own even in these days of hummer and puffery, and its disciples, hidden maybe from public gaze, commonplace, unromantic men and women maybe, are yet the great leaven which is working to day for righteousness in our midst, and in numbers they are not a few. I would have you come with me, reader, to the haunts of some such lives, and try and catch from them the inspiration that has changed their poor clay into a pure marble.

And first let us stop one evening at an ordinary-looking house in a populous street of one of our large cities. We enter by the side door, and passing through the yard and a long, narrow strip of garden, find ourselves at an odd little lean-to room that was fixed up against a wall there years ago, nobody seems to know why exactly. The room is lighted up and occupied, to judge by the laughter that greets us as we enter. Inside are four or five young women—working girls who have come straight from their factories and warehouses. One of them is seated at a tiny organ trying over a hymn. Two others are busy dusting cups and laying a cloth for some meal. A fourth, with sleeves tucked up, is blowing vigorously at the fire, which refuses to catch. There is an air of freshness and merriment about the whole party which some smelling oil lamps and a smoky chimney don't appear to damp.

"What is all this for?" we ask. The answer given us is, that it is just a pleasant evening that every week these hard-working girls have set themselves to give to the poorest, wildest, and roughest of their sisters—to the girls who hawk salt and fire-wood, etc., about the streets in some towns. Half an hour later we are allowed to have the object lesson itself. In the guests troop, some of them escorted by their hosts, who have been out to fetch them, others with the cards of invitation that the girls had given them that morning or on the previous Saturday afternoon. But there they are; some with wan, pinched, sin-sick faces, some hard and defiant, inclined to treat the whole thing as a good joke, and one evidently so puzzled at the kind thought that she keeps up an incessant giggle. A few have hats, but many are without, and almost shoeless. Hats, indeed, they appear to consider superfluous, and the present to them of some old ones that their hosts have had given for the purpose, with the ceremony of trying on their new head-gear before a glass, creates great fun.

Three amongst the guests are mothers, and they have brought bundles, which after much unwrapping, we discover are their little ones. These are well protected, however scant is the clothing of those who have brought them. "General Gordon" is the name of one big boy brought by his sister, and bailing from "the Muck Alley" as his address.

The evening begins with a hymn, sung lustily by the hosts; then one of their number kneels and asks very simply for the blessing of the Father's presence in their midst. The coffee supper which the girls have prepared follows, and during this one reads a short tale aloud, another sings, and another nurses the baby who insists on crying. After the guests have made a good meal there is more singing and chatting, and the meeting closes with a few earnest words on life and its value from some lady who has come down to help the girl hosts.

The door is shut, and we are out again under the stars in the frosty winter night glad to breathe the fresh pure air, but gladder still to have been with that little company because they, we have a sure conviction, have been with their Master. Twice a week—once for the older, once for the younger girls—we are told this meeting is held; and what does it mean? It means that hard-working girls busy all day in the grind of factory life, often tired out after long hours of business, gladly for his Name's sake give up their precious hours of leisure to help those who are among the under-current, and to hold out to them the loving hand of sisterhood. Few outsiders visit this room, no one applauds them, nothing do they gain from the world. Neither is this a spasmodic effort. Go another evening into the same little room and you find a Christian girl teaching twenty or so younger ones in the Faith, the truths which are precious to her. Go at Christmas and you would see the same girls giving a tea to 500 or 600 little street lads and lasses, singing to them, and giving to the poorest garments they have made. Go some day between one and two o'clock on a Saturday afternoon, and you may chance to find a self-constituted caretaker who has run over from her work and means to use a few minutes of her dinner hour, perhaps in sweeping and dusting and generally putting the room to rights ready for the Saturday evening meeting. And the secret of it all, "the backbone of it all" as one of their number expressed it, lies, I think you will agree, in that particular meeting which takes place every Saturday evening. There regularly, week after week, the little band gather for consecration and for intercessory prayer, and then surely they win "Inasmuch" and the blessing which is making rich their lives.

I. M. M. KENWARD.

The Fire at Mansfield House.

DEAR SIR,—May we ask the sympathetic aid of your readers to repair as far as possible the great damage caused by the disastrous fire at Mansfield House on Sunday evening last? The severest loss is that which falls upon the warden, Mr. Percy Alden, who has lost his entire library, all his papers and lectures containing the work of the last ten years, a vast amount of collected and compiled information relating to social settlements, and very many things of value that no insurance company can possibly replace.

But our friends can, if they will, do much. This calamity has befallen our club premises just as we were driven to contemplate enlargement at all costs. Though the building was insured there is always in these cases a much greater loss than can be met in this way; there will be both increased cost and diminished income for some time in carrying on the different sections of the work. We are face to face with a certain loss on the mere putting of the existing premises and class rooms in repair. The scheme of enlargement is indefinitely postponed, unless our friends come speedily to the rescue. At least £1000 will be required if this is to be done.

It is a matter of great thankfulness, that though the hall was full of children no injury befel anyone. All panic was avoided both there and in the public hall, at that time packed with 1300 attendants at the evening service. Will all friends who have kindly promised to lecture, or in any way assist at Mansfield House during the next six weeks, be kind enough to send their address, and if any fixture has been made the date of their engagement, to the Warden, Mr. Percy Alden, as soon as possible?—Faithfully yours,

WILL REASON,

Financial Secretary.

Mansfield House, Canning Town, E, Jan. 20.

Friendless and Fallen.—On Thursday last the New Year's prayer meeting, in connection with the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution, was held in the Council Room, Exeter Hall. Rev. W. H. Dickenson presided, and Rev. W. R. Mowl delivered a short but faithful heart-searching address. The devotional exercises were well sustained. The institution, which has entered upon the fortieth year of its work, shows no sign of declining activity in its merciful mission.

Another Jubilee.

THE Seaman's Christian Friend Society celebrated last week its Jubilee by a series of enthusiastic meetings on Tuesday and Friday, both at Exeter Hall, and at the headquarters in Ratcliff Highway. Workers gathered in large numbers from the various branches of the society in other ports. We learned from the secretary's statement, the report, and the several addresses that the Society was founded originally in an old sugar-house in Ratcliff-highway, which at that time swarmed with sailors, crimps, and fallen women. For fifteen years after the Society came into existence it was a frequent occurrence for men to be stabbed in the neighbourhood of the mission premises. The locality had a world-wide reputation for villainess, but since then it has become more habitable and more respectable. It is still, however, the haunt of sailors of all climes and nationalities, and the Society was never more active or more needed than now. The work throughout has been eminently successful, but during the last ten years it has more than doubled the work of the previous forty years. In addition to the London work, the Society missions a great many ports on the British coasts, the Isle of Man and Ireland; maintains a number of sailors' rests, Bethels and Institutes, coffee-taverns and sailors' homes, and employs nearly twenty missionaries and agents, whose time is spent in helping seamen in every possible way. In 1893 it became necessary to rebuild the headquarters, and a handsome block, comprising large and small halls, reading library and recreation rooms, store-rooms and coffee tavern, replaced the old sugar factory at a cost of between £8000 and £9000. About £3100 of this is still due to the bankers, and some time since it was resolved to raise a Jubilee Fund of £5000 to clear the freehold buildings and the general fund of debt.

At a meeting on Tuesday afternoon in Exeter Hall, an address was given by Rev. G. J. Hill, the secretary, who has been connected with the work for thirty-four years. The chairman, Mr. T. A. Denny, made an enthusiastic plea for the work, urging its importance and usefulness. Lady Hope also spoke in her own pointed and effective way; while among other speakers were Revs. J. G. Train, W. Fuller Gooch, and G. M. Butler.

The evening meeting at Exeter Hall was largely attended, and the gallery was filled with seamen of varied climes and colours. Mr. F. A. Bevan presided, and in the course of a most interesting address enforced the claims of seamen upon British sympathy, and eulogised the great work carried on by the Society for the past half century. Rev. G. J. Hill gave a brief and graphic account of the origin and growth of the work, and declared that a vast number of seamen had been brought to the Saviour through its operations. Rev. Canon Keith, M.A., Rev. Thomas Spurgeon (Metropolitan Tabernacle), Sir George Hayter Chubb, Messrs. H. W. Maynard, W. H. Seagram, and George Lampard pleaded most earnestly for the more generous support of this important work.

This series of jubilee meetings was brought to a close by a great missionary gathering at the Society's headquarters, London Dock, on Friday evening, when Mr. T. B. Miller presided, supported by Rev. Joseph Fletcher, Rev. R. D. Wilson, Mr. J. Kitchin, and others. Brief and cheering addresses were given by a number of missionaries from the coast stations, and the proceedings closed with testimonies from some of the many to whom the mission has been made a blessing.

Sligo.—A Sligo telegram says that after the lapse of a month the street preachers made their re-appearance there on Sunday afternoon. Protected by a large body of police, they commenced speaking opposite Albert Street Barracks, but a large crowd which had assembled created a noisy demonstration, lasting for a quarter of an hour. The mob then stoned the police, and injured several constables, and continued the disturbances despite several baton charges by the officers, in which a number of the rioters were severely handled. Finally the crowd was dispersed, and matters calmed down.

Peckham Tabernacle.—Pastor Frank M. Smith, late of the Peckham Rye Tabernacle, having acquired the eligible premises lately known as the meeting place of the "People's League," opening services were held on Wednesday, Jan. 15. Rev. Charles Spurgeon preached in the afternoon to a large congregation. The premises will seat nearly 1000 persons, and there are a number of large rooms for Sunday-school, Bible-classes, &c. The pastor will preach on and after Thursday next, at 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., and on Thursdays at 7.30 p.m. It is believed that in this densely-populated neighbourhood a great work may be done.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Very Rev. Dr. Pigon, Dean of Bristol, has recently become a vice-president of the National Council of the Y.M.C.A.

An interesting series of meetings was held every evening last week by the Coldstream Association in connection with the week of prayer.

The Mayor of Thornaby presided at the first quarterly meeting of the year at the Stockton-on-Tees Y.M.C.A. on Wednesday evening. Over a hundred members and friends were present.

Mr. Burnsides's labours in the Glasgow district have been greatly appreciated, and have been productive of the best results in some places, while in others the need of spiritual quickening was revealed.

The first of the Y.M.C.A. demonstrations under the auspices of the National Council is to take place at Hamilton on February 14, when it is expected that, inter alia, some limelight views illustrative of Y.M.C.A. work will be shown.

Mr. and Mrs. Moor, of Sunderland, gave an "At Home" at the rooms of the Hartlepool Y.M.C.A., on Monday week. Addresses were given by Capt. J. E. Murrell, president, Mr. Moor, and others. There was a crowded attendance of members.

New buildings are about to be erected for the Sunderland Association, which, with an adjoining house just secured, will provide this vigorous and growing association with a splendid centre for work. The cost will be £5000, towards which Mr. A. Backhouse, the president, has given £2000.

At the annual conversazione of the Edinburgh Y.M.C.A., Dr. Carment, the president, stated that he had received 6000 young men to tea at his house on Saturday evenings during the last thirty years. This is a form of Christian work which might be more general, especially where there are young men in lodgings.

At the annual meeting of the Darlington Association, held on Thursday evening, Mr. Arthur Pease, M.P., was unanimously elected president for the ensuing year. Mr. G. D. Wilson presided, supported by Mr. J. C. Moor, the travelling secretary; and, a capital report was presented. There are now 154 members and associates.

The Saturday evening tea meetings in connection with the Hamilton Association are proving most successful. These were started to take the place of the Saturday night open-air meetings, which had been stopped by the police. This association has also recently started a meeting especially for children, and are informed "the hall is always crowded."

Eight members of the Hackney Association have gone forth as foreign missionaries during the past four years, the eighth leaving on Friday for Bulawayo, Mashonaland, under the auspices of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Two other members will shortly leave for other parts of the mission field, whilst another is still in college preparing to follow.

Rev. C. H. Yatman, American evangelist, has closed a four weeks' engagement with the Honolulu Association in the course of his round-the-world tour. The meetings were held in the association hall, and resulted in much good to the city as well as to the association. During the week of prayer 119 men professed conversion in the association building. The Association in Honolulu is doing a successful all-round work, and has the warmest sympathy and support of the community.

Through the munificence of Sir George Williams, who has contributed the sum of £5000, and by the great kindness of other influential friends, who have given a similar amount, the financial burden which, in greater or less degree, has oppressed the work of the Central Y.M.C.A. ever since the acquisition of Exeter Hall, has been entirely removed. This satisfactory state of things, which greatly encourages the committee, who now look forward to considerable increase in the work, has been brought about very largely by the indefatigable exertions of the chairman of finance, Mr. George Spicer.

Irish Church Missions.—A meeting for thanksgiving and prayer was held on Thursday last in the parlour of Exeter Hall. Rev. C. A. Fox, of Eaton Chapel, applied the words of John xi. 40—"Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?"—to the work of the Society. General Haig reviewed the progress of the Society's scheme for extension, which had already borne fruit in the opening of two mission houses in large towns during the past year. He also testified to the abundant success vouchsafed to the itinerating and the colportage work of the Society. Similar meetings were held on the 16th at Dublin, Clifton, Liverpool, Derby, Leamington, Colchester, Hereford, St. Leonards, Southsea, etc.; and on the 17th at Bath, Brighton, Birmingham, and Great Malvern.

The Y.W.C.A.

A NEW branch will, it is hoped, be shortly opened in Falkirk.

A New Year's tea, followed by a service of song, was held on the 9th inst. at the Swanage branch, Rev. T. A. Gurney presiding. The sec. gave a short address, and spoke encouragingly of the work.

The eleventh annual meeting of the Rothsay Institute was held on the 9th inst., Rev. R. Forgan presiding. The average attendance had been well maintained, while there is a good increase of members in the temperance branch.

On Tuesday evening, Jan. 14, Mrs. Tattersall, president of the Blackburn Y.W.C.A., gave a tea to the members, of whom about 120 were present. A very interesting meeting followed, addressed by Miss Whitwell, president of the North of England Y.W.C.A., and local friends.

The thirteenth anniversary of the Victoria branch of the Y.W.C.A. was held at the Melbourne Town-hall on Nov. 28. There was a large and influential gathering. Lord Brassey, the Governor, presided, and made a powerful appeal in support of the many and varied branches of Christian work carried on by the institution.

A plan is on foot for presenting a Bible and casket to H.R.H. Princess Maud of Wales, on her approaching marriage, from members of the Young Women's Christian Association, and any other women of the United Kingdom. Subscriptions may range from 1d. to 5s. Collecting papers and all information may be had from Miss Ethel Dashwood, 39, Bryanstone-square, London, W.

The annual reunion of the Nottingham branch took place on Thursday week. There was a good muster of members. After tea Mrs. F. C. Smith, president, took the chair. A good programme of vocal and instrumental music was rendered by the Shaftesbury House Choir, assisted by friends. Miss Macleod gave a most helpful address from the words of the motto for the year, "Come unto Me," "Come after Me," "Come with Me."

The classes at Princess House, Brompton-road, continue to grow, the membership list at the close of 1895 showing an increase of 92. The finances have been most satisfactory, as the year closed with only a small deficit, against £10 of the previous year. The boarding-house and restaurant have been much appreciated, many letters having been received from those who have stayed in the home telling of blessing received. About seventy-five or eighty are usually present at the Sunday afternoon Bible-class.

A meeting of the Rochester Institute was held at 212, Walworth-road, on the 15th inst. to celebrate the opening of the new premises. Mr. C. E. Tritton, expressed his warm interest in the efforts of the workers to reach the girls in the surrounding factories. The Hon. Emily Kinnaid followed, telling of the good that is being done and explaining the circumstances which had led to the taking of the new house. Economy would be one result of the new arrangement, but there was every need for continued financial help. The Factory Helpers' Union will be responsible for the Institute, aided by a grant from the London Y.W.C.A. The Duchess of Bedford, who is president of the Institute, stated the pleasure she felt in being present, and gave to Christian workers an address full of beautiful thoughts and spiritual power.

A well-attended meeting in connection with the Foreign Missionary Department was held at the Morley Halls on Thursday afternoon. Mrs. Percy Grubb presided. Miss Hodges, who last year was travelling secretary for the Students' Volunteer Missionary Union, and has recently been appointed travelling secretary for the London Y.W.C.A., was the first speaker. She told of the growth of the S.V.M.U. movement, and of the marvellous blessing and power felt at the recent Missionary Conference at Liverpool. Similar addresses followed by the Hon. E. Kinnaid and Mrs. Percy Grubb, who urged more prayer in work, better organisation, and that secretaries should do all in their power to bring their members and the work of their branches into line with God's purposes and plans for the evangelisation of the world. Col. Oldham presided at the monthly conference which followed, and gave an address.

The Opium Question.—Sir Joseph Pease, having forwarded to the Secretary for India a copy of the resolutions adopted at the recent Anti-Opium Conference, has received the following reply from Lord George Hamilton:—"I shall be glad to lay on the table of the House, when Parliament meets, the correspondence showing the action taken on the report of the Commission. The papers will show the policy pursued in the Punjab and elsewhere of granting no licences for the sale of opium. The question of taking legislative measures to prevent the use of rooms as opium smoking saloons by the public, or by so-called clubs, is under consideration."

Christian Endeavour.

THE Stirling C.E. Society reports progress and good results.

Joint meetings of committees of the C.E. Societies and the Epworth League have been held in Chicago in order to formulate some harmonious line of action.

At Edenbridge the Young People's and Junior Societies have held their first anniversary. A consecration meeting was held, in which societies in Western Kent C.E. Union were invited to unite.

Endeavourers on the Pacific coast have been helping the Los Angeles Gospel Mission in the lowest part of a Californian city, and the leaders report that it has been good alike for the members and the mission.

At the first anniversary of the Holbeach U.M.F.C. Society Rev. E. J. Travis preached special sermons. On the Monday the Wesleyans joined us in a Model C.E. meeting. Six addresses of five minutes' duration; very good attendance; memorable meeting.

The Central South London held its usual quarterly meeting at Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars-road. There was a large and enthusiastic gathering. Rev. J. Fleming (president) took the chair. After addresses by Rev. J. Tolfree Parr, D. J. Rounsefell, came the roll-call and a season of prayer.

It has been decided by the London council to hold a Convention in four divisions, for the purpose of the presentation of Divine truth especially helpful in strengthening the Christian life of the young people, and increasing their usefulness in Church life and service. Following are particulars: Western division, Westminster Chapel, Saturday, February 1; Northern division, Mildmay Conference Hall, Saturday, February 8; Southern division, Christ Church, Westminster Bridge-road, Saturday, February 15; Eastern division, Bow Baptist Chapel, Saturday, February 22. The meetings will begin at seven p.m.

Scottish Notes.

REV. R. S. SIMPSON, of Turriff, has accepted the second call to the pastorate of the Free High Church, Edinburgh, as successor to Dr. Walter Smith.

Mr. W. G. Carr has seen much fruit in connection with a mission at Hopetoun Hall, Edinburgh. On Jan. 7 thirteen persons publicly confessed Christ in baptism.

The death is recorded at Stirling of Rev. John Douglas, for many years pastor of New City-road Congregational Church, Glasgow. He was an ardent worker for temperance.

Mr. C. W. Cayzer, M.P., in view of the objections raised to the establishment of a home at Cove in connection with the Sailors' Orphan Society, has agreed to give £5000 to build or buy a house suitable for the purposes of the institution.

At the recent annual meeting in Glasgow, the Scottish Protestant Alliance passed a resolution condemning the growing tendency on the part of some Protestant churches towards adoption of ritualistic and Romish rites and forms of worship.

During the past year the Aged Christian Friend Society of Scotland admitted to a share in its benefactions eighty-one new pensioners. The amount expended in pensions during the same period was £1290, distributed among 240 recipients all over Scotland.

Medical Work in Tunis.

DEAR SIR,—A doctor is greatly needed in Tunis to minister help to hundreds of suffering men and women, whom we are now compelled to turn away from our door. The house we can offer to the doctor is large and suitable. Added to this there is a staff of willing workers anxious to help, some of whom understand dispensing the medicine prescribed.

Our doors were closed some months ago owing to the ill health of our doctor, who has since been obliged to leave the town. We were grieved on that last morning to be obliged to return ninety-one poor suffering women to their homes, uncared for. We were accustomed to open twice a week to men and twice to women, and now we have to reply to the oft-repeated questions of "When is the doctor coming?" by "We do not know, but we hope soon."

The Lord has graciously set his seal on the effort by calling out from among our patients a gentleman of good position, and he has been privileged to prove through release from prison that religious liberty does exist in the Regency and that it is possible to live the life of a follower of the Lord Jesus in the midst of his countrymen, in spite of rejection and persecution.

Mr. Glenny, secretary, North Africa Mission, will gladly receive communications, and I would thankfully fill up details of information while I am at home.—Yours in the Master's service.

Temperance Notes.

THE Abstiners' Advocate devotes some pages to portraits and a biographical sketch of Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

Several Norwegian districts have, by popular vote of men and women over twenty-five years of age, decreed the suppression of the "samlag," or spirit companies, thus putting an end to the public-houses, as empowered by a recent Act.

At the North Central Mission, New North-road, London (in connection with the Wesleyan "Forward Movement"), Mr. E. Tennyson Smith has concluded a ten days' Gospel Temperance Mission. A large number have signed the pledge.

A missionary working at Bristol among sailors says that out of thirty ships which in one year left Bristol for trade on the coast of Africa, the cargoes of twenty-five, for the purposes of commercial exchange, were confined to gunpowder and rum.

The Sunday closing of saloons in New York continues, and the effort of the police commissioners has been a great success. The saloon keepers have taken the new order of things as a matter of course, and only the lower order of saloons now attempt to violate the law.

The Temperance Times, a monthly magazine devoted to the advocacy of the temperance movement in its varied aspects of total abstinence and legislative action, is issued as the official organ of the North Metropolitan Union, British Women's Temperance Association.

At last week's meeting of the Society for the Study of Inebriety, a paper was read by Dr. Kesteven, in which he declared that if any real, permanent good was to be contemplated for the habitual drunkard, the voluntary system must be eliminated, and he would have to be regarded as a lunatic.

The Bishop of London, addressing a temperance meeting in Fulham, said he thought, as temperance reformers, they might look forward, at any rate within the next two or three years, to a great deal of progress. He believed they would be successful in inducing the Government to reduce the number of public-houses.

"Tied Houses": the serious attention now being given to the evils associated with the system which puts the publican wholly under the thumb of the brewer lends much interest to a pamphlet issued by the C.E.T.S., wherein Mr. Stileman-Gibbard fearlessly exposes these evils. He maintains that the system is detrimental to the interests of the consumer, the ratepayer, and the publican.

At a conference held in Leicester to discuss the future of licensing reform, a committee was appointed to consider the advisability of supporting some such scheme as that brought forward by Aberdeen. This provided that no new licences should be granted, except to a municipality or trust company; that at the expiration of five years the right to sell intoxicating liquors should rest exclusively in the municipality or trust company; that all public-houses should be acquired at a five years' valuation.

There are not many temperance men in the United States Congress, but the number seems to steadily increase with each new Congress. The temperance people are much gratified that Speaker Reed, in selecting the chairmen of the House Committees, made a temperance man—Representative Dingley, of Maine—chairman of the leading committee, that on Ways and Means, and another temperance man—Representative Morse, of Massachusetts—chairman of the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. Mr. Morse is a tireless and energetic worker against the encroachments of King Alcohol.

The Church of Christ needs to-day every child to be a member of the Band of Hope, every member of the congregation to be an abstainer, every minister of religion and Christian worker a temperance advocate; temperance societies to be linked closer together for united aggressive purposes. Let every abstainer subscribe for a temperance periodical at once, and take in a juvenile temperance magazine for his children. Let there be in connection with every church a temperance meeting at least once a month. Ask your friends to sign. Carry a pocket pledge-book. See that your school library is well supplied with temperance literature.—D. Jervis.

An important development in temperance teaching is reported from America. An agreement has been entered into by the Board of Counsel of the Temperance Educational Association and the trustees of the American University, Washington, by which, upon the payment to the treasurer of the University of 250,000dols., a college shall be created in the University for such original investigation as will furnish to the public schools teachers of the new branch, entitled "Scientific or Physiological Temperance." The department is to be called "The College of Scientific Temperance," and will be a school of instruction in physiology, hygiene, and pathology, with special reference to the nature of alcohol and kindred substances, together with their effects.

Personalia.

Rev. Dr. Chapman, the evangelist, has accepted a call to return as pastor, in conjunction with three others, to Bethany Church, Philadelphia.

Dr. J. Sandilands has sailed for the New Hebrides as a medical missionary in connection with Dr. Paton's mission. His wife has been an earnest helper in the work at Bethany Hall, Glasgow.

Dr. J. G. Paton has returned to Australia after six months spent on Aniwa and the other islands of the New Hebrides group. He has expressed satisfaction at the progress made, and cherishes sanguine hopes for the future.

Bishop Taylor lately sailed from Liverpool for Liberia, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. U. L. Walker, Miss Rachel Mair, and Miss Jessie Arms. The two last are the first deaconesses sent to the African missions superintended by the bishop.

Mr. D. L. Moody has paid a visit to Hartford, Conn., speaking to crowded audiences in the Y.M.C.A. halls and various chapels. Great interest was shown, and the evangelist himself is said to have been in good spirits and full voice and vigour.

Mrs. Amanda Smith has felt it her duty to do something for the orphan children of her own race in America. An Industrial Home for orphan children is to be opened in Chicago as soon as a sum of five thousand dollars towards the building has been raised. Mrs. Smith will give the proceeds of her evangelistic services to the maintenance of the home.

Dr. Pierson's coming meetings for this month are: Brecon and Trevecca Colleges, January 24; Newport (Mon.), January 26-28; Abergavenny, January 29-31. He also has to fill the following engagements in Ireland:—Dublin, February 23-26; Waterford, February 27, 28; Cork, March 1-3; Galway, March 5-6; Belfast, March 8-11; Newry, March 12, 13; Londonderry, March 15-17.

Evangelistic Notes.

Great Assembly Hall.—The Weaver Brothers, who are evangelising in the Mile End Hall during the present month, are awakening considerable interest, and there are evidences of much blessing.

New Haven, Conn., is at present the scene of a Gospel campaign by Rev. B. F. Mills. Great expectations have been aroused. Mr. Mills has recently conducted similar services at Louisville and at Columbus, Ohio.

Ireland.—Evangelistic services are now in progress in many parts of Ireland, and amongst others in the following places:—In Armagh Presbyterian churches, in Moira, Tralee, Belturbet, Letterbreen, Knockninny, and Limavady Methodist churches, and at Killorglin, co. Kerry in the wooden hall of the Irish Evangelisation Society.

Tottenham.—Mr. Charles Inglis has been preaching during the past fortnight at Tottenham, and much blessing has resulted. Night after night souls have been under conviction of sin, and it has been the joy of the workers to lead them to Christ. Deep interest has been taken in the afternoon Bible lectures. Mr. Inglis is now evangelising at Tunbridge Wells.

Dr. Newman Hall has recently preached and conducted mission services at a large number of places in Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other churches. During the winter months he confines his work chiefly to London and its vicinity. At the close of every evening sermon there is an after-mission service, at which inquirers have an opportunity to hold up a hand for intercession and confirmation.

Dublin.—Mr. Wm. Thomson, of Glasgow, has been carrying on a very successful mission during the past fortnight in the Christian Union Buildings, Dublin. His Bible-readings each afternoon have been practical and forcible expositions. In conducting children's services he has held the rapt attention of his youthful audience, and all leading up to the personal acceptance of the Saviour. There can be no doubt that many a young heart has received deep and lasting impressions. The meetings throughout have been attended by large and increasing audiences.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey had a service in Cooper Union, New York, on January 6, when a great audience came together. The service was the first of a series of five weekly meetings, arranged by Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Brooklyn, who gave a Gospel address. Mr. Moody also spoke, and Mr. Sankey sang. In the immense audience were nearly 800 city ministers and a large sprinkling of business men. Mr. Moody recently addressed a large gathering at Union Theological Seminary on "How to reach Non-Churchgoers." Mr. Sankey and Mr. Stebbins lately occasioned much interest by their singing, alone and together, at Association Hall.

Obituary.

MR. E. G. WOOD.

THIS well-known scientific instrument maker in the City, who in past years did good work in connection with Rev. Samuel Martin at Westminster Chapel, and in later days in the Barbican and at New Broad Street, has passed away. Mr. Wood's death, at the ripe age of eighty-five, will be widely regretted, as his long and useful career had endeared him to many, who owed to him the grinding of their steps in the way of life.

REV. J. B. GIRLING.

Mr. John Girling, of Hackney-road Mission, has received news of the death of his son, Rev. John Barry Girling, Presbyterian Minister, of Salinas Stanislaus City, California, on December 27 last, of apoplexy, aged twenty-five years. The deceased—prior to his departure for Mr. Moody's Institute, Chicago, in July, 1891—was an earnest worker in the North and East of London. In the Hackney-road Mission, the Salvation Army, Mildmay Conference Hall, Dr. Grattan Guinness' College, and Clapton Hall, there are many who remembered and loved him for his work's sake. Will the Lord's people remember the bereaved parents and family at the throne of grace?

MR. WILLIAM EADSON.

On Thursday week, says a correspondent of The Manchester Guardian, one of the noblest and most generous of Christian toilers in this city passed out of our sight. We have known this devoted worker for some twelve or fourteen years. Ever on the alert amongst the haunts of vice or at the prison gate to rescue the degraded and prevent what are really the worst forms of cruelty, many an outcast he helped back to the position she had lost. Few have more grateful friends. Besides a large family of his own, he brought up, on very narrow means, another family as large, which he and his equally self-sacrificing wife adopted from the outcast children of the street. Two poor girls were among the many mourners at the Southern Cemetery, who brought white flowers to the grave, and said in their tears that but for him they would have still been among the lost.

PROF. G. L. WHITE, FISK UNIVERSITY.

The original Jubilee Singers are well remembered by many. These singers were endowed richly with the sweet and mellow voices that nature has given to their race, but they had also a training under a most skilful and magnetic teacher, Professor George L. White. He not only had a genius as a teacher of music, but a profound faith in God that prompted him to undertake a seemingly hopeless enterprise, without adequate means and with little encouragement from others. Their first trip through the States produced £4000, and a second "campaign" in Great Britain and on the Continent was even more successful. As the result of the efforts of the Jubilee Singers under different leaders, nearly £30,000 was realised, which was expended in grounds and buildings for Fisk University—an eloquent though silent monument to their remarkable undertaking. Mr. White died suddenly November 9, being stricken with paralysis. Memorial services were held in the chapel of Sage College, and also at Fisk University, where some of the original band of singers rendered some of the old Jubilee hymns.

REV. PREBENDARY WILLIAM ROGERS.

The venerable rector of St. Botolph's, Bishops gate, whose illness we have noticed during the past weeks, passed away on Sunday. His advanced age and the good work he has done for many years in London, gained him wide and general respect; but apart from these he was in many ways a remarkable man. He was the pioneer of popular education long before the nation awoke in the matter, and he occupied a prominent position on the Royal Commission on Education, appointed in 1858, and when the first London School Board was elected he was returned at the head of the poll for the City. His hearty catholicity of spirit and willingness to fraternise with Nonconformists, and recognise good work wherever found, were marked characteristics of his public career. It is true that the sobriquet, "Hang Theology Rogers," attached itself to him, but all who knew him were aware that the expression was used in a connection which robbed it of theological significance, and was not to be taken as an indication of his own views or preaching. As Rev. R. Clarke said on Sunday evening:—"A personality—a great personality—had been removed after long years of service in the interests of the rich and of the poor. The late Rector's work was not confined to his parish. His influence had been felt throughout the whole City, and his characteristic was thoroughness. His thoughts were not for himself, but for his people, and his parish. The poor always looked up to him as a friend, and his place could not well be filled."

From information that has recently come to hand from the Continent, it is clear that the public press of many countries in Europe is in corrupt hands. The Spectator points out that in every one of the great scandals which have recently shocked France, it has been found in the end that, whether politicians were guilty or not, newspaper proprietors and journalists had been either accepting or extorting money. Many as are the evils connected with our own press, it is generally acknowledged that it is free from this monstrous evil. But there is one direction in which even the English press is vulnerable. No newspaper can carry on its existence without depending largely on advertisements, and there is great danger of allowing its public influence to be privately used in this way for unworthy ends. Then certain departments of news, that had far better be suppressed, help greatly to sell a paper. This is notoriously so with the betting intelligence. The result is that we have so far no daily paper that has had the courage to leave this subject alone.

Mr. A. J. Balfour, speaking recently on the uses and abuses of party government, dealt with the need of softening the "severity and occasional brutalities of public life." These brutalities arise when contending politicians misinterpret one another's motives, and impute unworthy ends and purposes to each other in their public actions. He claimed that a great and salutary change has taken place in this matter since the French Revolution, though there is still abundant room for improvement. We are glad to know that most of the leading politicians on both sides of the House are personally on the best of terms: and that after a heated discussion they often cross the floor of the House and quietly chat over the question at issue in a manner they would do well to emulate in their public utterances. The tendency of the day is to see through the comparative shallowness of these "brutalities," and to enable each side to enter into all that is good in the aims of its political opponents. The time has yet to come when this will be publicly acknowledged, and the "stage warfare of words" be free from the bitterness and insincerity that occasionally creep into it.

If Lady Henry Somerset has rightly judged the case of poor Jane Cakebread, that unhappy woman ought to be in a lunatic asylum, rather than in a prison. It is brain weakness from which she suffers, though that may have been induced by the drink-crave. She is doubtless one of a pretty large class. The same thing might be said of a large number of fallen girls and women: they are imbeciles. All effort on their behalf fails, because they have no strength of mind to work upon; they are rescued and sheltered in homes to-day, and are out again to-morrow, wandering the streets. Of course, the danger of instituting any legal means of controlling either class is great. The power to lodge any person in an asylum may be made an instrument of oppression; and in legal work for the unfortunate class there is always the risk of corrupting the agents employed. Nevertheless, under proper safeguards, some legal provision should be made.

Dr. Pope writes to The Manchester City News defending the "Manchester Mission" from an attack which has been made upon it. In reply to the question, "What is it that attracts the people?" he answers that it is the warm, comfortable, homely character of the halls and chapels which are used, and also the personal interest which is shown in the people by house-to-house visitation of them. The spirit of true Christian brotherhood attracts them. "What are they attracted from?" Mostly from the streets and the slums; chiefly they have been non-worshippers. "What do neighbouring chapels report of the effects of the work?" The chapels in the neighbourhood of the mission are better filled, especially those nearest the Central Hall. Out of 200 persons recently received into fellowship, it was found that more than 80 per cent. had not been in the habit of attending any place of worship. Dr. Pope's defence is a very valuable testimony to the usefulness of such work.

It seems very doubtful whether the "Life of Cardinal Manning," by Mr. Purcell, will either bring honour to the prelate's memory or glory to his Church. As for himself, it shows too much of the subtle, intriguing, ambitious man of the world for esteem and regard to be accorded to him. As for the Church, it lets too much light in upon the inner condition of things, upon the state of parties, upon the way in which the Church is made a political machine; for her to win the trust of those who seek for spiritual things. These exposures are nothing new; are they not written in the history of the Papacy, and in the history of every nation under heaven? Nevertheless, it is a good thing that the British public should see exactly what the Church of Rome is to-day as she works among us.

In his new work on the Christian doctrine of Immortality, Professor Salmond presents us with an exhaustive treatment of this all-important question. He has set himself to the task of calmly and dispassionately considering the ethnic and Old Testament preparation for the teaching of Jesus Christ, and then presenting that in a series of chapters that for scholarly treatment and devout sentiment is a model of what such a work should be. It is a book that should be in the hands of every preacher, for this, among other reasons, that it presents the New Testament doctrine in an unprejudiced and judicial spirit. He concludes his long survey of the question with these wise words: "A true theology on this subject will seek to be positive up to Christ's Word. It will not be ambitious to go beyond it. It will be satisfied to be silent where Christ's voice has not spoken, and it will leave much that is dark in man's life here and hereafter to the Eternal Wisdom that keeps so much in reserve."

If all writers in dealing with this doctrine were to emulate this spirit, we should not be so much divided on the subject. The reason why opinions vary so widely is that each thinker has his own theological axe to grind, and the doctrine is shaped accordingly. Preconceptions are what we must most guard against in interpretation. Many profess to find this or that theory in the words of the Master, and all the time the theory is their own, and nothing but the words are his. Few things are more striking than the reserve of the New Testament teaching on the question of the future life, and while enough is revealed to show the finality of this life for those who have accepted or rejected the Christian offer of salvation, we are left in the dark on many of the wider issues, and we must be willing to wait for light on these till God shows it yonder.

The Word of God is no flatterer; it holds the mirror faithfully up to nature, and reveals every man to himself in his right character. That is one reason why those whose lives are wrong within do not care to read the Bible; and one of the first signs of a decaying spiritual condition is a growing distaste for the "daily portion." A minister tells how he was once visiting at a farmhouse on the edge of an Ayrshire moor, and the farmer's wife informed him that they were reading through the Book of Proverbs at family worship, and that the servant-girl said to her one day, "I dinna like yon buik; it kens ower muckle aboot folk." No better testimony could be given to the searching element that pervades the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. The human heart is laid bare in its evil, and selfishness, and wrong; and were it not that it points us also to the remedy, it would be unbearable to read its scathing exposures of human depravity.

In science our first quest is for evidence; in religion it is for authority. A religion which is open to question at every step, is no religion at all, and will soon be discredited. It must speak in the imperative mood, or it will appeal to no one for long. And so Jesus Christ comes with the voice of one "having authority." His word is Yea and Amen. His commandments ring out clear and strong above the din of the conflicting voices that appeal for our attention. But his supreme demand is for obedience to Himself as the self-evident source of all authority. We must bow to Him with absolute submission, or we can never know the blessed amen He has to give. It is because so many give Him but half or a portion of their allegiance, that their spiritual lives are so miserable. He must be all in all to us, or He can be nothing at all to us.

Christ's Prayer for Unity.

IN his intercessory prayer our Lord asked for his disciples, "That they all may be one; that the world may believe that Thou has sent Me." Was the unity for which He prayed one great society, with one government, doctrine, and worship? If so, the prayer seems farther from fulfilment than ever. The Church of Rome and the Eastern Church, by exclusive claims, are hopelessly separated from all others, some of whom in turn deny the validity of the "orders" of all others, and require, as a condition of unity, conformity, not confederation. Outside these are many who hold very conscientiously differing opinions, which, at present at least, they cannot surrender. Moreover, many consider that for the sake of peace and godly rivalry, the Church as a whole is more pure and useful with its varieties of denomination. The fact remains that unity by organisation is impossible.

But can we suppose that such a petition offered by the Great High Priest of the Church, just before his sacrificial death and his return to glory, offered by Him "whom the Father heareth always" has not been answered during nearly two thousand years?

Was there not, concurrently with the prayer, an actual unity of believing hearts? When the Holy Ghost descended at Pentecost the disciples were "with one accord in one place." When persecution drove them into distant countries they remained one in the truth of God and in the love of one another. Varieties of administration did not disturb unity or brotherhood. All believers confessed "one Lord, one faith, one baptism," one new birth and sanctification by the one Spirit, one Christ living in the hearts of all who believed, one zeal in his service, one hope of his coming, one readiness to be martyrs in his name? Is not such harmony more reality than any external organisation? Our Lord prayed for what He expected. The world did see the harmony—might see it more plainly if instead of striving after the impossible, and sometimes contending about it, we cultivated more diligently, more lovingly, more prayerfully what is so possible and delightful, so beneficial to the world, and so honouring to Christ—the manifestation of this existing unity. Oh, for more mutual forbearance, sympathy, co-operation, exhibiting to each other and the world the oneness for which our Lord prayed, and which exists already, convincing the ungodly that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

Rallying Points.

V.—WORSHIP.

"LET US lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens."—Lam. iii. 41.

"LET US worship and bow down, LET US kneel before the Lord our Maker."—Ps. xcv. 6.

"LET US sing unto the Lord."—Ps. xcv. 1.

PROMINENT amongst the memories of our childhood stands out the picture of little Samuel, with the flaxen curls falling loosely around the fair placid brow, and with folded hands lifted in supplication.

Another favourite is the picture of Moses, whose weary but uplifted hands were supported by Aaron and Hur, lest, drooping, loss to Israel should result.

It seems a matter of regret that the old-time custom of teaching the little ones this same attitude of reverent worship should have fallen, to some extent, into disuse; for it is a beautiful and an impressive one. The outward form, without the inward homage is, indeed, valueless, and we may well guard against making anything into a lifeless ritual; but, whilst fully recognising the dangers of that side, one feels constrained to plead against error of an opposite kind. Is there not, alongside of the mere ceremonialism and formality which one deprecates, a very different but very real danger to be discerned in the want of reverence which too often marks and mars our modern approaches to God? Is not the heart sometimes pained and shocked by the appearance, at least, of undue familiarity in addressing God—a familiarity greater than we find in the recorded language of our Lord Jesus Christ to the Heavenly Father? Do we not sometimes in our prayers, and sometimes in our hymns, too, forget the precept, "Let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore, let thy words be few...When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it" (Eccles. v. 2, 4).

Would not the consideration of such a passage as this, and of others like it, check the too-ready taking upon our lips of language which is, perhaps, altogether beyond our experience, and of supplications from which there is no real desire? Would it not make us hesitate to put into thoughtless lips words which are practically meaningless to an unregenerate heart?

"What things soever ye desire, when ye pray" (Mark xi. 24) indicates a startling corrective of much that we regard as prayer.

Undoubtedly there is a difficulty about the point, since many a saintly soul is helped and stimulated by the very expressions which are as "an unknown tongue" to others; but there is certainly need for prayerful thought lest words of the most sacred import should, in some sort, lose to us their true significance through constant use.

Let us, at any rate, remember for ourselves, and urge others to remember that prayer and praise are definite transactions with God; and that even our attitude should be an act of definite worship; more so, surely, and not less so than the prostration of the heathen, who

In his blindness
Bows down to wood and stone.

There is immense comfort to the thankful, reverent heart in the certainty that our very bowing down before God—if the heart as well be bowed—is acceptable worship. Through weakness, weariness, or other physical causes, there may be, at times, little power to join either in the articulate prayer or the articulate praise, but our very attitude may still be a direct act of homage to the adorable Lord. "Let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." "Let us sing unto the Lord"—definitely and really unto Him, however unmusical the utterance.

Childlike tho' the voices be,
And untunable the parts,
Thou wilt own the minstrelsy
If it flow from childlike hearts.

"Thou wilt own." Herein lies the stupendous miracle of grace that He who has the undivided and perfect worship of sinless hosts (unfallen as we are), is yet pleased to bow his ear, and most graciously to accept our feeble, faulty utterances. Nay, more, if only we in spirit and in truth draw near, we have the Divine all-comforting assurance, "the Father SEEKETH such to worship Him." If He could only accept perfect worship we should never be able here to render it, for our very best is tainted with sin and infirmity, but because He, in his own exceeding love, values the feeble expression of ours, let us not withhold our gratitude and praise, whilst we seek, in simple obedience of his will, or offer both prayer and praise according to the divine pattern. "See that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." "Grace is to be had for the asking. He giveth more grace." "LET US, then, have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear" (Heb. xii. 28). With such acceptable "reverence and godly fear," the most happy communion and the most holy confidence are entirely compatible. Yea, it is to those who draw near in this spirit that He will the most intimately reveal Himself, as He did to the prostrate exile of Patmos, as well as to prostrate Daniel and Isaiah of old.

"We want more reverence for God . . . more reverence for the Bible. Do not be flippant about God. Do not joke about death. Do not make fun of the Bible. Do not deride the Eternal. The brightest seraph cannot look unabashed upon Him. Involuntarily the wings came up. 'With twain he covered his face'" (Talmage).

O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness,
Bow down before Him, his glory proclaim;
With gold of obedience, and incense of lowliness,
Kneel and adore Him; the Lord is his Name.

The Evangelical Alliance.

THE council of the British organisation of the Evangelical Alliance has issued (in English, French, and German) their invitation for the tenth International Conference of the Alliance, to be held this year in London, in celebration of the Jubilee. It is proposed to hold meetings from June 30 to July 4, and into this period there will be compressed a number of addresses on subjects of wide and general interest to Evangelical Christians throughout the world. It is expected that a large number of delegates will attend from all parts of the Continent of Europe, from the United States of America, Canada, Australia, and from many other countries. A number of distinguished men, representing the Evangelical Alliance in various lands, have already intimated their intention to be present at the Jubilee celebration.

It is proposed that in connection with the Jubilee, there should be some gatherings of a local kind in several of the principal cities connected with the origin of the Evangelical Alliance, such as Edinburgh and Glasgow, Liverpool and Manchester. It is, therefore, arranged to limit the London Conference to four days, so that some of the distinguished foreigners present as delegates from the various branches of the Alliance may be able to visit the cities referred to, and take part in local conferences. Particulars regarding the proceedings will be supplied from time to time by Mr. A. J. Arnold, General Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, 7, Adam street, London, W.C.

The Incarnation a Mystery.

By DR. G. F. PENTECOST.

"THAT Holy Thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." If the miraculous conception of our Lord was a great mystery, our Lord Himself is a still greater mystery. Who shall understand how the Eternal God could enter into union with human nature? how this flame of eternal God-head could dwell in the bush of human nature and yet not consume it? We may well turn aside to see "this great sight," and take off the shoes from our feet, for this place whereon we stand is holy ground. Who can tell how the Eternal Son could become truly and really man? and how the Man, Christ Jesus, could be truly God? How such a union could be perfected in one personality? how there could be the union of these two natures, the infinite and the finite, the Eternal Spirit of God and mortal nature of man, and yet not be confused, the human nature not losing itself in the divine and the divine not diminishing itself into the human?

"All this is beyond our comprehension," say the sceptics, "therefore we cannot believe it." Very likely; but when you urge that as a reason for not believing the Incarnation and in the Incarnate God, would you have us believe that you understand even one of the common mysteries which are involved in our own nature and being? How does the soul and spirit of man unite with his body? How do such diametrically opposite substances as spirit and matter come together in such complete union as they do in our persons, the spirit being entirely distinct from the body, and yet permeating it at every point? Can any wise man tell us at what point in the body the spirit unites with it?

Do you understand the lesser mystery of life? "The life is in the blood." So says the Scripture, and after five thousand years science has at last consented. But can you find life in the blood? Is a drop of blood from a dead man's veins any lighter or different in substance from what it was when pervaded and filled with life? Can you explain or even understand the mysteries of your own consciousness? We discriminate between consciousness and will, and reason and affection; but who can locate the one or the other? Love and hate dwell together in the same heart; but who can tell how the one or the other is excited, or how they are differentiated in the same consciousness? Yet these powers and emotions of the human soul are never confused the one with the other, though they are united in one consciousness. Surely, if we ourselves are such a mystery to ourselves, we should not be startled at, much less protest against, the mystery of the Incarnation. Nor should it stagger our faith, even though it transcends our understanding and reason, except that highest reason which bows before the mysteries of God. Rather let us gladly avail ourselves of the help of faith.

If any of you are disposed to reject the mystery of the Incarnation because you cannot understand it, or because it is an event out of the common order of nature, can you suggest how or by what means we are to deliver ourselves from the plague of sin, the curse of the law, and the despotism of death? Can you imagine how else God Himself could have redeemed us and given to us eternal life?—Marylebone Pulpit.

Letters from Africa.—2.

I HAVE been much interested in the kindly work of an American lady, the wife of one of the partners in an engineering firm who is on his way with his family to Johannesburg, where they will remain probably for a year or more. Address: Mrs. Robt. W. Chapin, care of Messrs. Morgan, Hodges, and Co., Paris; or until the fall of 1896, P.O. Box 1,809, Johannesburg, South Africa.

Mrs. Chapin, being in delicate health after the birth of her little girl, engaged as nurse [a young mother of nineteen, who became a very efficient nurse and remained six years in her family. As Mrs. Chapin lay ill for several months she thought of the many incompetent and inexperienced girls who were "helps" in families, and of the worn-out women who had once been such, and had spent the best years of their lives in other people's homes.

While thus musing, it occurred to her that she might get some young girls taught and trained to more efficiency than is usually the case, and thus help three classes—the girls, the mothers, and the babes.

She accordingly arranged with the directors of a children's hospital to take six such young women, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, to whom she undertook to give a small wage of about 5s. a week, and to pay the hospital for their board; their services being given in return for the instruction received.

In a short time, through mentioning it to her friends, Mrs. Chapin had raised enough money to pay for six girls for six months. In that time they learned to wash and dress a baby, and to prepare infants' food, listened to lectures on giving first aid to the injured, were instructed in kindergarten methods of amusing and teaching the little ones, were employed in plain sewing, washing and scrubbing the children's wards, and other menial duties, which they were taught not to consider derogatory; they learned the dignity of honest labour of every kind. They wore linen dresses, caps, and aprons, and became skilful in such duties of a nurse as the use of the fever thermometer, making poultices, administering mustard baths and elementary massage; but were debarred from administering medicine, except as prescribed by a medical man.

At the end of six months all six graduated as nurses, and there were fifty ladies as applicants for their services as nurses to children under two years of age. This was in 1889, and now twenty nurses graduate yearly, and the contributions have enabled the hospital to double its size and to increase its accommodation from twenty to more than forty beds.

As an illustration of results, a lady, who had been obliged summarily to dismiss her nurse in the morning, applied for one of Mrs. Chapin's girls. Before her arrival the lady had to leave home to fulfil an important engagement. When she returned she was met at the door by the new maid in her nursing dress, who told her that her little girl had a bad sore throat, but there were no diphtheritic symptoms; she had put the room in order, given the child a gargle of salt-and-water, taken her temperature (102), and sent for the doctor.

It will occur to others, as it does to me, to ask why, instead of groaning for the good old times when few servants could read or write, we should not have them taught such desirable things as these? Why should we imagine that we can be better served by ignorance than by intelligence? Is not the vulgarity of perpetually ridiculing 'Arry and 'Arriet, their 'elps and 'indrances, more inexcusable than the native vulgarisms of those young people themselves, which their critics do nothing to alleviate? And why, above all, should not Christian ladies win the confidence and affection of those who are charged with being "the greatest plague of life," by showing interest in them, instructing them in ways of usefulness, and using the influence thus gained to lead them to the Saviour?

Another of Mrs. Chapin's benevolent schemes was on this wise. A dear little child had died, and she was almost paralysed with grief. Lying alone, she began to think whether out of her sorrow she could not find some way of giving pleasure to others. She found a New England town where the reputation of the girls was bad. She got six of them together, told them that a great joy having gone out of her own life, she wished to talk to them about seeking joy in wrong and right ways, and to help them to the right. She would meet them again in a week, and they should each tell her what they wished to do or learn, and as far as she could she would help them. Next week fifty-two met her. They wanted to learn the piano, to sing, to make a dress, to trim a hat. Out of all their wants there was not one vicious or unworthy.

"Now, girls," said their friend, "we shall want some money." So they all set to work to produce something for a fancy and useful sale, and the proceeds, with gifts from friends, amounted to £300. In a few months there were 108 members—American, English, Irish, German, etc. What an opportunity for bringing together different nationalities in a friendly way! A house was taken—the rooms were made attractive with pictures, plaster casts, flowers, ornaments. Three classes a week were instituted—for glee-singing, physical culture, and plain sewing.

In about a year a letter came, asking for a kindergarten for the children. This was provided, as well as a debating club for boys. Then a music club on Saturday afternoons, talks about the lives of men, and other means of interesting the girls and lads, and giving quite another character to the town.

Mrs. Chapin did not feel called to pursue her work on distinctly Christian lines; but those who would wish to do so may learn a valuable lesson from her method of establishing communication with the young people concerning their simple human interests. Jesus won the heart and saved the soul of the woman at the well by asking her for a cup of cold water, not even in the name of a disciple, but of a weary fellow-creature. The experience of the Apostles teaches us that we must win others to believe in us before we can lead them to believe in Him.

I have given the address of Mrs. Chapin that any lady wishing to communicate with her may do so.

Visiting the Poor.

A MINISTER in a well-to-do London suburb, having obtained the names of some poor folk, set out to visit them. They all lived in one short street of about sixty houses, not a poverty-stricken street so far as appearances go, but rather the contrary. Yet in the first house there were two widows living, one eighty-six years of age, the other eighty-two; both of them cheerful and grateful, though in utter poverty.

In the next house was a widow, who lost her husband two years ago, and has four children, three of whom are dependent on her. God had been "good in giving her strength to do work," i.e., washing, but it did not always come in sufficient quantity. In the fourth house was a widow of seventy-four, cheerful and thankful. In the fifth house was a widow of fifty-six, quite unprovided for; husband killed only ten weeks ago; son a cabman, who earned a few shillings a week, and had a family of his own; a young daughter does some dressmaking. In the sixth house a gardener out of work, a son an invalid; a daughter at school. In the seventh house a man with poor health, often unable to work, wife lets lodgings, but no lodger just now, and the last one had board and lodging for a week, and went away without paying; five children.

The minister went out at the bottom of the street saying to himself, "How much sorrow there is." Yes, and a good deal nearer to most of us than we suspect; let us look about.

Aggressive Work.—19.

A WHILE ago I was staying at a Welsh resort, during which time I spoke personally about spiritual matters to a great many people. Amongst the rest I happened to come across a well-known scientific professor, who became very much angered, and afterwards wrote to the newspapers because I had politely asked if his soul was saved; so that the circumstance was quite a subject of conversation in the neighbourhood. It is a good thing to have such subjects as Gospel work and Gospel truths talked about, there is such a general disinclination to discuss them. They are thought by many to be too sacred to speak of anywhere but in an ecclesiastical building and on a Sunday. A man called out the other day whilst I was speaking the Gospel in a railway carriage, "I object to these solemn matters being discussed in a railway carriage." Such men don't protest against swearing in railway carriages. Away with such cant. The sect of the Pharisees is still in existence. Oh, for a manly speaking out for Jesus wherever we go (Deuteronomy vi. 6-9.)

However, one morning a group of several ladies and an elderly clergyman were seen standing on the railway-station of this Welsh resort, closely conversing, when a friend of mine passed, and overheard the clergyman exclaim, "No; surely not!" Then one of the ladies replied, "Yes, indeed; it is perfectly true. There is a dreadful man going about here with tracts." They were referring to the above-named circumstance, and I happened to be that "dreadful man." Had I been going about with pistols and bowie-knives I could understand their horror; but fancy the clergyman's feelings when told there was a dreadful man going about with such murderous weapons as tracts!

Upon another occasion I was travelling by railway from London towards the north, in a very full third-class carriage, in which I think there were twelve of us. Amongst the rest was a clergyman. We had not gone very far when I began speaking to all about spiritual matters and the knowledge of salvation. They listened attentively, but without making any remarks. After a time the clergyman leaned over, and whispered to me that he felt rather ashamed of himself for not having spoken upon this subject himself before I, who was a layman, had done so.

Three dock gatemens were standing by the bridge of one of the docks here as I passed. I stopped and asked how many of them had their souls saved? One said he had been saved six years. Another said he had been saved two years; and then, looking at me, he said: "Don't you remember asking me about two years ago at the other end of this dock, whether my soul was saved?" I replied that I did not remember it. "Well, then," he continued, "you did, and that question was the means of convincing me of sin, and about three weeks afterwards I found peace." To God be the glory.

Liverpool.

D. M. DRYSDALE.

Brunswick Hall. Mead Place, Brunswick-street, Well-street.—During the past year the Sunday evening services have been well attended, and much blessing has followed the effort that has been put forth, and numbers have found the Lord, and are now seeking to make known this blessing to others. This has been a most successful year of work, at least thirty-one souls have been saved during the year, no less than twenty-three being scholars from school. The hon. sec. is Mr. W. Holland, 62, Bentham-road, South Hackney.

Albany Institute.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary was held. In the afternoon an address to children and parents was given by Miss M. J. Street. The evening service was conducted by Mr. Wallace. A tea, followed by a public meeting, was held on Wednesday, the chair being taken by Mr. C. Goddard Clarke. The report showed the school to be in a prosperous condition. He asked for special help to clear off a debt still due on account of the enlargement of infants' room. Rev. R. A. Elvey, Mr. Barr, representing Ragged School Union, and Mr. W. A. Cordery gave short addresses.

Altrina.

By MRS. HARVEY-JELLIE.

THE warm glow of the fire shone across the table, screened off from the large room where two nurses sat at tea. They had been on special demand at the hour for the usual afternoon rest, and they were together.

"How serious and thoughtful you look, Altrina."
"Do I, Rachel? I have been here a long time, and perhaps makes one feel serious to realise the many opportunities that have been given! I have often before me the faces that have looked at me from these beds, and I know I shall meet them again, and——"

"Don't, nurse, don't talk so solemnly; we can do our duty."

"Every good workman in any sphere will do his part, Rachel. To go beyond that line is the part which the love of Christ constrains. That work is not tabulated here; it is out of our calculation."

"You have many who will bless you, Altrina. You know how that miserable woman used to long for you when I was on duty, because she said you gave her something better than medicine. I knew that she meant, but I could not give her that; we cannot give what we do not possess."

"Rachel, to see suffering and bear suffering, to love and know we have to die, and not have that something better, is too dreadful to think of."

The conversation was interrupted by a summons for Altrina.

Over the hospital brightly shone the heavens, and away in the calm region above, it seemed as if no sound of the sin and cries of earth could pierce. The night was cold, and all around was still, save for a moan now and again. Altrina sat watching a woman whose case had almost baffled the doctors. One day she promised well, then sudden fever or fresh pain brought her nigh to death.

"Nurse, tell me now; shall I get well, or must I die?" "I cannot tell you that, but do you know what the house doctor said this morning? He spoke of your easily excited nature, and he said, 'She could be all right, if there was more rest in her.'"

"But I can't alter myself; I always was a restless one."

"Do not look so anxiously at me, I cannot speak for your body, dear, but you can have rest of soul, and with that rest, I can say, your soul shall never die." "Can the soul die, then, nurse?"

"Die to heaven and God, I mean; to 'go away into utter darkness,' is dying enough, isn't it? Oh, my patient, never risk it, leave no uncertainty on this all-important question, but take the rest Jesus offers, and say you will live, truly live, and for ever."

Altrina's magic touch was needed at another bedside, a young girl asked for her.

"I cannot sleep, nurse, and the thought of my wicked life seems worse where you are; you must make me good."

The hot head was placed more comfortably, and some cooling drink given, as Altrina said, "Try to say it meaningly, Nellie—

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bidst me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come."

Moving away, she left a sense of rest to the tired girl, who was trying to say that prayer from her heart.

"Is the poor arm more comfortable?" she whispered to the child in the next bed, who looked for word. "Will mother come to-morrow, nurse?"

"Very likely, dear, I'll love you for her till she comes; sleep now." Thus passed the night of gentle ministering.

"Must it be, nurse; can I bear it?" asked the woman who had been longing to get well. She was worse; fresh danger had arisen, and prompt measures were to be used.

"You can't bear it, can't even bear the fear of it; but do you not hear Christ saying about it all—'Come, I will give you rest,' even from that burden?" Altrina saw the poor trembling soul was slowly coming at the mighty call, and with that soul on her heart she waited upon God in earnest prayer.

The time had come. "Let nurse speak to her," said the chief doctor, who had seen the power she had to soothe. Altrina simply said, bending over her, "When thou passest through the waters, I—I will be with thee." It was enough for the sufferer, and years after it was enough to give courage to the doctor (who then heard it savingly) as he went through the depths of sorrow.

A week later danger was over, and the patient talked of her gratitude. "Nurse, I cannot think Jesus has gone away from this world, while such as you move about in it."

"He said, 'Lo! I am with you alway,' and He is here. It is not I you should praise, but the One who works in and through me," said Altrina, and giving gracious advice, she had a parting prayer, for soon another one would occupy that bed.

On the day that Altrina was seeking the "grace sufficient" for the task of caring for a patient who was rebellious and hard to deal with, there was a new joy in a little home in the far east of London. The wife and mother had returned, with new health, a new light in her eye, and new hope in her heart, to tell husband and children of the place where she got healing for body and soul. As little Harry read the story of Jacob's dream, she said, "There, dears; that place was like to Bethel. I lay down there in that ward, and felt lonely and sad, and it turned out to be the house of God, and Nurse Altrina the angel who pointed me up to heaven and Jesus."

The hospital on Sunday! What an opportunity for a disciple of the Great Physician! Would that our self-denying nurses realised this fully! It was toward evening. The chief duties were over, and quiet reigned. Here and there a group of nurses stood by the fire, one by this or that bed. Altrina saw an "open door" was set before her: she had asked for it, should she shrink! She was returning to her post after her rest, and straight from "waiting" upon her Lord, and entering the long room (not yet lighted for evening), she stood a second to gaze on the pathetic scene of pain and weariness, and yet expectancy. Taking up her Bible, she went into the centre, and before the nurses were aware, she read out Psa. cxxi, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord," to the end. There was a faint tremor in the solemn voice, as she closed the book, and her eyes also, and said, "Almighty God, help these dear suffering ones to look away from pain and trouble to Thee, and while by thy blessing we try to heal their bodies, wilt Thou save their souls through Jesus Christ!"

Soon the speaker was faithfully attending to one in pain—but the name of Jesus spoken in loving reverence, started a vibration in hearts that had not heard it since childhood; and in eternity she will hear of it again.

Altrina no longer walks the wards in Christ's name, to bless. In leaving her loved work, she said, "Even so, Lord"—and she is waiting for the day of "shining as the stars." She knows not how many souls she won for her Saviour, and the one who tenderly cares for her, is Rachel, who thanks God, through Jesus, for that "something better," which is hers for ever.

Huguenots in Canterbury Cathedral.—For many generations the Huguenots and their descendants have worshipped in the crypt of Canterbury Cathedral, and the right so to meet has long been jealously guarded. Now, however, a majority of the "Consistory" has consented to yield their undoubted right, and meet in the Black Prince's Ghantry. A minority raised a strong protest against the change, regarding it as a surrender to sacerdotalism and priestly domination.

The Outlook in Ireland.

[By A CORRESPONDENT.]

THE great outstanding fact in the Irish religious world at present is the tremendous effort being made to unite the divided political factions, and drive them once more in Rome's harness. Last winter quite a small synod of Irish Roman Catholic bishops was assembled in Rome, and it leaked out through the Press that a united effort was to be made to fuse all the Roman Catholic parties, and present a united ultramontane front in favour of denominational education in the coming session of Parliament. The Parnellites made some speeches here in the autumn, declaring that if education is to be subsidised from the rates, then the ratepayers must have a controlling voice in the management of the schools. Such doctrine is rank heresy in ultramontane eyes. The Roman Catholic bishops alone are to have control in the schools.

Now, since the return of the bishops from Rome the olive-branch is held out to the Parnellites. The bishops and their journals are piping notes of peace with most edifying harmony. Cardinal Logue is still in Rome, and no man can doubt that a supreme effort is being made to set up denominational education in the United Kingdom.

The report of the Connellan Mission for 1895 is a deeply interesting document. Mr. Connellan pleads earnestly for a federation of evangelistic bodies, at least to the extent of meeting frequently for prayer and consultation. Many deeply interesting passages are given from the journals or reports of workers, and we are told that "in every case the workers are converted Roman Catholics."

With the exception of Sligo, where an organised effort has been made to provoke riot and disorder, the country is profoundly quiet, and the evangelist may go into any district with perfect safety. Of course great prudence and intimate knowledge of the people are necessary in order to avoid mistakes. The seed of God's Word has been sown broadcast, and continues to be sown every day. Marvellous cases are known of persons in high station and of great intelligence, who, although in outward conformity with Rome, are kept there merely by human respect. Such a condition of things cannot last long.

The saddest thing about the large cities is the number of young men who have left Rome only to wander into utter infidelity. A mother spoke to a priest about one such recently, and he said, "Oh, don't annoy yourself. He'll sow his wild oats and then come back." If he had become a Protestant all the machinery of Rome would have been set to work, but as he was only an infidel it was a matter of small consequence.

"For Ever."

The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand for ever.—Isa. xl. 8.

THE freshness of the spring-time

Can never with us stay,
The snowdrops, in their beauty,
Must quickly fade away.

For spring, with all her brightness,
Is but a passing thing;
All angel-like she cometh,
But may not fold her wing.

The tender grass doth wither
Beneath a summer sky,
Whose glowing days but herald
An autumn drawing nigh.

And autumn's leaves but redden
To pale on chilly blast,
Until, with moisture laden,
They meekly fall at last.

Yet, though the winter cometh,
With frost, and ice, and snow,
And though the words, "We stay not,"
Are writ on all below;

Still let us gladly gather
True comfort for to-day
By resting upon something
That ne'er shall pass away.

God's word doth stand for ever;
And we ere long shall be
Where nothing that we value
Shall "fade" for you or me.

"HE WROTE A COPY OF THE LAW OF MOSES."—
Joshua viii. 32.

IF we view this act typically, it is very significant. These things happened to Israel as a type and foreshadowing of great spiritual realities. Now, Canaan is an emblem of the heavenlies, that blessed condition of joy and peace and spiritual power which is ours in Jesus, and becomes ours to enjoy, when we receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. It might have been supposed that under these circumstances there would be no need for the Holy Law of God, as given at Sinai, and repeated in Deuteronomy. But it is not so. Even in the heavenlies the law is written again.

Jesus said, I came not to destroy, but to fulfil (Matt. v. 17).—Not to abrogate, or set aside, or supersede the Holy Law, but to re-enact it after a more spiritual sort, and to secure, not an outward, but an inward compliance with its precepts. Our Lord complied, not only with the moral, but, as a Jew, with the ceremonial law; and his great aim and purpose was to honour and magnify it in the hearts of his people.

The Apostle Paul says that the ordinance of the law will be fulfilled by those who walk after the Spirit (Rom. viii. 4).—It is holy, just, and good, and they who are carnal and sold under sin cannot by their own resolutions and efforts comply with its demands; but when the soul is yielded to the Holy Spirit, He works in us the will and the power.

The Epistle to the Hebrews says that it will be written on our hearts (Heb. viii. 10).—This is the provision of the new covenant, not on stone, but on the tablets of flesh, so that we shall love it. Oh, Spirit of God, write a copy here!

"THEY ASKED NOT COUNSEL AT THE MOUTH OF THE LORD."—Joshua ix. 14.

It was a bad business! Certainly the Gibeonites did their work with wile, and were more than a match for the chosen race. Probably they would not have dared to attempt such a piece of imposition on men of their own sort, but the Israelites seemed a likely prey. They had so recently come into the land, that they might be supposed to be unfamiliar with the guile of Canaan. Yet how astute they fancied themselves!

So the children of God are imposed upon still! Women get married to unconverted husbands, supposing all the while that they are converted. Ministers of churches admit ravening wolves into their midst, deceived by the device of the sheepskin. Young converts get seduced from the simplicity and purity of the faith by lying spirits, that seem as lovely as God's angels. This is due to their relying on their own judgment, and not asking counsel of God. We must try the spirits, whether they be of God, for many false spirits are gone out into the world.

Yet God held Israel to the covenant that their leaders had struck, and in after years their breach of this promise was awfully avenged (2 Sam. xxi. 1-2). When we have taken a false step we may be forgiven, but we shall be held to its results. Oh, souls, be sure to call in the Priest, with the Urim and Thummim, that He may give you counsel. Seek the purged eye and the pure heart to be able to behold it!

"THERE WAS NO DAY LIKE THAT AFTER IT."—
Joshua x. 14.

The sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and lasted not to go down; but there has been no day like that, and there will be none. You may bid the westering sun of another's life stay its downward track toward the western sea, but in vain. It may be some revered minister, some sainted parent, some life dearer to you than your own, but it obeys not your bidding. Surely and inevitably the little daughter of Jairus fades like a flower plucked from its stalk; and Lazarus sinks into his death-sleep, despite the eager message of the sisters to the Life-giver.

So with the sun of your own life. Slowly and steadily it descends. Work while it is called to-day, for the night cometh, in which no man can work. Finish the work that your Father has given you to do; there is only just time enough for it to be done within the span of your days.

But there is one Sun that goes not down. "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw herself, for the Lord shall be to thee an everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended." Ah, precious Sun of Righteousness, when once Thou hast risen upon the soul, Thou shalt know no setting, ever higher and higher shalt Thou rise until the perfect day; no twilight or night can come where Thou art; no darkness draw its veil across the sky! Neither life nor death, principalities nor powers, things present nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is now shining upon our hearts.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

"SO JOSHUA TOOK THE WHOLE LAND...AND JOSHUA GAVE IT..."—Joshua xi. 23.

This is almost an exact parallel of the words addressed by Peter to the crowds on the day of Pentecost: "Having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this." In his representative capacity, as the Head of his Church, and the Forerunner of the great host of the redeemed, it was necessary that Jesus should first receive from God the Father all that spiritual inheritance which he was to communicate to those who should afterwards believe in his name: and having received, He is prepared to give.

The whole land of spiritual blessing is now in the hand of Jesus. The prince of this world is cast out. The power of the Anakim is broken. The seven nations of Canaan and all the power of the enemy is under his feet. His are the rivers of the fulness of the Holy Ghost, and his the mountains of fellowship; his the slopes where the vines of Eshcol ripen and the corn of Canaan goldens; his the green pastures and the still waters of communion, as well as the rocky defile of death. Whatever then you desire, you must seek at his hand, in whom it is vested for thee, and me, and all of us: and He will give it.

The land had rest from war. Cease, then, from strife. You will not win by sore wrestling. The lame take the prey. Learn to take; let Him cause you to inherit; let Him give according to the division allotted you in the providence and determination of God. "It shall be given to those for whom it is prepared." "They that receive the abundance of grace shall reign."

THURSDAY, February 6.

"MOSES, THE SERVANT OF THE LORD, GAVE IT."—
Joshua xii. 6.

We must not press a type, or analogy, unduly, though we may employ it to illustrate a doctrine well established from other parts of Scripture. Such an illustration is here. It is remarkable that the two tribes and a half which Moses settled beyond the Jordan took little part in the national life, and were soon wiped out of their inheritance. They were apparently absorbed by the nations whom they were supposed to have superseded.

This was partly due to the devotion of the people to their material prosperity. In the words of Deborah, Reuben preferred to sit among the sheepfolds, to hear the piping of the flocks, than to take part in the emancipation of Canaan from Midian. But, looked at typically, may we not say that whatever Moses gives will ultimately evade our grasp and slip from our possession? Like the tables of stone, it will fall from our hand and be broken in pieces. All that you try to be or do in the power of your own resolution and energy will inevitably fail and deceive you. The land looks fair and the tenure seems good, but you will not be able to retain it.

The deepest blessings of the spiritual life cannot be won or held in the strength of our own purpose, even though it be a holy and earnest one. These things can be ours only in so far as we abide in Christ, in whom our inheritance is vested, and from whom we receive it as we need it, by faith. We can hold nothing apart from abiding fellowship with Jesus.

FRIDAY, February 7.

"THERE REMAINETH YET VERY MUCH LAND TO BE POSSESSED."—Joshua xiii. 1.

This is true in many directions:—

Of the Bible.—How many pages of our Bible are unpossessed? We have not underlined any verses in them, or put any marks in the margin to indicate that God has spoken through them to our souls. They are as clean as when they came from the printers. It is well sometimes to consider this, and to resolve to master some unfamiliar portions of God's Word, believing that no word of God is devoid of power.

Of doctrinal truth.—Doctrine groups texts, and compares them. Doctrine is to isolated texts what laws are to particular facts. We should know the doctrines of the Bible. We should understand what is meant by Predestination, or the unction of the Holy Ghost, or the Second Advent. How much unoccupied land there is here, which, if brought under cultivation, would yield grapes, and corn, and other produce for the refreshment and strength of the soul.

Of spiritual experience.—Talk with some deeply taught saint, and you will see how little you have traversed of the good land beyond the Jordan, or know of its blessed extent. To know the length and breadth, and depth, and height of the love of Christ seems given to but few, but it need not be. There is no favouritism in the kingdom which excludes some poor souls from the richer portions and shuts them up to barrenness and a northern aspect. Rise, go through the land in the length and breadth of it; it is all yours; the gift of God in Jesus Christ; claim and possess it.

SATURDAY, February 8.

"AS MY STRENGTH WAS THEN, EVEN SO IS MY STRENGTH NOW."—Joshua xiv. 11.

Men sometimes lose heart as they grow old. They say: My intellect will become impaired, my physical strength will abate, my power for service will wane. Yes! but if the outward man decays the inward man shall be renewed day by day.

Those that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength: whether to war, to go out for service, or to come in for fellowship and rest. Be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart. He shall satisfy thy mouth with good things, so that thy youth shall be renewed as the eagle's. God's angels are always young. The drain of the years is amply met by the inflow of his all-sufficient grace. There is no reason why we should decline in usefulness and fruit-bearing with the increase of years, but the reverse. The last sheaves that fall beneath thy sickle shall be the heaviest, and the width of thy swath shall be greatest as the angel of death touches thee and bids thee home. The secret lies in wholly following the Lord.

But Caleb did not rely on his strength to win Hebron. Very modestly and humbly he said, "I may be that the Lord will be with me." Not that he for a moment doubted it. Could it be for one moment supposed that the God whom he had wholly followed for eighty years would desert him in the supreme crisis of his life? But he put it thus in the sweet lowliness of his soul, because he counted not himself worthy. The strongest men are they who count that they are helpless, and who put their weakness at the disposal of God's might.

Some Bible Laddies.

THERE are several bright little lads mentioned in Scripture whose experience and service may guide and help the boys and girls who read this column. They hold, as it were, a lamp with a shining light across the path of all who are following in their footsteps. The Holy Spirit has introduced these interesting lads, no doubt, to teach us a few clear lessons of prayer, obedience, blessing, activity, and service. I have given you the chapters, you can find the verses.

1. We first meet a Suffering Lad, in Gen. xxi. who shows us the value of Prayer.

"And God heard the voice of the lad"...and God was with the lad." He cried in his suffering and distress, and the Lord heard him. "Crying" is the natural way for a child to make known its needs to its father, whilst "Praying" is the cry of our souls to our Heavenly Father. The Lord always hears us (Ps. xxxiv.).

2. The Submissive Lad comes next, in Gen. xlii., with Obedience as his motto.

"And I and the lad will go yonder, and worship, and come again to you." The secret of Isaac's happy, peaceful life was his willing obedience to God. Isaac was an example of obedience. "They went both of them together," a lesson of loving submission, "and laid him on the altar"; a light to the Lord Jesus, "God will provide Himself a lamb."

3. Now let us notice the Saving Lad, in Gen. xliii., who is a Blessing.

Little Benjamin was the centre of interest, the link of blessing, and the bond of union. No corn, nor happiness, nor hope, without him. In these particulars Benjamin is a picture of the Lord Jesus, and a help to every boy. Every true Christian is a link of blessing to others.

4. The Selected Lad, in 1 Sam. xx., teaches us the value of Activity.

"And he said unto his lad, Run and find out now the arrows." This willing active lad did a great work in Israel that day. He was a signal of warning to David, "Is not the arrow beyond thee?" a smart servant for Jonathan, "Make speed, haste, stay not"; and a saviour of a king and a kingdom, even though he knew it not (v. 39).

Every Christian boy should be active for Jesus, and always ready to help and be kind to others.

5. There is one more, the Serving Lad in John vi. Service is his lesson to us.

There were three things which fitted this lad for service. He was following Jesus. He was in the right place—close to Jesus. He had five loaves and two fishes. He had the right things—grace and gifts. He was found willing to lend them to Jesus. He had the right spirit—a willing heart.

These are the qualifications needed for the Lord's service.—We must be near, prepared, and willing. "Who will be the next to follow Jesus?"

This lad would have delighted John Wesley, whose advice is:—"Do all the good you can. By all the means you can. To all the people you can. In all the ways you can. In all places you can. As long as ever you can."

When Count Zinzendorf was a little boy at school, he founded a small Guild amongst his schoolfellows, which he called the "Order of the Grain of Mustard-seed," and thereafter that seedling grew into the great brotherhood, now known by the name of Moravians, who have proved such a blessing to the world. The Bible Searcher.

Answers to these competitions are acknowledged in two lists:—

1. Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue. 2. Those received later, in the one following.

But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the competition appears.

I WANT my little friends to read carefully the last of the paragraphs in small print just above, because I received a great many answers after the Thursday morning which had to be marked "Too Late." That is why some, which were really right, have had to be left out.

Another reason why some competitors to No. 3 do not find their names in the list, is because they forgot to write out the whole verse (Rom. xii. 21) in which the Hidden Text was found.

If you read the directions very carefully every week you will be less likely to make mistakes. I am afraid last week's "Searcher" (No. 4) has proved rather hard for some; and others have just gone back to school and have not had time for it; so I have not received so many replies. I think you will be able to manage No. 5 better. I rather expect the postman likes a hard one best, so that he may not have so many answers to carry. And what about poor Uncle Tom himself, having them all to examine? But you need not be afraid of hurting either of us. The postman is a nice good-tempered man and will not mind; so let us see how many can send answers to this week's "Searcher," and get some of your little friends and schoolfellows to join you as well.

Next week I shall be able to say something about the prizes which I hope to arrange for later on.

THE ANSWER TO No. 4 (Jan. 23):—

I. THE LION.

1. 2 Sam. xxvii. 10.—A Lesson of Bravery. The lion is a brave or "valiant" animal, and a brave man is like a lion.

2. Prov. xxviii. 1.—A Lesson how to become Bold. Goodness makes people bold like lions; but sin makes them cowards.

3. Prov. xxviii. 15.—A Lesson about Bullying. A wicked ruler frightens and hurts his people like a roaring lion would do.

4. Rev. v. 5.—A Lesson of Christ's Power. "The Lion of the tribe of Judah," that is, Jesus Christ, is able to do what no one else could do.

II. THE LAMB.

1. Is. xl. 11.—A Lesson of God's Loving Care. God is like a shepherd leading his sheep and carrying the little ones not big or strong enough to walk. Children are his "little lambs."

2. John xxi. 15.—A Lesson of our Duty to Others. All who love Jesus are to be kind to his little ones and take care of them.

3. Acts viii. 32.—A Lesson of Patience in Trial. Jesus was like a lamb, gentle and quiet, even when He knew He was going to be put to death.

There has necessarily been great variety in the form of the answers received this week, no two being expressed in the same way, and some being much more complete than others. But all contain the ideas given above have been counted as right. The others have missed the central point of one or more of the passages.

A Play-class Festival.

DURING the sleet and snow of a recent Friday evening, which made the by-streets of the Borough a sea of slush, the members of a girls' play-class were holding high festival at Collier's Rents, Long-lane, S.E.

A play-class! What a contradiction it sounds in the ears of well-to-do children! But what a beautiful service of "these little ones" it is! Can it be necessary that the girls and boys who dart about the reeking courts and narrow streets of that malodorous locality should be taught how to play? Nothing is more needful if they are to play rationally—if play is to be an innocent, helpful thing to the opening minds of the children of the streets. Real, healthy recreation seems so very far away from them. Where are they to play? Where is the quick, invigorating breeze, laden with the ozone of the sea, or the inspiring breath of the mountains, to come from, that puts health and colour into the cheeks of little country children? Where are the glades and the glens, the green grass, and the bright flowers, in such a dense, poverty-smitten district? No other playgrounds than the gutters, the alleys, or the stairs and door-steps have these pale-faced, dwarfed little ones had from the moment they could toddle.

Some kind souls have had pity upon them and founded a play-class, where a noble Christian lady every week teaches a hundred girls and more what love, mirth and life can be put into innocent play.

The playground is not, therefore, a green field, open on all sides to God's broad sunshine, with hedges all aglow with wild flowers. It is just the prosaic sanded floor of Collier's Rents Mission Hall, surrounded with four walls.

But it is a gay place week by week "for a' that," if children's laughter, shouts and merriment have any significance in them at all.

On this Friday evening, however, everything that transpired was special. When I entered the hall, a short time before the juvenile guests of the evening were admitted, it required only a glance to see that loving hands had already busied themselves in preparation for the evening's enjoyment. The tables were being laid; in an inner room a group of young people were cutting up and arranging piles of cake and bread-and-butter, while displayed at the back of the platform was a varied selection of dolls and other toys and sweets, together with bags of oranges, apples and nuts. These spoke of gaiety indeed. No ordinary play evening could this be, I knew in a moment.

After tea, the festival began. The usual games were dispensed with on this occasion. Vocal and instrumental music and recitations, rendered chiefly by young people from Lee and East Dulwich, made the scene as much like a Christmas home-party as the circumstances would allow. And when it came to the distribution of the toys, how difficult it was to restrain the eagerness; every little face was a picture of expectation, until the coveted treasures were really in the thin hands of the girls—all their own—to take home with them. As they left the building, after great cheering, each child received an orange, an apple and a large handful of nuts.

So the play-class came to an end for that evening, and I saw how child-life, even in that poor neighbourhood, could be made beautiful for a little while. The words would come to me over and over again as I hastened home: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these...ye did it unto Me."

It seems to me that no better work than this has ever been touched by the philanthropic branch of the London Congregational Union. I am quite sure that Rev. Andrew Means, the secretary of the Union, or Mr. L. Wilson Gates, the superintendent of this material ministry of help, at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, will be glad to supply any information about the bairns that any young or older reader of this article may desire.

Chastening.

IT is an easy thing to praise our God when the skies are fair, and the sun of prosperity shines upon us. But when the dark clouds gather, and storms of trouble and affliction sweep over us, and everything seems to be against us, then the devil and our own evil hearts tempt us to think that God is hard and unkind. Then it is that we need more than ever to fly to the "mercy seat" for "grace sufficient" to help in time of need.

"Pray without ceasing," and "in everything give thanks," are closely connected. It is hard to be able to give thanks for trials and affliction; yet they are necessary to fit us for our place in the kingdom of heaven, and are as much tokens of love as the very brightest and best of God's gifts to his children.

There are three thoughts in Scripture which bear out this last statement, and perhaps will afford comfort to some who may be passing through deep waters:—1. Chastening is an assurance of sonship. "If ye endure chastening God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?"

2. It is a proof of God's love. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." "As many as I love," saith Jesus, "I rebuke and chasten."

Though He may send some affliction,
'Twill but make me long for home;
For in love and not in anger
All his chastenings will come.

3. It is for our profit. "We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we give them reverence; shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but He for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness."

We cannot understand all the Father's dealings with us now, but we shall know hereafter, when we see with unclouded vision in the glorious light of God. What now seems strange, hard, and unkind, will then, when viewed in that light, be plain, just and good. As one has said, "We are as yet only this side of the tapestry of life, and do but see the unfinished workings of a Divine Providence; when we get to the other side we shall see the Divine pattern in all its exquisite beauty and completeness and perfection."

Not now, but in the coming years,

It may be in the better land,

We'll read the meaning of our tears,
Up there, up there, we'll understand.

Till then let us patiently wait, and bow in submission to "His" will, even though it seems hard and unpleasant. Let us not rebel, but, strong in faith, may our confidence in God be like that of Job, who said, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him."

F. DAWSON.

Boys' Bible-class, Bristol.—In our notice, last week, of work amongst boys in Clifton it was implied that in addition to the efforts put forth amongst better-class boys something was also done to reach the poorer lads of Clifton and Bristol. This is not the case; the work described being confined to the sons of well-to-do parents.

Persia.—Dr. Carr, of the C.M.S., writes to us from Julia:—"I am anxious to send home an appeal to medical men on behalf of Persia. Of course, all countries have their great needs, but perhaps none need the Gospel more than poor Persia, and in few countries is medical work more valuable in bringing the people under the sound of the Gospel. We have now urgent need for three medical men, one to begin medical mission work in Yezd, a large city containing chiefly Mussulmans, but also many Parsees and Jews; a second to take up work in some other place which we hope to be able to open shortly, and a third to help me in my work here."

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANA.

THE LAST PHILISTINE WAR.

(Concluded.)

DAVID'S victory over the Philistines by means of the Theophany and the storm, is the conclusion of a history between the two peoples, extending over a period of five hundred years. The Philistines are the first tribe of whom mention is made in the account of the exodus of the children of Israel (Ex. xiii. 17), and they, more than any of the neighbouring tribes, became pricks and thorns in the side of Israel (Num. xxxiii. 55). They not only disputed possession of the country with them, but more than once threatened the existence of Israel as the chosen people of God. It was they who compelled the Danites to seek dwelling-places northwards.

Delilah's cry to Samson, "The Philistines be upon thee," was, in truth, the cry which Israel was always obliged to be prepared for. Even after David had sung Ps. lx. 8, "Philistia, shout thou because of me" (R.V.), and the reins of the capital, Gath, had been taken from their hands, came the hardest time of all, during which the Philistines were more to be feared than ever. This was caused by Gath breaking her oath of allegiance and joining cause with the four other kings against Israel. The visitation, caused by a long-forgotten national sin, in the shape of a three years' famine, David's weakness, the yearly-increasing boldness of the Philistines' attacks, supported as they were by the four sons of the giant (Raphah; see A.V. and R.V. marg.)—everything, especially in the third year, gathered as before a rising storm.

The Philistines,* like the Israelites, were an immigrant tribe; hence their designation, "the sons of the stranger" (Ps. xviii. 44, marg.). They seem never to have given up the hope or the desire of regaining the land to which they even gave their name, Palestine, or the Philistine land; nor to have relinquished their claim upon it. There was never any question of exterminating them, for they did not belong to the original Canaanitish population. In Deut. ii. 23 they seem to be placed on an equality with the children of Edom, Moab, and Ammon, who were to be treated leniently. Likewise, in Ezek. xxv. 16, they are classed with the three other kindred tribes, and are called Cherethim. They were without doubt a mixed race, possibly originating from Egypt, and also from Crete, receiving through this extraction a strong Japhetic element.†

David's bodyguard, the Cherethites and the Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18, and elsewhere), if these words mean Cretans and Philistines, gives the impression of a mixed race. The peculiar strength with which they, as a mixed people, were endowed, was also increased by the fact that they were both agriculturists and seamen. If their ports, which are now destroyed by the filling in of sand, were small, they at any rate gave opportunity for trade and piracy (Amos i. 6). The sea beyond was also called "The Sea of the Philistines." Their religion, too, indicates of what importance the sea was to them. The name of their god Dagon comes from dag ("fish"), and is represented by a man whose nether part is a fish's body. Their language seems only to have varied dialectically from that of the Israelites. Small as was the country they had acquired, it was, however, rich, and has been called "little Egypt" on account of the abundance of its corn. None of the most fruitful prairies of America can be compared with it for fertility.

* The name is said to be derived from a Semitic root, meaning, to rove, wander, migrate.

† The origin of the Philistines is still too difficult a question for historical science to solve. It has been supposed that they were the ancient Hyksos, the Semitic shepherd-kings who were driven from Egypt, also that their name was connected with that of the Egyptian border fortress, Pelusium. It has been asserted with still greater probability that their name is allied to that of the Pelasgi, the aboriginal inhabitants of the coast of the Mediterranean, and through them they derived a Japhetic origin. Their uncircumcision is hardly to be supposed in a race long settled in Egypt, but is explicable if they came from Crete. In 1 Sam. xxx. 14, the south is called the Negeb of the Cherethites. In Zeph. ii. 5, in a reference to Philistia, mention is made of "the inhabitants of the sea coasts, the nation of the Cherethites."

If, like no other people, they fought against the Israelites, to whom also they were formidable with their horses and chariots, which the latter were not permitted to use (Ps. xx. 7), so also did God manifest Himself to them in a singular manner. As their five kings held steadfastly together against Israel, so also did they rely steadfastly on their Dagon against the God of Israel. They knew well enough of the exodus of the children of Israel, and the judgments that had fallen on the Egyptians, and they realised that the same thing might happen to them. God sent upon them through Israel many supernatural visitations—visitations exactly suited to them, but they would not yield. They trusted in their giants, and just through that giant of giants, Samson, God met them with a unique manifestation, and that still more in his death than in his life. They trembled and shook when the Ark of God entered the camp of the Israelites, but they only united the more firmly in rallying themselves; their great victory was turned into a crushing defeat for Dagon, and compelled their reverence towards Jehovah, as manifested in their treatment of the Ark, although they remained equally obdurate.

When David defeated them the first time, they were compelled to leave all their gods behind them; the second time he "put them to a perpetual reproach" by defeating them from the rear (2 Sam. v. 20 and following verses), to which Asaph refers in Psalm lxxviii. 66; then he humbled them by taking the reins of the capital out of their hands (2 Sam. viii. 1). During the famine the temptation proved too strong for them, and they broke the oath of allegiance (Ps. cxliv. 8) by which they had saved themselves from a punishment similar to that of Moab, Edom, and particularly Ammon. To those who prophesied by the clouds, the Lord eventually revealed himself, just when, in the third year of the war, the Philistines had every prospect of conquering David and his people. He revealed Himself by means of the clouds of heaven, by means of thunder and lightning; and in vain the Philistines sought, after the signal defeat caused by panic, to call on Jehovah (Psalm xviii. 13, 14, 41). Their hypocrisy could not save them from complete subjection, which rendered them harmless for a long time to come, after the fourth and last of the sons of "the giants" was slain at the taking of Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 20-22).

And yet this great martial mission can hardly have been without fruit. King Achish saw in David an angel of God, and that at a time when David far from deserved it (1 Sam. xxix. 3, 9). And in Ittai we see at last a ripened mission fruit (2 Sam. xv. 19-22). When David's own son fails him, and the great ones of the land "hasten after another" (Psalm xvi. 4, marg.), Ittai determines to follow David into exile with the bodyguard, and becomes one of Israel's first chiefs in the great distress and trials of the civil war (2 Sam. xviii. 2-5, 12).

P. S. A. Coming of Age.—The members of the Ebenezer class, West Bromwich, held on Sunday week their annual prize distribution. The mayor (Councillor G. Salter) presided, and testified to the great usefulness of the movement. Mr. Blackham, the conductor of the class and founder of the P.S.A., mentioned that the class was established exactly twenty-one years before in the adjoining school-room, and as that was the origin of the movement it might be said to have attained its majority. Dr. Satchell, of Handsworth, delivered an impressive address on "What think ye of Christ?" About 900 men were present, the chapel being well filled, and 500 prizes were distributed for regular attendance. A large number of new members were enrolled. There are in West Bromwich alone about twenty of these classes, with a membership of from 4000 to 5000. Taking the country generally, it is computed that there are considerably over 1,000 branches, with upwards of 100,000 members.

The Late Mr. John Morley, Clapton.

THE following is the substance of what was spoken in Clapton Hall at Mr. John Morley's funeral by one who had long been associated with him in work for God:—

"I have known Mr. Morley only for the last twenty-five of his eighty-eight years. I cannot, therefore, speak of him as the wise and successful business man that others have told me he was in his early years, honoured and trusted by all associated with him. When I first met him, in May, 1875, he had for years retired from business; or, rather, he was making the winning of souls for Christ, and the laying up of treasure in heaven, the business to which he devoted his means and his life.

"I do not know at what time or under what circumstances he first trusted the Lord Jesus as his Saviour; but he has often told me what an era 1859 formed in his spiritual history. That was the year of a great awakening in the North of Ireland. He, accompanied by his devoted and altogether like-minded wife, and their beloved friend J. Denham Smith, visited the scene of that awakening. It was from that time that he was drawn so closely to God, and that he learned what a wonderful thing it was to have eternal life and to be a son of God. No longer his own, he sought, as one redeemed by the blood of Christ, to live for the One who had died for him.

"Let me say a few words about the path of service into which he was led, premising that I make no more than this passing allusion to the countless numbers of the poor and needy whose hearts he made glad by the help which the large means entrusted to him enabled him to give them. He was, as hundreds could gratefully testify, a generous giver, who sweetened his gifts by the kindness with which they were bestowed.

"Though faithful and wise in dealing with individuals, he had not the gift of public preaching, but he encouraged others to preach. He sent a number of ministers to get their souls quickened in the scene of the Irish revival. He gathered meetings in his own neighbourhood, in Freemasons' Hall, in Norwich, Lowestoft, and in other places, and invited eminent servants of Christ to address them. He erected an iron room in Upper Clapton, opened 1867, capable of holding about five hundred persons, where such men as J. Denham Smith, Howard Johnson, T. Shulldham Henry, and others still living, preached the Gospel with much blessing. In 1880 the present larger and more substantial building was opened, where the Gospel of a free and present salvation through faith in Christ might be preached without charge to all who chose to come. These buildings were put up and all the expenses of the Gospel work defrayed entirely at his own expense. Besides this he largely helped Gospel work elsewhere; and to the very last, with great personal labour, he circulated a vast quantity of Gospel publications far and wide over the world.

"His form of service was largely settled for him by our Lord's words: 'Unless a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.' His Bible still contained the verse, 'In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil.' He held indeed that while it was false and cruel to teach men in their sins that they were already sons of God, the very chief of sinners might become a son of God. That was what he aimed at—to get souls joined to Christ.

"Let me now refer to some traits of his character, and trace them to the source from which they sprang and were maintained. He was a singularly lovable man, knowing beyond most how to make friends and how to retain them. He had a winning courtesy that at once attracted you, and that never changed. He was methodical and orderly; a thorough business man in everything he put his hand to; a man of great soundness of judgment, with a certain weight and dignity of character that all who came in contact with him felt and owned. But it was his unfeigned godliness that formed his chief attraction. He separated himself from everything that he believed contrary to God's mind, and made it the aim of his heart to please God. How unostentatiously he gave time and influence and means to his service, we all know.

"The steadfastness with which he pursued the path of service to which he believed himself called arose mainly from the certainty of his faith. As regards the joyfulness of his character (for he was one of the sunniest of men), it was largely traceable to the certainty with which his heart grasped God's perfect love for him.

"Another thing I must add—he owed the cheery, hopeful, forth-reaching attitude of his character very largely to his sure expectation of the return of Christ to receive his redeemed people to Himself. To him the future was never darkened by the fear of death, but brightened by the hope of Christ's coming, not to judgment, but 'a second time without sin unto salvation.'

"He spoke many words in his last illness that proved how faith and love and hope were maintained to the close. His very last words were a fitting close to his happy life. 'Do you suffer pain?' he was asked. 'No.' 'Have you perfect peace?' 'Yes.' 'Is Christ with you?' 'Yes.' Then, after a few seconds, in a low voice, but quite distinctly, he said, 'My Saviour, my Saviour.' He never spoke afterwards. The harp was breaking in pieces, only a fragment of its last string was left, and this was the note it sounded."

The Needs of South America.

IN a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN there appeared a short article on the Mission to South America, which has been commenced by Dr. Bremner, late of Toronto. As one result of the notice twelve young men were led to offer themselves, and some contributions were sent in for the Mission. Some of the volunteers are especially suited for work in the South. One of them has been for six years engaged in mission work in Spain, and can speak the language perfectly; his mind has for years been drawn towards South America.

These things show that the Spirit of God is moving on the hearts of his people inclining them to do something practical to take the Gospel to this "neglected continent." This is a time of opportunity for the South, and it seems very desirable that some of these young men should proceed at once. It is proposed, if the Lord opens up the way, that two or three should accompany Dr. Bremner to South America about the end of February.

Mr. Millard, in his interesting book, says: "Our hearts are stirred beyond measure with the sense of the tremendous responsibility which falls upon every professing follower of the Lord Jesus Christ with regard to the thirty-seven million souls of South America. The conviction deepens that some definite steps should be taken." Rev. G. C. Grubb, who was accompanied by Mr. Millard in a South American mission tour, also wrote: "May God pour on each member of the one body the spirit of grace and of supplication, that he may be able to join with the prayers of Christ for South America. For nearly 400 years Romanism of the most corrupt type has spread its blighting influence over this vast continent. The true and unfailing harvest of Romanism—namely, indifference, sensuality, infidelity, and anarchy—is being plentifully reaped." ("The Neglected Continent," by Miss Guinness and Mr. Millard. Marlborough & Co. 1s.)

Dr. Bremner and those whom he hopes to take with him will go trusting that the Lord will incline his people to supply the means for commencing and carrying on this great enterprise. The work is interdenominational and Evangelical in character, and the great aim will be to preach the Gospel. Several well-known gentlemen in London, Manchester, Liverpool, and Glasgow are referees and in hearty sympathy with this work. Dr. Bremner's present address is Cambridge Villa, Hadley-road, New Barnet, London.

THE "Summary of work among the children during 1895" at the above Home, has been issued by Mr. and Mrs. Wallace. Two hundred and thirty children have been received and placed out in comfortable Canadian homes. The short extract given will be read with interest. It is a matter for thankful praise that so many little orphans have been transplanted to a land where there is plenty of room and work and food for all.

"One of a family of five boys thus helped out to Canada, writes lately of his growing prosperity as follows:—'By hard work I have been fortunate enough to get a home for myself and wife and little boy John. I have had to study economy to near perfection, older men, and men with more money, have broken down in the same trade owing to the depression, but I have been very fortunate. I am proud of being a member of the Royal Templars, and work hard for temperance, no matter if it hurts my business or not. We have some local officials here who talk against immigration, but reference back to their parents proves them to be of the same class. I think it the noblest work of any Christian to bring the boys to this country, and put them in a way to do for themselves.'"

Lord Rowton's Model Lodging-house for men has proved so decidedly successful, as a welcome retreat for the decenter class of men who, while poor and unfortunate, dread being compelled to go into common kitchens, that he is now building another large house to afford accommodation for, we believe, 800 men.

The Armenian Horrors.

DEAR SIR,—It is with a breaking heart that one now thinks of the unhappy Armenians. More than twelve months have gone past since the horrible work of outrage, torture, and destruction commenced, and still we hear of Turkish doings which fire our spirits and make our hearts bleed. According to official estimates which are being made up, the number of victims will be 150,000, and some put the figure at 200,000. The Lord have mercy upon the remnant of these persecuted Christians, and send them speedy deliverance. As it is good, and I think profitable, that our hearts should be kept in sympathy with our cruelly-treated brethren—and I am glad to see that scarcely a week passes but what THE CHRISTIAN contributes something to keep this alive—to this end will you allow me space to make one or two practical remarks?

The main thing that should be brought home to us is our responsibility towards the Armenians. I wish every Englishman, and especially every Christian, would take the trouble to understand it, because, to an extent, upon the understanding of this depends the measure and depth of our sympathy. A few words from a speech of Mr. Bryce (late Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), delivered on Tuesday, should afford proof. He informs us that it was England that set aside the Treaty of San Stefano (by which Russia had undertaken to protect the Armenians), and substituted for that Treaty the Treaty of Berlin, in whose 61st article our obligation stands plainly written.

But if anyone is desirous of studying the subject let me commend him to Canon MacColl's pamphlet on "England's Responsibility towards Armenia." At the time the Treaty was made it was thought that England was going to do great things for Armenia. "The wilderness was to blossom as the rose, and the murderous crack of the Kurd's rifle was to give place to the whistle of the steam plough; and such would be the rapid development of the resources of those regions, under England's fostering influence, that new and valuable markets would be found for English goods...It is just seventeen years years since those rosy hopes were held out to the expectant Armenians, and what has England done since then to redeem her promises, made to them in the face of high heaven? She has left them in the condition described...not stirring a finger to help them, unless that can be called help which begins and ends in an occasional futile remonstrance, that might just as well be addressed to the deaf adder that stoppeth her ears, as to the Government of the Sultan. In a speech at Croydon, in 1878, the late Lord Sherbrooke declared that English policy 'had turned the keys of hell' upon the Christians of Turkey. It was a strong expression, but was it exaggerated?"

It seems to me we ought to ask God to forgive us, as a nation, for the share we have had in bolstering up this cruel, corrupt nation of Turkey. Twice we have fought on the side of this anti-Christian power, and have enabled it to live up to the present. Surely, if Christian nations go to war, it should never be on the side of the oppressor? Will not God visit us, and other nations, for our sin and selfish policy, whereby an ancient Christian race is being gradually exterminated?

Let our sympathies flow forth freely towards these persecuted saints of God, and let us show them by the relief we send them, that although we seem powerless to deliver them, yet we think of them, and bear them on our hearts night and day before God, who alone can send succour in his own good time.

D. E. P.

The trusted correspondent whose statement was published by the Evangelical Alliance last month sends further particulars:—

"Fresh details are constantly being received respecting the attempt, made upon religious grounds, to extirpate Christianity in Eastern Turkey. The information which is to hand is as yet fragmentary. Every obstacle is placed by the local authorities in the way of the transmission of information even to the religious chiefs of the communities which are involved. All that can be done is to collect the facts as fast as they can be verified, and to supplement each statement by fuller details as these are received. The world can never know the thousandth part of the brutality which has been practised in the country districts to destroy Christianity. As one has already said, 'It is difficult to find any page of the world's history which is blacker than this, for wide extent of the crime, for diabolical cruelty of the plan, and for inhuman barbarity of its execution.'

"It now comes to light too fully to be controverted that the massacres in the Eastern provinces of the Turkish Empire are a religious war upon an unarmed and defenceless people, undertaken with the definite purpose of extirpating the Christian religion, and carried through relentlessly to this object; and that, in the understanding of the mass of the Mohammedan population of several of the provinces, Christianity is prohibited in the Empire, and Mohammedanism has proved that it can do its will unmolested by any force from outside of the Empire. It is from this point of view that the horror of prohibiting the succour of Christians in the provinces of Harpoot and Aleppo has been added to the awful crime of murder and outrage on women.

"There is no advantage in multiplying details. In the provinces of Harpoot and Diarbekir alone 8000 Armenian houses have been burned, and more than 15,000 Christians are known to be killed, while every day adds to the list. Fifty or more Armenian ecclesiastics are known to be killed for refusing to accept Mohammedanism, and the list of martyrs among the Protestant pastors has now risen to nineteen. Some of these are among the best and most influential men in the Protestant community. At Cesarea, in the province of Angora, on November 30, 500 Christians were murdered by the Turks of the city. In one of the Protestant houses of the city a father and his little daughter, twelve years of age, were alone, the mother having gone to visit a married daughter before the massacre began. A fierce-looking Turk suddenly burst into the room where the little girl was sitting. He spoke to the child in as kind a voice as he could command. 'My child,' said he, 'your father is dead because he would not accept the religion of Islam. Now I shall have to make you a Mohammedan, and if you will agree to it I will take you to my home, and you will have everything that you want just as if you were my daughter. Will you become a Mohammedan?' The little girl replied: 'I believe in Jesus Christ. He is my Saviour. I love Him. I cannot do as you wish even if you kill me.' Then the ruffian fell upon the poor child with his sword, and slashed and stabbed her in twelve different places. What followed, no one knows. The house was pillaged and burned, and the body of the father was burned in it. But that evening a cart was brought by a Turkish neighbour to the house in another part of the city where the mother of the little girl was staying. The Turk said to her, 'I have brought you the body of your little girl. You are my friend and I could not leave it. I am very sorry for what has happened.' The mother took the senseless form of the little girl into the house, and found that there was still life in it. A surgeon was summoned, he restored the child to her senses, and she is now in a fair way to recovery. She had been taught from her earliest years to love the Saviour and to study her Bible. She proved her faith by that noble display of the martyr spirit. Is not that the sister of every Christian in Europe? Is she to be left to fall a victim sooner or later to the men who have been encouraged by the impunity allowed them to believe that it is considered right by Europeans as well as by their own rulers, for them to go on with the work of obliterating Christianity in the Turkish Empire?

"The Christian world must no longer disregard the cry of this oppressed and down-trodden people. A wail of despair is heard throughout the length and breadth of the land; the blood of hundreds of martyrs cries to God from the soil; the shrieks of women and maidens are heard as they are dragged into a captivity worse than death. Cannot the eyes of the world be opened to these atrocities, and its conscience aroused to a sense of duty in the direction of causing them to cease? The Master's voice still rings in the ears of a generation to whom He appeals. Must it still be in vain? Shall Christians wrap themselves in their comfort and say, It falls not to us to interfere; these are Asiatics, not of our noble European blood? What answer can we have in that day, if the Church of Christ lifts no voice, and stirs no muscle, to save those who have cried in vain to the soulless politicians of the present decadent age? In every case the offer of life on these terms was made; in several cases, time was allowed for consideration of the proposal, and in each case faith in Jesus Christ was the sole crime charged against the victim:—

Jan. 15, 1896.

An American resident in Turkey writes:—"The missionaries in Armenia and Asia Minor are still in the greatest danger. Their lives have been saved thus far by the constant reiteration of threats by the American Minister and Sir Philip Currie; but any indiscretion might cost them their lives, and put an end to the work which they are doing to save the people. We have to remember that the Sultan has found out that he can do exactly what he pleases without any fear of intervention on the part of the Great Powers. I suppose that there are not less than 400,000 Armenians who are in a starving condition. The Armenians here, though they suffered much from the destruction of their property and business in the interim, are contributing nobly for the relief of their people, and recently—within ten days—it has been possible to send clothing and money to many places in the country. But all that we can do here will not go far as the winter goes on. What is done must be done quickly to do any good. The Constantinople aid will soon be exhausted. Who could have believed it possible that the people of Europe would look on with utter indifference while a Sultan slaughtered 50,000 Christians, and reduced 400,000 to the alternative of starvation or Mohammedanism—that even England would do absolutely nothing to restrain him? This is the most incredible event of the century, as the work of the Sultan is the greatest crime of the century.”

SPECIAL RELIEF FUND.

SIR,—For many years it has been the duty and pleasure of the Bible Lands or Turkish Missions' Aid Society to send grants in aid for Evangelical work in Aintab, Bitlis, Cesarea, Erzurum, Harpoot, Marsovan, Marash, Sivas, Trebizond, etc. Very considerable spiritual results have followed missionary endeavour in these centres of activity and the out-stations belonging to them.

All these have been swept by the fiery torrent of Turkish persecution and slaughter. Desolation and sorrow, destitution and want, are upon those who survive; and it behoves us to show our sincere practical sympathy by sending relief to these remnants of the household of the faith, in the hour of their anguish, necessity, and poverty endured for Christ's sake.

Already a relief contribution of £50 has been forwarded to one of these impoverished centres, and we are anxious to send an equal expression of our sympathy to the others named above. The channels for the transmission of aid are open and secure. Donations for this special object should be sent to the hon. sec., Rev. W. A. Essery, 7, Adam-street, Strand, London, W.C.

(SIR) WM. MUIR, Vice-President.
KINNAIRD, Treasurer.

Marylebone Medical Mission.

DR. CHAMBERS, in continuing his good work among the unhappy poor in and around Lisson Grove, finds the pressure of sorrow and want very sore. The cases treated during the past year have been more numerous than ever; and many of these have been distinctly traceable to the want and destitution experienced during the long frost with which the year opened.

Among cases of this kind is that of a poor girl, who, on entering the consulting room, fell fainting on the floor from sheer want and illness. She was sent home in a cab, and on the nurse following her as soon as possible, she found there was neither fire nor food in the house. Every necessary was provided, and a fire being lit, the sick one was made comfortable. Eventually, after much care, she recovered.

The Mission Dispensary is open three times a week, and is crowded by the poor, who hear the Gospel plainly put, and are medically treated as necessary. Those unable to attend are visited at home, and in every visit the Gospel is set forth. Many most encouraging evidences have lately appeared of the power of the Gospel spoken in this way. As one woman lately said, "Here I heard of Jesus, for the first time, as dying for me. All my life I had been despised, but I found He did not despise me; so I let Him take me."

Another woman stopped the doctor as he was leaving a house, saying, "I used to come to your Mission, and the words spoken laid hold of me and led me to God. My husband and I are now members of the Wesleyan Church; and, besides, I have been blessed to win three others, who are, I may say, grandchildren of your Mission." Many similar instances might be given from recent experience.

The medical work, the Gospel services, the women's Bible-class, and the patient, personal service of the deaconess-nurse have all been used of God in bringing in the lost. The Mission is greatly in need of help at present, not only funds, but also clothing, blankets, and other comforts for the sick and shivering. Full information may be had from the medical superintendent, Dr. R. Chambers, Marylebone Medical Mission, 12, Bell street, Lisson Grove, N.W.

THE EVANGELIST.

From Bondage to Liberty.

WHEN I was about twelve years of age, I had a great fear of death; I knew I was not fit to die, but how to get made fit I did not know. Once I told my trouble to an old servant, who replied that "were she to die in the night, she should go to heaven, as her sins had been washed away in the blood of Jesus." How I envied her sense of security, but yet would not listen to any more that she would have told me, because she was a Dissenter, and I had been taught to look on all Dissent as very wrong. At sixteen I was confirmed, and quite thought then I had started on the right road to heaven. Alas, though I used a little book containing good resolutions for every day in the week, I never managed to keep them, even to my own satisfaction. Sunday after Sunday I listened attentively to sermons, exhorting to a good life, but the preacher, who was really an earnest man in his way, always stopped short of how to lead this good life, and to overcome besetting sins. "Come regularly to Holy Communion" was his great antidote.

I went on in this uncomfortable state of mind, trying not to think too much about it, and comforting myself with the thought that many others were in the same condition, till I was nearly twenty; when one day a Ritualistic friend, in whom I had great confidence, said to me: "If you are so troubled about your sins, why don't you go to confession? It is such a comfort to have them forgiven and put away." I did not quite like the idea then; but soon after, I heard a sermon on confession which seemed to me very convincing. I thought, "This is just what I need to make me truly happy." So I went to a well-known priest (in the Church of England). He told me to get a "Vade Mecum," or "Treasury of Devotion," and, by the help of this book, to examine my life as far back as I could remember (no easy task) and write down all my sins and how many times committed, and then come to him. This I told him would be such a trial and humiliation that I feared I could not do it. His answer was, "It is like having toothache and then having the tooth out; it is worth the pain for the ease one gets after, so it is worth the pain and trouble of confession for the ease of conscience after." I believed him at the time.

Having thought over my life, and written down as many sins as I could recall, I then went to the "priest" to make my first confession. I often wondered how Roman Catholics felt in going to confession, but supposed that being brought up to it from childhood they did not feel it as I did; for, however long my life is, I don't think the memory of that dreadful night will ever be effaced. I recollect the tears shed, the heart beatings while I waited in the dimly-lighted church for my turn to go into the little vestry, fitted up as a sort of confessional box, and then the actual confession. It certainly was a relief when it was over, and I had heard the words, "I absolve thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; go in peace and sin no more," with instructions to learn the 103rd Psalm.

I went at intervals to confession for about two years, and was sometimes asked questions I would not like to repeat; but I never found the peace I sought. One day I asked my confessor how it was I gained so little victory over temper and other sins. He told me I must partake more often of the Blessed Sacrament, for it was in that alone one could get spiritual strength. I can see now that even in those dark days the Holy Spirit was striving with me, for at times I felt very uncomfortable in my forms of religion, and wanted something more satisfying.

About this time my father died, which was a great trouble to me, and I tried to comfort myself with praying for his departed soul, especially at early communion, for I was taught that prayer offered then was more effectual than at other times.

I was a Sunday-school teacher, and going into church one Sunday morning, one of my scholars asked me "if she should turn to the east, and use the sign of the cross as I did when I passed the altar." My reply was, "You had better wait till you are older, and you will then understand better what you are doing." Although I did these foolish things myself, something kept me from teaching the children the same. At one confession I had to own that I had been to a midsummer morning service at a Baptist church, and had also been to evening Communion with my mother. I remember being most solemnly warned against ever again "committing such sins against God and his Church."

The last time I ever went to a priest for confession was on a Good Friday evening, in preparation for Easter Communion. Coming out of church I met a girl friend, who had been waiting for me. She said, "Don't you feel happy, knowing that all your sins are forgiven and put away?" "Well," I answered, "I should indeed be happy, if I really believed it; but I don't, and I won't go again." Even then God, by his Holy Spirit, was shaking my faith in the commandments of men.

I never went to confession again; for a short time after I was sent for to go home to nurse my mother, who was ill; and I remember expressing my disgust to a lady that there was no church in the town "High" enough for my liking. However, one Sunday afternoon, this same lady persuaded me to go to a children's service at a decidedly "Low" church. Being struck by the simple way in which the clergyman spoke to the children, I went again in the evening. The church was full, and the preacher took for his text, "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by." I had never heard such plain preaching before; it was quite different from anything I had been taught to believe. I cannot remember much of that sermon except that he spoke of Christ's finished work, and said that to some in that church, that evening might be the last time that Jesus would pass their way. I know I went home feeling very wretched, and made the remark to my friend, that if what Mr. F. said was right, then I was all wrong. I was so much taken up with what I heard, that I did not seem to mind the loss of the ornate ritual. A few days after I was introduced to this clergyman, and from him I learned more fully the simple way of salvation through Jesus. In a few days light came into my dark soul, and I could say, "Whereas I was blind, now I can see." One thing I found a difficulty in grasping was, that Jesus could keep me always, I was so afraid of falling back; but John x. 28, 29 was my comfort and assurance. How much I had to unlearn in those days, for (to quote the word that one used in reference to me) "I was saturated with Ritualism." How I do thank God for bringing me out of such bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

I think there are many young Christians who may have been doing as I did—trusting Jesus for forgiveness of past sin, but not trusting Him daily and hourly to keep from the sins which do so easily beset us. How many of us have had our Christian life and influence spoilt through some little sin, or inconsistency that comes upon us unawares; perhaps a hasty temper, or unkind word, or a sudden wish to assert one's rights, or some one of the other little foxes that spoil the vines. May I beg of you who read this, to let Jesus in now, as Master of your life. He will take possession and turn out all that offends; for Christ and sin cannot live together.

I could write much more on this subject, but I close with prayer that God will use this simple narrative of facts for his glory, and to help some soul weary of sin into this blessed rest which outward observances, however diligently followed, can never give.

A Missionary's Appeal.

SINCE my return from furlough, in February last, one thought has oppressed my mind. The thing that might be done is not being done. What, indeed, might not be done—when every land is unlocked, every language learned, and almost every creature ready to listen to the word of Christ! What might not be done when Britain counts her youth by thousands—free to serve! What might not be done when our “great” societies (as they are sometimes called), with their century of success, their fine organisation and splendid staff of officers, exist for the very purpose of meeting this wondrous opportunity with the wealth and devotion of the Church!

Yet the Church lies listless and the societies are in debt. The soldiers on the field are held down in the trenches, with a breach in the enemy's walls to look at instead of to storm. Their numbers are reduced, and reinforcements come seldom if they come at all.

The situation must be squarely faced. Mere printing of plaintive appeals, however widely scattered, will have little effect. The Church will never be galvanized into action by watching a procession of funereal figures led across the stage in our magazines or at public meetings. The Church has a shrewd suspicion that some of the men who print those appeals have money enough in their own purses to meet them. The time calls aloud for honesty and heroism in the missionary leadership of the Church. The Church knows that much has been given by wealthy men, and that much has been given up, but she cannot reconcile the sums that are reserved with perfect good faith in those professions of felt responsibility and of piteous pecuniary need which she is accustomed to hear. Let her once be convinced that the heads of our missions are in real earnest to save the world; let her see them unhesitatingly exhaust their own personal store—and she will bring even her jewels to the altar of sacrifice.

Has not the hour struck for a new sort of missionary committee? I mean a committee of men pledged, as the missionaries are pledged, to the absolute surrender of life and of all superfluity of income in the interest of the spread of the Gospel? The opportunity is large enough now to fill any man's thoughts and consume all his powers. It is required of those who serve on the field that other aims should be relinquished and this one thing be done. Should a different spirit animate the service at home? Is it right that those who submit to the supreme test should merely carry out instructions whilst those who give them go free? Shall less be demanded of those who direct affairs than of those who simply obey?

Surely here is one secret of serious weakness and waste. A missionary society, both at home and abroad, should consist entirely of sworn soldiers who have consented, for life, to take a subsistence allowance (whether retained from their own earnings or drawn from the general fund) in order to prosecute Christ's war in the world. This rule would exclude no worthy pastor or merchant from a seat on the committee, whilst the sincerity that has staked its all would stir the blood of the Church. We annually cheer, in Exeter Hall and elsewhere, the recital of heroic sacrifices made by the poor. But to what purpose do we cheer, unless we are prepared to copy what we so publicly approve? I was told, in London, by one of the greatest missionary secretaries of the day, that the question of reinforcements is simply a question of money. “We have got the men,” he said, “the right sort of men, and men willing to go; but we haven't the money to send them.” And, again and again, I heard the same statement made during my deputation rounds. But, after all, will this plea bear being closely examined? What if the superfluous wealth in the hands of mission committees alone should be sufficient to meet the need? Verily, it costs more than we think to be true to our own words.

There are other things, besides the surrender of money, in which our leaders might set an example to the Church. What about a “Personal Call” to the work abroad? Is the question done with for ever because one is comfortably settled in England, for instance, and a member of the Missionary Board? Are we right in assuming infallible wisdom for the judgment of college days? Does the wealth of the years—a stronger physique, perhaps, certainly new store of knowledge, sympathy, and faith—make no difference to the point of view? Are we always to print appeals and never to heed them? What if the going forth of a consecrated man should be the finest of all appeals? Why is it still the fact that few go while thousands stay? Are all who stay guiltless? Am I? These questions are sword-thrusts, but they cannot be shirked. Of the twelve men in the first Baptist committee, one went abroad. He was not exactly in the dew of his youth, nor without success in the ministry, nor free from family ties. Why should it be thought impossible to-day that some sitting on the directors' benches should be called to join the force on the field? It cannot be that they are unwilling to obey their own rules or disapprove of that abandon for themselves which they have blessed in others. Brethren and fathers of the front rank—suffer me to say it—some of you surely should be here!

Let missionary committees give evidence of whole-hearted personal surrender, and they may safely pledge all the resources of the Church to support the men whom Christ has sent. It may not be “business” to incur a debt, but Faith is better than business as a working principle in missions, and there is no room for Faith if all that is attempted falls within the clever calculation of business men.

Life in the Living Lord.

Tune—“Wonderful Words of Life.”

SOUND the Gospel of grace abroad,
Life in the living Lord!
Spread the news of the gift of God,
Life in the living Lord!
Mortal man requires it,
God above inspires it,
Tell it around! let it abound!
Life in the living Lord!

All by nature are doomed to die,
So saith the Holy Word,
Welcome, therefore, the joyful cry,
Life in the living Lord!
Welcome news of gladness!
Antidote to sadness!
Tell it around! let it abound!
Life in the living Lord!

Angels, prophets, apostles, all
Published with one accord,
This deliverance from the Fall,
Life in the living Lord!
Glory be to Jesus,
Who from bondage frees us!
Tell it around! let it abound!
Life in the living Lord!

Pardon, power, and perfect peace,
“The words of this life” afford,
Never, then, must the tidings cease,
Of life in the living Lord!
Open wide the portal
Unto every mortal!
Tell it around! let it abound!
Life in the living Lord!

Day of United Prayer (Exeter Hall, December 5th, 1895).—Mr. Albert Head reports that the receipts from collections, sale of tickets, etc., amounted to £234 3s. 4d., and the expenses to £95 9s. 9d., leaving a balance of £138 13s. 7d. This will forthwith be transmitted to Rev. Andrew Murray for his work in South Africa.

The Crisis in the Transvaal.

NOW that letters are being received from South Africa, glimpses are afforded of the perplexity, anxiety and apprehension, which filled the minds of Christians in Johannesburg at the time of the agitation for reform, culminating in the unfortunate raid of Dr. Jameson and his men.

Doubtless some extracts will interest your readers. Mr. Dudley A. Kidd, of the South African General Mission, writing from Johannesburg, December 28, states:—“The air is thick with rumours of war, but no one seems to know in what it will end. Everybody one meets talks about the probabilities of war, and men are straining their ingenuity to the utmost to forecast the effect. Necessities of life are going up very much in price. If I can secure seats, I am sending six or seven of our deaconesses to Cape Town; I and three or four others remain. In the midst of all we had a full hall last night (Sunday), and several decided for Christ. We feel that Johannesburg will need people who will witness for Christ at this time.”

Under date Jan. 6, 1896, Mr. Kidd writes:—“Only a few know what is going on under the surface, but I am sure the people here do not want war. We are only here to see if we can point souls to Christ. We had a good open-air meeting on Saturday (Jan. 4), and two open-air meetings on Sunday (Jan. 5). We have seen definite results from these meetings. It appears strange to hold these ‘open-air’ whilst affairs seem on the brink of war. The public-houses are shut, and a most effective police force is in control. We have about twenty-five women and children quartered in our hall for refuge, and shall probably have more if things become increasingly serious. Prices of all commodities are very high; still we have had to get in a stock of provisions. We have to keep on paying rent, but we have no collections now to meet this. Then there are the fares of our sisters from here and Pretoria to Cape Town.”

Thank God, we now know that matters have been arranged so that war is averted, but I am sure there must be many who have friends or relatives in the Colony and interests at stake, or whose hearts have been stirred to prayer, for maintenance of peace, who would now gladly record their gratitude to God by a thank-offering, which would cheer the hearts of those who held the fort during these days of anxiety. I would be pleased to receive any such gifts on behalf of the South Africa General Mission.—Yours faithfully,

ALBERT A. HEAD.

The Coasting Mission.

THE Mission steamer, Good News, has been working in Normandy and other French ports for the past six weeks.

At Trouville, the port first visited, and where the Mission have a mission house, the Lord brought several to Himself, specially young men, who are now walking well. The work since we left has been going on with renewed energy, the hall, where before we only used to get twenty to thirty people, being now full at every meeting.

Honfleur was another port visited, and there the Lord worked wonderfully, and during the fifteen days we were there over thirty souls professed to find peace through Christ. When we think of the difficult surroundings of these converts we “thank God and take courage”; but they do need the prayers of the Lord's people.

At Rouen, where we are now lying, the Lord has again been pleased to use the services held on board the boat as a means of leading souls to Christ, and last week almost every night we saw one and another give themselves up to God. There is a great work to do in this large town, and there are very few workers.

Thousands of barges visit Rouen. The barges live on board, and some of the men have had no other home, being born and brought up on board. They are out of the reach of the priests, and are open for the Gospel. One woman said to us whilst visiting: “What you say is not what the priests teach, but much better.” If anyone could take up this barge work in France, a rich harvest could be reaped. I would be glad to answer any questions with regard to this work, and communications may be addressed either to Mrs. Cook, 47, Stoke-road, Gosport; or to me at Repos des Merins, Deauville-sur-Mer, France.

Shiraz Still Waiting.

By J. E. BUDGETT MEAKIN.

A NEW generation has been born, and has died, since Henry Martyn showed by his example what a field there was here for a consecrated able man of God; still this centre is unoccupied. Since that time Teheran, Ispahan, Tabriz, Urumiah, Hamadan, and other points have been attacked, but Shiraz, gay and irreligious Shiraz, though the first in modern times to hear the Message, remains without a witness of the Gospel. For some weeks I have been living in a native house and mixing with the people to such extent as has been possible with a very limited acquaintance with the language. All I have heard and seen impresses me with the conviction that there is a great work waiting here for such another as was Henry Martyn.

I doubt if much could be accomplished, at first, at least, by the establishment of a regular mission station, though that might follow in time. I would even recommend that anyone taking up the work should not permanently reside here, but visit it periodically in turn with other places, spending a month or two at a time. If he were acquainted with literary Arabic, though he need not be able to speak it, it would be of very great use, but neither this nor his Persian must be that of Hindustan. There is no place for the study of Persian like Shiraz itself. Previous experience of Orientals elsewhere is to be most strongly recommended.

There are about a dozen Europeans here, mostly English, but the services we have had the last few Sundays have been, with one exception, the first for three years. The Persians, like most Orientals, have an idea that we have little or no religion, and no one appreciates more the contrary fact when ascertained. Nor is anyone more keen to approve of total abstinence. But, after all, it is the life that tells, the life of active sympathy and spiritual love.

The Mohammedans in Persia are very lax on many points, on others absurdly bigoted, and in many ways oblivious to the teachings even of their own Koran. Strong drink and pictures are in favour, notwithstanding their prohibition; yet they refuse to eat from the same dish as a Christian or Jew, though specially permitted to do so by the Koran. Their scribes, or mullahs, have become almost a priesthood, though Islam knows no such order. They are the centres of most bigoted and fatal ignorance, even a greater curse than the priesthood of Rome. Were it not for them the whole face of things would change, but it is their bread, and "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

For the last half-century the reaction against their dead and venal formalism has found scope in the new sect of the Bábis, who have absorbed a large proportion of those whose longings were after something more real, more deep. The Báb, in this very city of Shiraz, entered the breach no servant of Christ was ready to enter, his followers by thousands suffering martyrdom in the support of their belief.

Pierce opposition will have to be met, and heartless persecution, as was seen in the case of the Bábis, for though religious toleration is the law of the land to-day, perverts from Islam are doomed. Yet surely what the Bábis have endured can be endured again by Christians. Persia calls, though she promises little; her needs are great, though her hearts are cold: the promises and the protecting power are from above.

Shiraz, December, 1895.

London Temperance Hospital.—On Sunday afternoon, Rev. Dawson Burns, D.D., in delivering the fifty-sixth annual temperance sermon in Church-street Chapel, Edgware-road, referred to the history and work of the London Temperance Hospital. The annual expenditure, exclusive of extraordinary outlay, is about £9,000. The rate of mortality during twenty-two years among 11,652 in-patients has been under 6·5 per cent., although the severest cases, medical and surgical, have been welcomed. During the same period, alcohol in any form has been prescribed in only nineteen cases.

The Figueras Mission.

THE latest "Letter from Spain" issued by the director of the Figueras Mission, gives an animated account of the departure from Figueras of a thousand Spanish soldiers for Cuba, and the distribution among them of one thousand pocket Testaments. Two Christian maid-servants and the young son of Pastor Rodriguez undertook the task, and meeting with a good reception from officers and men, had it nearly completed before the priests awoke to action. Every effort was made by the emissaries of Rome to induce the soldiers to throw away or give up the Testaments, but for the most part in vain. An officer who was watching from his carriage window called out indignantly to the priests, "If either of you dare to come here and molest my men I will knock you down. I know your game!" Unabashed they went on to another compartment, shouting "a penny for a book, who will sell?" "Not I, for one," replied a soldier, "I would not think of selling what has been given to me as a present." "Nor I," said another, "if you offered a hundred dollars I would not part with so kind a gift for you to destroy. I intend always to keep it as my last recuerdo (souvenir) of Figueras."

A comrade from the Castle who had come to say "good-bye," was standing next to the priest, when he gave the order to "throw away the book." One soldier only obeyed, and as the Testament fell to the ground, our friend from the fortress snapped it up saying, "Thou shalt not escape," and putting it into his pocket walked off with his prize. The next day he was seen reading it in the canteen, surrounded by comrades all eager to see the book which had been condemned by the priest. Prayer is desired that the many thousands of Testaments and tracts distributed amongst these and other soldiers may be blessed to many who never had the Word of God in their hand before.

Meanwhile, and apart from such special efforts, the general work of the Mission goes on vigorously and with increased opportunities for service. The financial statement now issued, shows that the funds are low. This is the more to be regretted, inasmuch as doors are opening in many directions for the Gospel, and appeals come in from many places for labourers and for schools for the children. We trust many will remember Pastor and Mrs. Rodriguez and their loving helpers, who greatly need the prayers and support of the Lord's people. The treasurer is Dr. Macwhirter Dunbar, Hedingham House, Clapham Common, London, S.W.

Mrs. Ginever's Homes.

IN the three Homes linked under this title there are, according to the new report, 172 children under the loving care of three experienced Christian matrons. Notwithstanding many anxieties, every need has been met, and the year closes free of debt.

The trustees state that "the moral and spiritual results of our work, not so easy to gauge, do, as far as we can trace them, confirm our position. Among our children a quiet work of grace goes on; some of the elder girls love Christ, and say so, and their conduct is consistent with their profession. During Bible instruction and at religious worship their attention is marked, and their behaviour all that could be desired. No onlooker who understands the dewy freshness of the morning can mistake what hour of the day it is in the spiritual life of some of our children. But perhaps our greatest satisfaction is found in those who have left the Homes, and gone out into life to encounter the world. The value of home teaching, training, and influence is then tested. Fifty-seven of our girls have gone into service, nine of whom are respectably married and doing well, and five have become trained nurses at their own cost, and are now engaged in that most useful calling. Of the rest, one has been five, another six, and another ten years in the same situations; all bear excellent characters, and not a few have become consistent members of Christian churches. Whenever they have holidays or are out of situation we welcome them back to their old home in the Orphanage, and many gladly avail themselves of this privilege."

Letters are given showing the way the hearts of the children are won, and the efforts made for their highest welfare. The whole ends with an earnest plea for kindly support. The secretary is Mr. R. T. Smith, 18, Pemberton-road, Upper Holloway, N.

Letter to the Editor.

TO HELP THE ARMENIANS.

DEAR SIR,—In regard to the letter in your issue of Jan. 16, by Pastor Thoumaian, appealing to the Christian churches all over England for help to his suffering country, one would indeed feel thankful should any result come from it. Seeing that the inability of our Government to protect Armenia has permitted the destruction of its inhabitants to go on to the number of 200,000, as ascertained by official inquiries, and that those who are left are for the most part robbed of everything, and must perish during the bitter cold of the Armenian winter unless help is sent, and that speedily; it would seem a little alleviation of this terrible result if we now, as a nation, devoted some portion of our surplus revenue to the object of saving them. £60,000 is required to keep them alive, Sir Philip Currie states, and it is to be feared that private effort will fall far short of this sum. If therefore the Christian churches of England could be stirred up to ask that some of our surplus revenue might be devoted to saving these suffering people, it would seem a worthy act for us as a nation to do. Already a very large portion is sunk in the enormous preparations going on for battle-ships, but perhaps £50,000 out of the nearly £6,000,000 might yet be devoted to this work of Christian charity, and surely we may believe that He who ruleth the nations would bless us in doing so.

One of our statesmen says, "England rests her power, not on physical force, but upon her principles, her intellect, her virtue."

Let us then show, by this act, that we have yet left some principles, some intellect, some virtue, as well as some sense of our responsibilities as a nation, and some compassion.

The Welsh Colliery Explosion.

ANOTHER mining calamity has happened in South Wales. Early on Monday morning there was an explosion at the Tylorstown pits of the Ferndale Colliery Company; the cause at present undetermined. Usually a thousand men are employed in the workings, but the accident seems to have taken place between the night and day shifts, when only about ninety men were at work. According to the latest accounts about fifty men have been killed through the disaster.

Writing on Monday evening, Mr. T. M. Wintle, of Pontymoile, near Pontypool, says he was just starting for the scene of the accident to minister consolation to the suffering relatives. He asks the fellowship of our readers by prayer and by some timely help for the bereaved families.

Islam or Death.

THE Moslem has thrown down the gage of battle. It is no longer a question of revolutionists, Armenians or any other. The fight is between Islam and Christianity. A situation far worse than that which stirred Europe to the Crusades faces Christendom to-day. It is no mere site dear to Christian memories that is in danger; it is the life of a Christian people; and the preservation of that life has become the test of the loyalty to their faith of every other Christian nation of the world. To-day, in wide sections of the Turkish Empire, where only a few short months ago there were multitudes of Christian churches and thousands of Christian families, the churches have been turned into mosques, and the one alternative offered the worshipper has been "Islam or Death." Thousands have chosen death; and from every section of the Empire, from mountain and from plain, from city and from village, comes an ever-increasing roll of names of those who have laid down their lives, rather than dishonour their Lord. Pastors, preachers, teachers, pupils, have gone to swell the number of those who through great tribulation have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. And what of the thousands of others? Is it any wonder that so many have yielded? No sadder picture has ever been drawn than that of strong men going through the forms of a false faith in agony of soul to preserve not their own lives, but the lives, and still more the honour, of those dearer to them than life itself. The silence over that plain of Harput, in the mountains of Bohtan, on the slopes of the Taurus, is the silence of death—death not merely physical, but moral.—New York Independent.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Y.M.C.A. in Cape Town, under Mr. Sprigg, has now a membership of 600. The theatre services conducted by the Adelaide Association, are reported as having lately been greatly blessed.

Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton delivered an address in hearty support of the Y.M.C.A. at the official opening of the recent spring festival, organised by the Adelaide Association.

The members of the Mountpottinger Y.M.C.A. have heartily welcomed their new secretary, Mr. James Millar. The various meetings have more than doubled their attendances since the new year.

Mr. John Kent, late of the Hastings Y.M.C.A., has been the means of founding, and is now the general secretary of, an excellent Association at Kimberley, South Africa. Writing under date, Dec. 30 last, he reports a membership of 230.

In South Australia the Y.M.C.A. is making resolute efforts to reach out into remote towns where no associations exist. In this way Gausler, Kadina, and Hindmarsh have been occupied; but in Moonta, Pirie, and Mount Gambier nothing has yet been done for young men.

The "South London Magazine" for young men, having become well established as Y.M.C.A. organ on the south side of the Thames, has now changed its title to The Young Londoner, and aims at appealing to young men all over the metropolis. The first issue of the magazine under its new form should win for it many fresh friends.

The New Year's social gathering in connection with the Kingston and Surbiton District Y.M.C.A. took place at the Albany Hall, and was a distinct success. The body of the hall was filled to overflowing, many having to resort to the gallery, and the gathering was of the most representative character. Captain Cundy presided, and the company numbered upwards of 400 persons.

The thirty-eighth annual meeting of the Ryde Young Men's Christian Association was held in the Town Hall on Tuesday, 21st. Addresses were delivered by Rev. T. W. H. Jacob, vicar of Shirley, on "Christian Peace;" Rev. A. E. Sharpley, naval and military chaplain, Eastney, on "The Christian's Joy;" and Mr. J. A. Stooke, from China, on "The Y.M.C.A.: a Recruiting Ground for Christian Service."

A finely illustrated account of the work of the Oxford Association has been issued. The flourishing Bible class, conducted by Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, is especially noticed, as also the P.S.A., and the Preachers' class, educational and social agencies are shown to be in a prosperous condition. The pamphlet is well written, and ought to awaken much practical sympathy for such fruitful service among young men.

Rev. G. H. Krikorian, pastor of the Evangelical Church at Yozgat, Galatia, gave a most interesting illustrated lecture on "Armenia" last week at the Hackney Y.M.C.A. One of the missionary members of this Association has recently started Y.M.C.A.'s at Rustchuk and Lom Palanka, Bulgaria. Another formed a branch at Salem, South India; whilst another of the missionary members founded the first Y.M.C.A. in Persia.

A "Williams Fellowship Union," in honour of Sir George Williams and his work, has been founded by an Association in the United States. "Its membership is made up of men and women who are interested in work for young men as carried on by the association. They meet three times a year for supper, and to listen to brief addresses by prominent clergymen and business men." The movement has greatly extended interest in Y.M.C.A. work.

On Wednesday evening Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Dymond invited workers of Newcastle-on-Tyne Association to tea to meet the delegates from the neighbouring Y.M.C.A.'s, when interesting reports were presented by Mr. W. P. Hall and Mr. J. B. Service, Sunderland; Mr. C. Procter, Mr. H. G. Fletcher, Mr. H. Armstrong, Newcastle; Mr. Cowey, Hebburn; Mr. Haswell, South Shields; Mr. E. Laing, Stockton, and others. Colonel Yates, R.A., also gave an address.

The annual social meeting of the Manchester Y.M.C.A. was held last week, when the large hall and other rooms were crowded by members and friends. The chair was taken by Mr. W. J. Crossley (president), and addresses were delivered by Dr. Stubbs (Dean of Ely), Rev. Dinsdale T. Young (Wesleyan), and Dr. Wilson, of Birmingham. The annual report, read by the hon. sec. (Mr. W. H. Newett), showed that 602 new members and associates have been enrolled during the past year, and the report referred to the many Bible classes, athletic clubs, and educational classes, etc., in connection with the Association.

The first annual public meeting of the Omagh Young Men's Christian Association was held on the 17th inst. Mr. John G. R. Porter, J.P., president, occupied the chair. The extracts from the annual report, which were read by the secretary, Mr. Wm. Thompson, were of a very cheering nature, and go to show that the Association is doing a practical work, and that the young men of the town are availing themselves of its privileges. During the year seventy-four new names were enrolled. Special prominence is evidently given to religious work, and a list of the several meetings towards developing the young men in this direction was given. Public meetings in connection with four different missionary societies were arranged for by the committee.

The annual "Radley's" meeting—the anniversary of one of the original gatherings of the Y.M.C.A. to which London's committeemen and secretaries were called, and which was for many years held at the Old Radley's Temperance Hotel, Blackfriars—took place at Exeter Hall on Wednesday evening. In the unavoidable absence of the president, the chair was taken by his son, Mr. Howard Williams. There was a large attendance, and a practical and suggestive conference was sustained upon the subject of the development and training of honorary workers in the associations. Mr. A. C. Furse, of Camden Town, opened the proceedings with an excellent paper, and was followed in the discussion by Mr. H. G. Lomer (Wimbledon), Mr. Arthur Hill (Kingston), Mr. W. Hind Smith, Mr. Conder, Mr. Lawrence, and others.

In the West of England, Sidmouth Association is doing a progressive and valuable work, sustaining three Bible-classes and three village meetings weekly; the work at Yeovil also has much revived. Taunton has held a most successful three days' festival this week—the formal opening of the new gymnasium taking place on the 22nd, the annual public meeting on the 23rd, and a special members' meeting on the 24th, at which a presentation was made to the much-respected president, Mr. J. E. W. Wakefield. The Torquay branch of the Young Men's Christian Association is now free from debt, and starts the New Year with a balance in hand of a penny. Although that amount appears insignificant, it is of importance as indicating the energetic efforts which have been made by both the president and the hon. sec. to relieve the local association of arrears amounting to upwards of £80.

The quarterly meeting of the North-Eastern District Union was held on Saturday, 18th, at High Cross House, Benwell, Newcastle, the residence of Mr. H. Crawford Smith. Representatives were present from Newcastle, South Shields, Sunderland, Stockton, Darlington, Hebburn, Bishop Auckland, Oakenshaw, Bedlington, Deptford, West Hartlepool, Annfield Plain, and Yarm. Reports were presented by the district secretary, Mr. J. C. Moor, from the executive; from Mr. J. W. Watkin, Yarm, upon extended deputation work in the south part of the district; by Mr. W. M. Hudson, South Shields, from the Evangelisation Committee, who have arranged for missions at Darlington and Hebburn; by Mr. C. Thompson, Sunderland, of delegates meetings held; and by Mr. J. C. Fraser, Stockton, as to proposed honorary corresponding advisers and village work. An invitation to hold the Easter conference on Easter Tuesday at Darlington was accepted.

Junior Civil Service Christian Union.—Some ninety members and friends of this Union were recently entertained at Exeter Hall. Tea was followed by short speeches by members. The hon. secretary, Mr. F. J. Foot, 14, Melody-road, Wandsworth, desires to state that the purpose of the Union is to reach young men entering Government offices (especially those coming to London from country homes) and to band them together in Christian fellowship.

The Dauphine Valleys.—Sir,—In October, 1890, you inserted a short notice of an effort being made to help the scattered mountain villages of La Drome, Dauphiné. The aim proposed was twofold—to raise a sum for the education of a pastor's son, and the permanent endowment of a scholarship at the Theological College of Montauban, for the benefit of a student to be specially ordained for work in the High Valleys of La Drome. The result proposed has been slowly but surely attained. Samuel Matras, son of M. Matras, of Ancelon, near Barnave, La Drome, has been educated since 1887 at the preparatory schools of Tournon and Batignolles, and last year passed all the examinations required to qualify him as student in theology at Montauban. The school fees being now no longer required and the principal set free, £700 sterling has been handed over to the French trustees appointed to receive it, to be administered in the founding of a permanent scholarship at Montauban, to be held by a student for the pastorate in the French Alps. Samuel Matras has entered as first nominee, and it is hoped he will be an earnest and devoted pastor, the first of many such benefiting by this scholarship, and trained as desired by the founders to keep alive in some remote parts of France the pure light of Gospel truth.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE annual meeting of the Waterford branch was held on the 16th inst. Rev. H. Line presided. Pastor J. L. Stanley and Miss Ardill are to address the annual meeting of the Tulse Hill Branch tomorrow (21st inst.).

The Hon. Mrs. Tollemache has undertaken to conduct the Park Mission Bible-class at Old Cavendish-street on Sunday afternoons for three months.

On the 17th inst. a "Social" was held by the members of the Blairgowrie branch. Miss Fenton delivered an address on "Women's Work in Galilee."

In our issue of January 16 it was made to appear that the Young Women's Christian Institute at Hove, Brighton, is connected with the Y.W.C.A. This is not the case.

The annual New Year's gathering of the members of the Hastings Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. took place in the Brassey Institute on the 15th inst. There was a good attendance. The meeting was addressed by Rev. H. C. Sturdy, of Dorking.

The first quarterly conference of the workers of the Dundee Y.W.C.A. took place on the 18th inst. The subjects discussed were "Difficulties and Discouragements" and "The Remedy and Power for Service." The proceedings throughout were marked by a highly spiritual tone.

About 170 members and friends were present at the annual meeting of the Montrose Branch, held in the Memorial Hall. Earnest Gospel addresses were given by Mrs. C. Scrimgeour and Miss Hayward. Reports were given by Miss Mudie and Mrs. Cumming of the work in the adult and junior divisions. There are 100 senior and 40 junior members.

A tea-meeting in connection with the Blackburn Branch, held in St. Paul's School, was attended by about 140 members. Mrs. Tattersall, president, spoke on "Christ our Pattern," and presented to each member a handsomely-bound copy of "Grace and Truth." An address on whole-hearted service for Christ was given by Miss Whitwell, of Kendal.

The Bishop of Hereford, presiding at the annual meeting of the Hereford Branch, held on the 16th inst., said he was much gratified to see that the Association was growing in interest, and bringing Gospel influence to bear upon the hearts and lives of those around them. He was glad to notice the prominence given to reading and studying the Bible, and exhorted his hearers earnestly to love and reverence the sacred volume.

The twenty-eighth annual meeting of the Torquay Y.W.C.A. was held on the 20th inst. This branch is one of the most active centres of work among young women in the West of England. Bishop Hellmuth, who presided, bore testimony to the character and usefulness of the work. He spoke of the institute rather as resembling a university, and rejoiced to find that in providing spiritual enjoyment they were developing a force of a far higher and nobler character than the greatest discoveries of science.

A meeting was held at 316, Regent-street, on Wednesday afternoon, to welcome Miss L. Duff on her coming to reside at the Welbeck Home, 101, Mortimer-street, and to undertake, with Miss Wingate, the honorary superintendence of the Welbeck and the Morley Halls. Miss Burmester presided. After prayer had been offered, the Hon. Emily Kinnaird read a letter from Miss Wingate, who was absent through illness. Miss Kinnaird expressed the great pleasure which all felt that Miss Duff was taking up the work. Mr. G. L. Dashwood, a member of the committee, warmly welcomed Miss Duff, who briefly replied, and the remainder of the time was spent in prayer.

Trinity-street Mission, Borough.—The annual "mothers' tea-meeting was held on Thursday evening. Rev. F. B. Meyer gave a soul-stirring address, which was followed by a very pleasant programme of sacred music. An address was also given by Mrs. Heywood Smith, and the meeting was concluded with a season of prayer, which resulted in much blessing. The year's work of the Mission has been very encouraging, and there is every reason to thank God and press forward.

Home for Motherless Girls.—Miss Lee's excellent Home for Motherless Little Girls is known to our readers. During the last year she has lost some generous helpers, and is only able to take eighteen girls in a house which could accommodate forty. The landlord has renewed a previous offer of allowing the money already paid for rent to form a cumulative fund towards the purchase of the long lease (ninety-one years). A thousand pounds now on mortgage he allows to remain, thus leaving £450 for Miss Lee to raise before a permanent Home is secured for the orphans. Of the £450, £100 is already promised. The Home, when purchased, will be vested in the hands of suitable trustees. Donations for this special purpose, or subscriptions towards its maintenance, will be gratefully received by Miss Lee, at The Home, Oaklynge, Eastbourne.

Christian Endeavour.

THE Christian Endeavour, believing that some are losing faith in tract distribution, raises a vigorous protest, showing how much tracts have been blessed of God.

A "sunshine" committee in Hampshire has hit on the idea of buying a Bath-chair, and taking frail old people and convalescents out for a ride in the fresh air.

The Portsmouth Convention has proved full of interest. A visit reports that the Endeavour movement in the town seems remarkably vigorous and influential.

Many Scottish Endeavourers who were present at the great International Conference at Liverpool have been telling in their own meetings at home of the wonderful enthusiasm of that gathering.

The Missionary Review remarks that a C.E. Society at Moreton has become a slave-holder. One of its members is a missionary in Amoy, where her interest was greatly roused in a young Chinese girl, whose parents were going to sell her for a slave. The Mission tried to induce her parents to give her to them, but they would not unless the full market price of £3 was given. Not having the money the missionaries appealed to the Moreton society, which raised the money.

Irish Notes.

HALL'S-ROAD Methodist Church, Belfast, has commenced a free dispensary for the poor.

Collections were taken up last Sunday in the various Presbyterian churches in aid of Presbyterian missions, which are doing an excellent work in India and China.

The Home Mission among the Blind is doing a good work in Belfast and the neighbourhood. The mission has now two homes, and the Bible-women are constantly employed in visiting the sick and poor and in holding meetings.

The Methodists of Kilkenny have opened a Soldiers' Parlour for the military of all ranks and classes stationed in that city, in which they can read the daily papers and the monthly magazines, and get refreshments at a reasonable rate.

Scottish Notes.

DR. JAMES BONAR, son of the late Dr. Andrew A. Bonar, of Glasgow, has been appointed the chief of the permanent examiners under the Civil Service Commissioners.

Rev. Dr. Adamson last week received a cordial farewell by temperance friends in Edinburgh, previous to his leaving for Windermere, where he has accepted a pastoral charge.

Mr. Wm. Quarrier has received a gift of £300 towards a "Servants' Home" which he contemplates erecting at Bridge of Weir, as a place of rest for worn-out and weary Christian workers. He needs £1500 to complete the project.

In connection with the tercentenary services at Barony Church (Established), Glasgow, Rev. John Watson, of Liverpool, showed a brotherly spirit in preaching for Dr. Marshall Lang last Sabbath morning and evening.

A meeting was held at the Christian Institute, Glasgow, last week, in aid of Waldensian Missions. It was resolved to establish a Glasgow auxiliary. Rev. B. Revel, of Venice, gave some interesting details of the work carried on, and of progress made.

A united mission of the Springburn U.P. and Sighthill Free Churches has been conducted by Mr. E. P. Telford. At the close of the first fortnight in the U.P. Church a large number had made profession of faith in Jesus Christ. Mr. Telford began the second fortnight of the united mission in Sighthill Free Church on Sabbath, 26th inst.

"An Indignant Mother" writes to the Glasgow Daily Mail with reference to the recent prosecution of a disorderly house in that city. She protests against the injustice and unfairness of publishing the names of the young girls implicated, whilst the names of the male sinners (some of them in good social position) are carefully withheld.

The annual meeting of the Stirling Railway Mission was held in the Arcade Hall on Thursday evening last. There was a very large attendance. Rev. Dr. Andrews, chairman, referred to the blessing vouchsafed to the mission in the past, and spoke encouragingly of the future. Mr. Stewart, ex-president, who is leaving, referred to the inception of the mission seven years ago, and told how the work had gone on increasing in numbers and in spiritual results. Rev. Wm. Hutchinson, Coatbridge, gave an encouraging word to the workers.

Australian Notes.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE sad intelligence has been received in Melbourne of the death of Mrs. John Adamson, who accompanied her husband, Rev. John Adamson, to the mission-field in Corea, to which place he went to labour as a representative of the Presbyterian Fellowship Union of Victoria.

Mr. Robert Gillespie, President of the Presbyterian Fellowship Union of Victoria, recently returned from London, and was accorded a most hearty welcome by the members of the Union, who assembled in large numbers at the Alma-road, St. Kilda Presbyterian Hall. Mr. Gillespie's address was stirring and encouraging.

General Booth has paid another visit to the Australian colonies. He was received with great enthusiasm wherever he went. Mayors and members of Parliament, not to mention governors and judges, presided at his gatherings, and spoke on behalf of his work. The meetings were also said to have been productive of great good in the way of conversions of sinners and strengthening of believers.

Some time ago, while travelling on a river steamboat on the Murray, I met a Chinese cook who had been converted. He could play Mr. Sankey's hymns on the piano, and on deck sang quite a number of these, being accompanied on the concertina by a passenger, a young station manager from up country. His singing was quite understandable, and his music was evidently of a higher order than that of most of his countrymen.

Two good men and true leave Melbourne shortly, purposing to remain in the old country. The Rev. C. H. Irwin, Presbyterian minister, and for some years past colleague with the Rev. D. McEachran, at Carlton, will be very much missed in Victoria. He is well-known for his thorough hearty work as a preacher, and also as an evangelist of no small merit. Rev. Thos. Bird, Baptist minister at Auburn, leaves on Jan. 4. His health has not been robust of late years, and the duties of a large and increasing charge must have told considerably upon him. He has done good service in connection with the China Inland Mission.

The Ministering Children's League had a grand field-day lately. On Saturday, Dec. 7, Lady Brassey opened the "Cottage by the Sea," which had been erected by "ministering children" and their friends as a convalescent home for sick children. This picturesque institution has a most commanding site on the ocean coast, a mile or so from Queenscliff Pier, and about seventy miles from Melbourne by rail, though only about half that distance by sea. The air is bracing; and the scenery, embracing ocean, bay, and coast line, is particularly fine, so that little ones who are privileged to be sent there for a change should soon get strong and hearty.

Abbey Road Chapel, N.W.

SPECIAL services on Tuesday last week commemorated Pastor H. E. Stone's fifth year of work at Abbey-road Baptist Church, St. John's Wood. Pastor A. G. BROWN, of the East London Tabernacle, preached in the afternoon, when the chapel was filled. The sermon, based upon the words, "Let us draw near," was indeed a rich time of refreshing and stimulus.

The public meeting was presided over by Mr. A. M. GOODRICH, one of the members, who, in a hearty, outspoken address, bore affectionate testimony to the faithful preaching of the Gospel and the spiritual condition of the church. Rev. J. EWIN, of Streatham, followed, in a speech marked by lofty enthusiasm and apt illustration. Taking for his theme the words, "Ancient Lights," he spoke of his joy in knowing that the inspiration of the Word, the preaching of the Cross, the headship of Jesus, and the separating of the church from the world, was faithfully taught. Professor McCART, LL.D., set forth the different terms employed in the New Testament for Christian service, and called forth the enthusiasm of the gathering as he gloried in the power of the Gospel as exhibited in their midst. Four of the deacons spoke in loving terms, and in grateful words acknowledged the Divine blessing resting upon the church. Mr. Simmonds incidentally noted, in looking through the register of church members, that of the 950, 450 had joined since the pastor's settlement. Altogether, it was a day of joy and gladness within, and the pastor's closing prayer that "Low before God would we bow in grateful dependence for guidance and blessing," was echoed in every heart.

A Prayer for All.—Lord, pardon what I have been; sanctify what I am; order what I shall be: that thine be the glory and mine the eternal salvation. For Christ's sake. Amen.—DR. BETHUNE.

Temperance Notes.

LORD SALISBURY has signified his willingness to receive a deputation in support of the legislative proposals of the Church of England Temperance Society.

Rev. L. M. Isitt, of New Zealand, has concluded a seven days' mission in Doncaster, under the auspices of the Gospel Temperance Union. His meetings have been largely attended.

The Princess of Wales has consented to open in May a bazaar in aid of the Hackney and East Middlesex Band of Hope Union, which commemorates its twenty-first anniversary this year.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, on behalf of the Episcopal Bench, has requested the Prime Minister to appoint a parliamentary committee to inquire into the whole question of licensing reform.

The Bradford Band of Hope Union reports that the local membership now exceeds 28,000. The year just closed has left the lesson that whatever hard work has been done in the past, there is harder work yet to be done.

Temperance men are usually interested in peace. Thus messages praying for the preservation of peace have passed between Hon. Neal Dow, as representing American temperance societies, and Mr. E. M. Hilton, as representing the temperance crusaders at home.

The Police Temperance Society of Hull has been celebrating its fifth anniversary. The mayor, who presided, said the town had reason to be proud of the superintendent and so many members of the force who stood out conspicuously as members of that society.

Sunday last was observed in Liverpool as Temperance Sunday. Amongst the special preachers was Archdeacon Wilson, vicar of Rochdale, who discoursed to large congregations—in the morning in Christ Church, Linnet-lane, Sefton Park, and in the evening at St. George's, Everton.

The National Temperance League's useful and convenient ANNUAL for 1896 was issued last week (23, Paternoster-row, 1s.). It is a well-arranged and comprehensive guide to events and points bearing on temperance, and essential for speakers and writers on the theme to know. The Annual contains besides, many important "Facts and Statistics," and other information.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, addressing a meeting in Newcastle, stated that he believed from all that he could hear that the prohibitionists were never more resolute, more united, more unflinching, or more hopeful of victory than they were at that moment. Their policy would be to support all that was good in the Bishops' Bill, and object only to anything that might give the liquor traffic a firmer footing.

Jane Cakebread has had to leave the Inebriate Home near Reigate. Lady Henry Somerset explains that the weakness of the unfortunate woman is not inebriety. During her residence in the home she has not exhibited any craving whatever for strong drink. She has, however, given so much trouble of late that it has been found impossible to keep her longer. A medical man has certified that she is insane. On leaving the Home the poor woman was handed over to Mr. Holmes, police-court missionary. She, however, managed to get amongst old acquaintances, with the result that she was charged before a London magistrate for the 280th time with being drunk and disorderly.

A temperance demonstration has been held at the Public Hall, Rochdale, to focus the opinion of the town, and to discuss the reform of the drink traffic in a practical and effective manner. The hall was crowded by men of every creed and party. Alderman James Duckworth, J.P., ex-president of the United Methodist Free Churches, occupied the chair. Archdeacon Wilson, the vicar of Rochdale, submitted a resolution, which embodied the reforms recently accepted at the National Temperance Conference in London. This was seconded by Rev. Daniel Heaton, Methodist minister. The chief speech of the evening was delivered by the Bishop of Chester, who pleaded for moderate and feasible reforms that had the sanction of the majority of the people.

The United Temperance Council for the County of London held on Thursday its first annual meeting in the Holborn Town Hall. Mr. A. F. Hills gave an encouraging account of progress during the year. Before the end of another year he hoped to see temperance County Councils uniting not only the 2000 societies in London, but similar societies in each county, so that these central organisations might voice the demands of the whole temperance party. In the evening a new year's temperance party drew many hundreds of visitors to the same hall, filling all quarters to overflowing. The programme opened with light refreshments, followed by a concert, interspersed with addresses by Lady Henry Somerset, Canon Wilberforce, Canon Barker, and Mr. Joseph Malins.

International S.S. Lessons.

FEBRUARY 9.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.—Luke vi. 41-49.
GOLDEN TEXT.—Verse 46.

TRADITION says that this sermon was delivered on the Horns of Hattin, a mount with two peaks, and two or three miles west from the Sea of Galilee.

According to Luke's Gospel, the sermon followed the election of the twelve apostles, which was preceded by a night spent in prayer (12-16). Having formed the nucleus of the new kingdom, it seemed necessary to declare who were its subjects, and what were its principles. If the blessedness of being in the kingdom is to be ours, we must fulfil the conditions upon which admission to the kingdom depends.

While in Matthew there are eight beatitudes (v. 3-11), in Luke there are only four; and these are contrasted with four woes pronounced upon those who are marked by principles opposite to those of the kingdom of God (20-26).

The distinguishing feature of this new kingdom is love, of which, in contradiction to the teaching and practice of the Pharisees, even enemies are to be the objects (27-35). This love is to find expression in patient endurance of wrong, and in active benevolence; and is to find its source and pattern in the love of God (35, 36).

The Golden Text suggests that the main thought of this lesson is sincerity as opposed to hypocrisy—truth as opposed to mere seeming. And the lesson is enforced by three homely illustrations.

I. THE MOTE AND THE BEAM (41, 42).—The mote means a little splinter, in contrast with the beam or rafter. The one represents a very slight defect, the other a fault of great magnitude. The illustration shows how ludicrous it is for a man to be judging and trying to correct evil in others, while he does not seem to know the evil that is in himself. Does not our Lord also suggest "the relative magnitude which our own faults and those of our brother ought to hold in our estimation? What is a mote to one looking on another is to that other himself a beam—just the reverse of the ordinary estimate."—Alford.

How common is this evil! The most extreme illustration of it is in Satan, who is the embodiment of every wickedness, but who is the accuser of the saints. The Pharisees did his work well, for, while ignorant of their own sins, they were constantly looking for faults in others. But we all commit this fault. We are ready to magnify the sins of others in order to make our own appear less. Jesus calls this hypocrisy (42), for if we really hated the evil, should we not hate it most bitterly in ourselves? A good prayer for us all would be, "Lord, let me see the worst of myself, and teach me to look for what is best in others."

II. THE TREE AND ITS FRUIT (43-45).—The fruit depends not on the position and surroundings of the tree, but upon what the tree is. "In Palestine there are often seen, behind hedges of thorns and brambles, fig-trees completely garlanded with the climbing tendrils of vine branches."—Godet. The thorns and brambles, though in the same soil, never bring forth either figs or grapes. What you are determines what you will do and say. In verse 45, the heart is the inner life of the tree; the mouth is like the branches, which can only produce according to what is in the heart. To be right is the first condition of doing right.

But if our very nature is corrupt, how can we hope to bring forth good fruit? In the same way that the common briar stock in your garden bears the beautiful rose. It had grafted into itself a new life, to which it has now become united. When Christ says to us, "Ye must be born again," He comes to us as the new life. To receive Him by faith is to become united to Him; then the new fruit is not ours but his (Hos. xiv. 8). You cannot make yourself good, but you can receive Him. Have you done so?

III. THE ROCK AND THE SAND (47-49).—"On the shelving lands which surround the lake of Genesareth, there are some hills on which the rock is covered with only a thin layer of earth or sand. A prudent man digs through this moveable soil, digs deep down, even into the rock, upon and in which he lays the foundation."—Godet. For us Christ is the rock. By hearing and obeying we build upon Him. The floods which try us are the temptations of the present and the judgment to come. The trial never makes a man wrong; it only proves what he is. Be on the Rock, and though the temptations and difficulties may make you tremble, you will know that the Rock never trembles under you. All are building;—what is our house worth? The mere professor's is built upon sand, and will fall. Only he who hears and obeys builds aright.

Obituary.

REV. H. H. CARLISLE, SCARBOROUGH.

THE Congregational ministry has suffered a loss through the death of Rev. H. Hermann Carlisle, B.A., LL.B., which took place at Scarborough after a lingering illness. Mr. Carlisle, who was trained for the ministry at the Countess of Huntingdon's College at Cheshunt, graduated at the London University, and in 1859 removed to Above Bar, Southampton, where he laboured successfully for over twenty-five years. In 1885 he removed from Southampton to the charge of the church at Eccles, near Manchester, and after a pastorate of seven years accepted a call to the church of South Cliff, Scarborough.

REV. HENRY WINSOR.

This friend, minister at Thornaby-on-Tees, died at Bournemouth on Thursday, January 23. He had been ill for some months; and recently submitted to an operation for the removal of a tumour from the neck. He contracted a chill during his journey to Bournemouth. Pneumonia followed, and this resulted in his death. Mr. Winsor studied for the ministry in the Pastors' College. His first pastorate was at Beeston Hill, Leeds. In 1881 he took charge of the newly-formed church at Thornaby, where he has done faithful service, winning the increasing esteem and affection of the people. He has been for some years a member of the Thornaby School Board. He leaves a widow, but no children.

MR. B. L. GREEN, MANCHESTER.

This well-known Manchester leader passed away on Sunday, at the age of seventy-two. The son of a Baptist minister, he began life as a publisher, and in association with his brother, now Rev. Dr. Green, of the R.T.S., brought out a Selection of Psalms and Hymns, which met with much acceptance. Later on he removed to Southport, and in 1872 went to Manchester as secretary of the Nonconformist Association. His work for some years was largely political. Later on he became secretary of the Manchester Peace Society. Meanwhile, in connection with Sunday-schools and other Christian work he was always ready to lend valuable service. For some years he was superintendent of the large Sunday-school connected with Chorlton-road Chapel, having over a thousand scholars.

REV. GEORGE HINDS.

This able minister, who for fourteen years did valuable work at Salem, Leeds, passed away at the age of fifty-five on 21st inst., at his residence in the Merton-road, Wimbledon, where he lived since his retirement. Before going to Leeds, he was for some time at Southport, and whilst he was pastor there was sent by the United Kingdom Alliance as a deputation to the United States. In Leeds, where the best years of his ministerial life were spent, he did good work. By his ability and devotion he triumphed to a large extent over the difficulties which a church in the heart of the city has to face. He possessed an excellent voice, and had a fluent and polished diction. His unmistakable sincerity caused him to be highly esteemed, not only by his own congregation, but also by those belonging to other bodies who were acquainted with his work. His labours in connection with the Home Missionary Society took him frequently into the out-of-the-way country villages in Yorkshire; and there, too, his ministrations were prized. In the regard of his ministerial brethren he held a high place. He relinquished the pastorate of Salem on account of impaired health. His wife survives him, and his death is also mourned by a daughter and two sons.

PREBENDARY WIGHTMAN, SHREWSBURY.

This devoted servant of Christ, who for fifty-two years was vicar of St. Alkmund's, Shrewsbury, has been called home. His father was vicar of Saltford, his mother the daughter of a Russian prince. His wife, who has rendered invaluable service during her husband's long career, was the well-known authoress of "Haste to the Rescue." The income of the parish in which Mr. Wightman laboured over half a century being only £34 net, and a house, it is evident his career was one of unselfish devotion. In 1891 he celebrated his jubilee as vicar of the parish, and was presented on the occasion with a purse of £300 and addresses, one from members of the Church of England of the town and county, and the other from a large number of Nonconformist ministers, among whom he was very highly respected. Throughout his clerical life Prebendary Wightman was an earnest and consistent Evangelical, and was never ashamed of the Protestant cause.

A friend, writing in The Record, says: "Mr. Wightman's pulpit ministrations were always faithful, earnest, and wise. It was his joy to declare the whole counsel of God, and from first to last he was determined not to know anything among his people save Jesus Christ and Him crucified. But his fidelity to truth and zeal for sound doctrine were never marked by uncharitableness. He spoke the truth in love. He was remarkable for loveliness. He fell asleep on Jan. 16, in his eightieth year, and was buried on Jan. 21. All Shrewsbury desired to show respect and gratitude to his memory. Bishop and clergy, Nonconformist ministers, Mayor and Corporation, rich and poor, one and all, were eager to place a flower on his grave. Says Bunyan, 'The pilgrim they laid in a large upper chamber, whose window opened towards the sunrise: the name of the chamber was Peace.'"

In Memory of Mr. Spurgeon.

SPECIAL memorial services were held on Sunday in the Metropolitan Tabernacle on the occasion of the fourth anniversary of the death of the late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon. In the morning the service, which was attended by a large congregation, was conducted by Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, who preached from the text, "And Samuel died, and all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him in his house at Ramah." He remarked that from Britain to the Antipodes the name of C. H. Spurgeon was greatly honoured, and when Providence saw fit to pluck him from their midst he was sorely missed. The similarity between Samuel and their late pastor was not confined to their deaths, but their whole lives were alike in the work of God. Mr. Spurgeon was emphatically a man of prayer, as was recorded of Samuel, and his faith in God was strong. Samuel was a man of wonderful faith and activity, while Spurgeon's actions and work were characterised by indomitable perseverance. In the afternoon another service was held in the Lecture Hall of the Tabernacle, when the sermon was preached by Rev. William Stott.

In the evening Pastor Thomas Spurgeon again conducted the service. This evening (Thursday) the anniversary of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's death, a commemoration service will be held in place of the ordinary week-night service at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

Berlin Christian Mission.

THE evangelistic work carried on by Mr. Fritz Schaaff, is attended with encouragement as well as difficulties. The report for last year says:—

"What we daily see in Berlin eclipses all our experience in English-speaking countries. It is not so much that misery that shows itself already in the exterior in the streets, but in the devilish spirit combined with vice, that seems impossible to be penetrated even by the most faithful Christian effort. In that part of the city where we have our Mission, three-fourths of the population are avowed infidels. Notwithstanding all this, we have been pegging away; if we have not had much success amongst the grown-up people, still we have been the means of bringing joy and comfort to a good many hearts. Our greatest joy is our Sunday-school and Young Women's Christian Union. They both have been on the increase in numbers since our commencement two years ago.

"We have distributed thousands of tracts and booklets which we received through the kindness of the Stirling Tract enterprise. Our finances have kept on the same level—just kept above water, and that is probably just where the Lord wants to keep us. Our own souls have been very much blessed in the work, and notwithstanding all the disappointments and trials of faith, we are willing to go on with the work entrusted to our hands by our Heavenly Father."

Communications to Mr. Schaaff should be addressed 32, Garten-Strasse, Berlin, N.

Dr. Alfred Hogg, of the Free Methodist Church Mission, Wenchow, China, writes from Wenchow, "Some of my opium patients have become enquirers. Wenchow has had its share of persecution this year. There were riots near Ping-yang, and many of the Christians had their houses burned down. At Feng Ling, up north, the Christians have a second time had their property forcibly taken from them by some of the inhabitants, stirred up by the gentry, and four of these were afterwards imprisoned on a charge of having improperly or falsely accused the gentry of so doing." Dr. Hogg goes on to tell of the outbreak of cholera at Wenchow, and concludes: "My medical work is progressing much as usual. There is hope of having an hospital some time soon. I have medical work four days a week, and see each week 150 to 200 patients, while a large number are prescribed for by my two colleagues and myself in country journeys. The work is evidently being blessed, enquirers are numerous, and candidates for baptism not a few, and there is much friendliness and interest in the work manifested by the country people. The troubles all come from the gentry and officials."

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

WE have received several letters from friends who desire to help distressed Armenians, inquiring how they may send money to be devoted to this purpose. We are in communication with Armenia through several channels, and shall be glad to forward amounts entrusted to us, and acknowledge the same as hitherto in our Donation List.

The long-delayed report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the earlier Turkish massacres has at last been published. Its effect ought to be to make those ashamed of themselves who have all along affected to believe that the charges against the Turkish Government were greatly exaggerated. The horrible chain of evidence is now complete, and the last apologist of the Sultan must fall silent. There is a charity that "thinketh no evil"—a thing divine and beautiful; but there is a blindness which is fiendish, because it means that the eyes are closed to everything except what it wishes to see. "Now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." This report must be hard reading for one or two of our evening editors, all the harder because the work of the Commission is an unwilling one. It has, indeed, shown itself so partial in its attitude that the consular delegates felt themselves bound to issue a separate report, which is as much a criticism of the methods of the Commission as it is a statement of the sad and harrowing facts.

Since the last date referred to by this report, the Armenian atrocities have been proceeding apace, winter has been aiding in the work of extermination, and the "Concert of Europe" has been proved a delusion and a snare. Various rumours have been circulated of a Russo-Turkish alliance, of a Russian movement to act independently, and of other strange and visionary things. While the blood of the innocent and helpless is staining the snows in those far-off mountains, and calling to heaven for vengeance, these things are going on. The situation is truly unparalleled. When Parliament meets next week it will be the first duty of the friends of humanity and progress to demand full information as to these long-continued delays, and of the intentions of the Government in the future.

Lord Salisbury's speech last Friday night practically denied England's right to interfere with Turkey. Her agreement was, he says, that if the Sultan promulgated certain reforms, she and the other Powers "would watch over the execution of those reforms," and no more. It would seem scarcely necessary to draw up an important clause in a treaty for such a purpose as this. In any case the Powers would "watch" Turkey, for they are constantly "watching" each other, whatever is done. The country has been on an entirely false scent if what Lord Salisbury says is accurate. Its conscience, proceeding on the supposition that England had undertaken the special and very definite responsibility of seeing that the Christian subjects of the Sultan are properly treated, has been disquieted in vain. We have no responsibility in the matter. This is a grievous disappointment. The world, including America, has been looking to England, and England has been looking—in vain—to her Government. There are millions who believe that the Judge of all the earth has also been looking to her, and that she has failed in the hour of trial.

The death of Lord Leighton removes from the world of art its most prominent, and in many ways its most attractive, figure. The obituary notices have been full of references to his kindliness, his unselfish interest in the welfare of young students, and his encouragement to those anxious to make the best of their powers and opportunities. His friend Mr. G. F. Watts said once of him, "He has painted many noble pictures, but his life is more noble than them all." This, coming from such a source, is high praise. At the same time, his special triumphs as an artist were certainly not in the highest direction. He found his subjects rather in the realm of poetic legend than in that where the soul finds its true home. The result is that out of all his beautiful creations, probably not one picture can be spoken of as truly great. Certainly nothing comparable to Mr. Watts's "Light of the World" ever came from his brush. An artist needs some spiritual insight to paint a picture like that.

What will Parliament do with the temperance question? Surely it will go all the length of the demands of the Church of England Temperance Society, and give the nation fewer hours per day and fewer days per week to get drunk in, and fewer public-houses to get drunk at. Reduce the number of houses, and give drinkers fewer facilities to injure themselves; reduce the number of hours for selling drink, and redeem the Lord's Day to its high uses; forbid the sending of children for drink; and we shall soon see an improvement in the land.

Though the international outlook is less threatening, we cannot help feeling that the recent display of "temper" in three great nations nearly allied in blood and interests, over what, in other and calmer times, would pass without rousing any comment, is an ominous symptom of the unrest of the civilised world. Venezuela and Johannesburg are scarcely to be called important on the earth's map. The one is a decaying state; the other is a mushroom city of ten years' growth. And yet they have almost fired the train which would have shaken Europe into an explosion of war. The root of the mischief is in the despondency that is prevalent in view of the seemingly insoluble problems of civilisation. Men are vaguely disappointed because the "age of iron" has not become the "age of gold." Not till the world turns to higher things will this morbid mood pass away.

We are glad to notice that the National Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising has taken in hand recent developments of the art of advertising. There is real need for their vigilance in several directions, and we wish them all success in their praiseworthy endeavours.

One of the signs of the times is a striking change in the tone of the social reform orator in our public parks. Anyone who compares the Socialist oratory of seven or eight years ago with what he hears in our parks to-day must be impressed with the decrease of that narrow, acrid, vindictive spirit which used to mark it. The stream of talk is as copious as ever, but it has become more intelligent and kindly. The barriers of prejudice between the classes are breaking down. The leaders of the working-men are learning the important lesson that conciliation is the secret of concession, and that just rights are more easily gained by earnest agitation and manly appeal than by breathing forth threats and slaughter against their fellow-men. The "Mission Settlement" and P.S.A. movement have done much to soften old asperities. And the increased activity of the Church amongst the poor is growingly acknowledged by those who benefit by its ministrations.

But there is yet much to be done to win the working-man into sympathy with church life. Even those who freely attend P.S.A. gatherings look suspiciously at all endeavours to bring them into the ordinary church services. This stubborn prejudice against the place where rich and poor ought to meet together in Christ's name is deplorable. It clearly has roots that reach far and deep which will take long to wither away. It would indeed be a happy day for England when the sanctuary should be freely attended by men and women of all classes and conditions, where they might unlearn their mutual prejudices and suspicions, and join in practical brotherhood for the furtherance of the kingdom of God. Every true follower of Jesus Christ should work hard to this end.

Christian workers in great cities, need to see by faith the holy love of God, which broods continually over the mass of darkness and sin around them. Their hope is in God, and their eyes must be continually lifted up to Him for help. The ever-stimulating fact which prompts to work and sacrifice, is his unflinching interest in men, and his strong desire to save them. Instead of speaking of great cities as God-forsaken places, we should regard them as God-filled, "cities of the great King." We may look for the most wonderful displays of power and love, where they are the most needed. Jesus told Paul in a vision by night that He had much people in Corinth, one of the worst Gentile cities of that time; and so we may be sure that where men are congregated there is "much people" to be won for Christ.

It took Samuel twenty years of ceaseless work, of patient teaching, and of brave witnessing for God, to counteract the demoralisation of the people wrought by Hophni and Phinehas in the early days of Eli. No great exertion is required to do a great deal of harm; it is enough to be easy, complacent, negligent of the hard parts of service. The weeds of sin spring up in the garden of the Lord with alarming rapidity, once the gardener's hands are idle. Eli had some beautiful traits of character, but for all that he allowed the nation to fall into ruin by permitting sin at the very centre of the nation's life—the service of the Tabernacle. To reprove sin, to resist sin, to expel sin from the midst of God's people, is the most painful and most difficult task anyone can undertake; but he saves years of weakness, of shame and of reproach who dares to do it.

Professor Adeney who thinks that the Sunday school needs such radical changes as can only be described by the use of the word "drastic" reform, points to the enormous leakage of scholars as a proof of his contention, and also to the quality of the remnant which is retained. The proof of inefficiency is only too patent. One of the saddest experiences of those who labour among the fallen and drunken is that those whom they seek have almost always been Sunday scholars, who know equally well the hymn and the ribald song. Perhaps this points to the necessity for seeking to win the parents of scholars to Christ; not in the spasmodic and irregular way now too common, but systematically and constantly. It is the bad home influence, much more than the shortcoming of the Sunday-school, which ultimately draws boys and girls away into the ranks of the godless. Until they reach an age when they claim liberty to go their own way, they regard the Sunday-school as a kind of place of discipline, and are glad at last to get free from it. They should, therefore, be sought along with their parents and everyone else in the home; they must be sought and saved in the families, or it seems as if they would not be saved at all, except in rare instances.

Even were the families sought and won, it does not follow that a good deal of improvement might not be effected in Sunday-school methods. Professor Adeney may be right in his contention that teachers should themselves be taught and trained. A regular course of preparation might be an advantage, though that would not avail, unless the heart be in the work. The true point is touched when he insists that a few good teachers are worth a great many who are not in earnest. "The Christian character of the teachers is of supreme importance." The chief cause of failure is undoubtedly the large number of listless, half-hearted teachers. Given that supreme qualification of love to Christ, which is the one qualification our Saviour Himself called for, and then other things would follow. Fewer teachers would do more work, and control larger classes, and could even win attention and lead the children to Christ without a class-room to do it in. To some who remember how much good was done without class-rooms some forty years ago, the outcry about machinery and methods seems to miss the mark.

Among the many ways of doing good and aiding persons to aid themselves, none is more satisfactory than that of teaching men and boys some handicraft, and women and girls some art. The technical schools are, no doubt, doing something in this direction, but much remains to be done. And there are possibilities in it which cannot be measured. Our boys are far cleverer with their hands than many of us think; they have more anti-tude and taste than we give them credit for. When once you have seen beautiful work in metals and admirable carving in wood done in evening hours by boys and men who had been carting manure, and hoeing turnips, and shepherding sheep in the daytime, you come to believe that a new world may be opened to them. It may not be a spiritual world, but that also becomes nearer and more possible of attainment by them, if they can be kept from the public-house and from a reckless wasting of their money. Keep a man or a boy, a woman or a girl, well employed, and you have made a better chance for the Gospel.

Mr. William Watson has republished the series of sonnets recently contributed to the Westminster Gazette on "The Purple East" in a shilling booklet that ought to be circulated widely throughout the land. It is a long time since we have seen the poetic gift consecrated to such high uses. These verses are filled with a prophetic passion that vibrates through every line. They appeal to the Puritan instincts that are still the deepest in our race, but which for the moment seem so hard to rouse. In a striking preface, the writer refers to the "spiritual frost" that lies so hard upon the land, and despairs that any words of his can bear visible fruit. Mr. G. F. Watts, the eminent painter, who contributes a powerful frontispiece to the volume, goes so far as to say that "nothing at this moment is possible except a day of national mourning." Let us hope that matters are not quite so bad as this, and that something worthy of our duty and our destiny as the champions of freedom and righteousness may yet be done.

The Armenian Martyrs.

O God, how grows thy martyr-host! How throng
Fresh witnesses for Thee the heavenly height!
How swiftly climb the battlements of light
The slain of earth through tribulation strong!
What companies each day flame fast along
The white sky-routes! From blackest Moslem fate
Men, women, babes, doomed prey of Kurdish hate,
Mount up to glory from the abyss of wrong.
God, vindicate thy honour and thy love,
While flashing aureoles light this latest day;
At last let direct martyr-anguish move
The World-Powers paralysed and fearful still Some gain to lose. The ghastly slaughter stay!
Speak Thou! World-Powers obey thy sovereign will!

Amherst, Mass.

MRS. MERRILL E. GATES.

[AN APPEAL TO THE LADIES OF ENGLAND.]

Ye that lie warm at night whilst cold winds blow,
Whose very lap-dogs rest on silk and down,
From your luxurious homes in shire and town,
In pity, let your plenty overflow
For those, your sisters, starving in the snow
Of lands laid waste, whose cries of anguish, blown
Across five seas, re-echo to your own
And call to you for succour in their woe!
Ye that have mourn'd for father, husband, son,
Snatch'd from your arms despite your anxious care,
Let tender thought of such beloved one
Move you to make an answer to their pray'r
Who saw their dead lie naked 'neath the sun,
And watch'd the vultures gar'ring in the air.

Training of the Blind.—Though somewhat belated the Christmas tree festival of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind took place last week in the concert hall of the institution at Upper Norwood. There was a large audience, and an attractive programme was provided. A special appeal is made for funds to maintain those over sixteen years of age. Such children certainly acquitted themselves very well musically, fully justifying the view expressed by Dr. Campbell, the principal, that there are many blind children who ought to have the very best musical training from an early age.

Poverty of Spirit.

By REV. F. B. MEYER.

WE must distinguish between poverty of spirit and self-depreciation. There are some people, most objectionable as I think, who are always saying, "I am nothing and nobody." They insist in taking the back seats, and in declaring they are not worth your notice. And yet you feel that they are as proud and desirous of the first places, as those who in the Lord's parable took the best positions at the feast. Indeed, the pride that apes humility is more detestable than that which casts off all disguise. We sometimes act humbly because we are proud of a reputation of humility. We sit near the door that we may have the pleasure of being asked to the front. We assume a seraphic smile when most annoyed, because we are so eager to pass muster with the saints. Oh, for the humility which does not count itself humble! for the face which shines and we know it not! for the simplicity of the little child that does not turn back with admiration on itself!

For true poverty of spirit we must turn to our blessed Lord, who, though He was rich, yet, for our sakes, became poor. In his case the spring of his action was altogether outside his own lovely and glorious nature, and was found in his Father. He did not forego the use of marvellous power, or the flow of unrivalled language, or that wealth of a noble nature with which He was endowed by the very constitution of his being. But all was held subservient to the will of his Father.

How may we become poor in spirit? First, never look on any virtue as inherent to your character, but attribute each gift and grace to the dower of the Almighty. Be content to be a branch. If the fruit hangs ripe and full, magnify the properties of the root to which it must be attributed. Live by the Son, as He by the Father. The light that shines on sea and shore might rather be credited to the earth which is made beautiful by it, than that any grace of the Christian character should be credited to you or me, as though it were in any sense our own. What hast thou that thou hast not received?

Secondly, contrast yourself not with those below here, but with God above. We are too prone to compare our white robes with the stained garments of others, rather than with those robes which were whiter than a fuller could white them.

Thirdly, look on all the good in others. There is much more than we sometimes suppose, even in those who do not profess to be religious. Look not every man on his own things, but on the things of others. Let each account the other better than himself. These may be reasons why others have fallen short of the highest attainment, which if they had operated in our case would have dragged us to a lower depth; whilst, if others had had our advantages they would almost certainly have stood far in advance of anything that we have attained.

Fourthly, consider yourself a trustee of God for others, so that whenever any demand is made on you for help, teaching, deliverance, you may confess before God your utter incompetence, and humbly claim that He should pass through your hand the wealth of bread which the poor traveller, who has come to your house, craves.—The Christian Treasury.

"After These Things."

GENESIS xxii. 1, 2.

GOD had called Abram to go out from his country, and his kindred, and his father's house, to the land that He would show him. Instead of this, however, Terah his father took Abram, and Sarai, Abram's wife, and Lot, his nephew, out of Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the Land of Canaan, and they came to Haran and dwelt there. But when Terah was dead Abram and his wife and nephew departed from Haran to go into the Land of Canaan, and into the Land of Canaan they came.

Abram was seventy-five years old when they left Haran. The time of his delay in that half-way place is not counted, but as soon as he leaves it to pursue his journey his age is recorded. And during the next fifty years the faith and the failures of the pilgrim who attained to be the friend of God, and the faithfulness of God his Friend, are written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope.

It would seem to Abraham that the terrible command to offer up his only-begotten and beloved son came like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky. He had learned, after many ups and downs, to worship God in the spirit and to put no confidence in the flesh; for we are told at the end of the previous chapter (xxi. 33) that he "planted a tamarisk tree in Beersheba, and called there on the name of Jehovah, the Everlasting God." He was at peace with God and man, and Beersheba, the well of the oath, was the twofold token of the covenants between Abraham and Abimelech, and between God and Abraham. Surely now he will spend the remainder of his days in calm repose.

No: "It came to pass after these things, that God did prove Abraham." He had had testing times before, and he had often failed; but every failure had done something to lead him not to trust in himself but in the living God. To escape the famine he had left the land into which God had brought him, and in Egypt he denied his wife; but God delivered him: He behaved magnificently to Lot and to the King of Sodom, and when the iniquity of the cities of the plain was full, God, who knew that he would command his children and his household after him, would not hide from Abraham the judgment that hung over those exceeding sinners against the Lord. Under the burden of that awful revelation, Abraham rolled himself upon Jehovah (Psalm xxii. 8), and his confident exclamation, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" has afforded anchorage for tossed and tempted souls throughout the ages since. Nevertheless, when Sarah proposed a plan whereby they might help God to fulfil his promise before it became humanly impossible, Abraham fell into the snare, and took Hagar to bear the child of promise upon Sarah's knees.

In the Philistines' land he again denied the real relationship between himself and Sarah, and God again delivered him and her, yet not without Abimelech's rebuke. There Isaac was given, and Ishmael banished, and Abimelech saw that God was with Abraham in all that he did. Then as never before Abraham called on the name of Jehovah, the Everlasting God; as in antediluvian days it had been recorded that in the time of Enos (frail, miserable mortal man), men began to call upon the name of Jehovah.

"After these things," after all that had happened since God called him out of Ur of the Chaldees, God did prove Abraham. The Examination Day had come; and Abraham endured the test.

He had not seen whither each succeeding step was leading him, and the supreme crisis of his life came upon him suddenly, as every crisis or catastrophe comes upon us suddenly, even though it may have been long anticipated. But nothing is really sudden in the physical or moral government of God. The storm is the result of processes which have been surely, if secretly, at work. The sorrows and the joys of life all come "after these things," not merely in the way of succession, but in due order, after the preparation which "these things" have wrought, to prove whether God is indeed God to us or not.

Therefore, nothing in our life is trivial. The annoyances, perplexities, defeats, the alleviations, delights, victories, are all working together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose.

Further: our individual experience is an epitome of the world's history; and the formula, "After these things," is used in the Apocalypse in relation to the great consummation, as it had been in Genesis in relation to the father of believers and the friend of God; it is one of the many links which connect the last book of Scripture with the first. The command to the seer—"Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be after these"—the mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand and the seven golden candlesticks"—indicates that the visions lead on to that far-off Divine event

To which the whole creation moves, and that all relate to the Church of the living God, the redeemed of the Lord, the Israel of God, the lights of the world, the wise who turn many to righteousness, and who shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

"After these things" is in Genesis and in the Revelation a precursor of blessing. "After these things"—after his generous dealing with Lot, and his victory over Chedorlaomer, after the meeting with Melchizedek and Abram's splendid reply to the King of Sodom—"after these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a vision saying, Fear not Abram; I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward" (xv. 1).

"And it came to pass after these things"—note the preliminary words, "it came to pass," emphasizing the importance of the event—"after these things God did prove Abraham," and conferred this highest honour upon his friend, that He gave him to rehearse in type, two thousand years before the fact, the sacrifice of the Only-begotten Son, and made him partaker of the sufferings of God. And the early promise is mightily enlarged, "because thou hast obeyed my voice;" "now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from Me."

So also in the Unveiling, "after these things" blessing comes. After the visions ending with that of the seals (which is an epitome of the present age) the four angels hold back the winds of tribulation until the servants of God have been sealed with the seal of the living God. And after the winds have blown they who were numbered as God's elect are in another vision an innumerable multitude, out of all nations, serving Him day and night in his temple, shepherded by the Lamb, and every tear wiped from their eyes by Him that sitteth upon the throne.

After the vision of the destruction of the great harlot (who is that great city Babylon, as the bride of the Lamb is the holy city New Jerusalem), the Angel who lightens the earth with his glory cries, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen," and another voice from heaven is heard saying, "Rejoice over her thou heaven, and ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets: for God hath judged your judgment upon her."

"After these things"—after all the visions, terrible and glorious, which God gave to Jesus Christ to show unto his servants—then the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, and the New Jerusalem, and the throne of God and of the Lamb therein, and the river of life, and its twelve-fruited tree of life, and the leaves for the healing of the nations; and his servants serve Him, and the Lord God gives them light, and they reign—the servants reign (Mark x. 44)—for ever and ever (Rev. vii. 1; xviii. 1; xix. 1).

As each vision passes and another succeeds, "after these things" is implied, if not expressed. For whether it be the story of a world, or of a nation, or of a man only—of an individual saint of the Church, which is in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ—our days are bound each to each by the events which happen under the mercy and judgment of Him that sitteth on the rainbow-encircled throne. And every circumstance, whether it be clear as the jasper or lurid as the sardine stone, is working together for good to them that love God.

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them; but the transgressors shall fall therein." "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the Lord" (Hos. xiv. 9; Ps. cvii. 43). M.

Launch out into the Deep.

(Luke v. 4.)

"LAUNCH out into the deep!"

O Lord, o'er sea and land,
We hear the splendour of thy voice,
In tones of high command—
"Not in these shallow bays
With idle oars delay,
But let them sweep into the deep,
At dawning of the day!"

Into the deep of Truth,
That flows from pole to pole,
We plunge, as o'er its shadowed waves
We hear thy thunders roll;—
The Truth that, surging, breaks
On error's rock-bound beach.
And bears us far, 'neath sun and star,
Till we thy presence reach.

Into the deep of Love—
Thy Love, so full and free!—
Beneath whose gleaming waters wide
We plunge our misery;
The Love that softly flows
O'er many a sunken shame,
And to the dim horizon's rim
Is vocal with thy name.

Into the deep of Life—
Glad immortality!—
Whose bright waves fold, on sands of gold,
Beneath a cloudless sky.
O Truth, O Love, O Life,
Why darkly here delay?
Our oars we sweep into the deep,
At dawning of the day!

The Soudan.—Dr. Battersby says in Niger and Yoruba Notes:—"The question of making a real advance into the Soudan is at present engaging the attention of the C.M.S. Committee, and if only suitable volunteers will offer for this service, a forward movement might soon be made. We would commend this matter to the very earnest prayers of our readers."

The Power of Prayer.—4.

By MR. GEORGE MÜLLER.*

THUS far I had published an annual report, and people said, The report is the means of bringing in the money. I said to my co-workers, We can bring honour and glory to God by not publishing a report, which would have to declare our present need.

Therefore we stepped into the next year with deep poverty but no report issued, and we went on week after week on to the close of the next year poor as ever, yet helped day by day as before. Still, as the circumstances were about the same, I decided to publish no report at the end of that year also, lest it should be said the poverty is now so great that we were obliged to publish a report. So we stepped into the third year as poor as ever, but were again graciously helped. In like manner we went on for four months longer, when a large sum came from India. Then I said, I will now publish a report to the praise and glory of God. At another time I did the same, viz., did not publish a report till the time of need had passed, for my trust is not in reports (our experience is that the smallest sums come in after the reports are issued). My trust is in the living God, and He alone is our hope.

HE IS THE PATRON,

to Him alone we look, and on Him we depend. There are many in the present day who say, We trust in God, yet in all directions make known they want money. Such trust in God is a profession, but not a reality. With us it is a reality.

After having received a donation of £500, I opened a fourth house in Wilson-street, which gave us room for 120 orphans in the four houses. Two years later I received a very courteous letter from a gentleman who lived in one of the houses in Wilson-street, saying that while he had no complaint to make as to the behaviour of the children, yet so many children together for play at stated times each day disturbed him in his work as a chemist. I spread the letter before the Lord and I said to myself, What should I like to be done if I was the person disturbed? and if I should like not to be disturbed by children at play, ought I to remove them? I felt that I ought to do so if possible. I found, too, that no ordinary rented house would answer for a large number of children like a building erected for the purpose. I, therefore, decided if God gave the funds I would build, and not for 120, but for 300 orphans. I prayed much about this, and finally came to the conclusion that I would pray much for money to build. I did so for five days, ten, fifteen, twenty days, and many times each day but not 1d. came in. At the end of that time I was meditating in the Scripture at the Epistle of James, when I read, "Let patience have her perfect work." I went on praying for twenty-five days, thirty, and thirty-three days, still not 1d. came in, but on the thirty-fourth day I received the first donation for £1000 from a gentleman not at all well known to me, and then quickly followed again and again other donations in sums of £50, £100, and upwards.

At length I was in a position to look out for land to purchase, upon which to build, but I found that for land near the city the price asked was £1000 per acre. At length I heard of some land on Ashley Down, and was told that if I called upon the owner at his house at 7 p.m. I should find him at home. I did so, but he was not at home, and I was told I should find him at his counting house in the city. I therefore went there, but found he had left for the day, and was gone home. I did not go back to the owner's house, but I said to myself, "The hand of God may be in this preventing my seeing him to night. Therefore I will leave it in his hands till the morning." So I left the matter till the morning, when I called upon the owner at his house. As soon as we met he said, "I have heard about you; you are looking out for land for an orphan house. Last night

I LAY AWAKE FOR THREE HOURS.

I could not sleep, and it was impressed on my heart that I should let you have the land at £120 per acre, instead of the £200 per acre which I have been asking for it."

In a very short time a contract was signed; thus, by quietly watching for the leading of God's hand, and not going the evening before, I saved £560.

I was now ready to go for plans for the building, but here also I cried mightily to God that I might be guided as to the plans, the building, and every detail; and when all was completed, though the total cost was over £15,000, I had a balance of £600 remaining. Still the applications from orphans increased far beyond our accommodation for 300. This brought me to my knees, and God brought me to see that I should provide for 700 orphans. I did so, and then built a third house, providing in all for 1150. About this time a report got abroad that I had £30,000 in hand. Many would have denied this in the papers, but I simply told my heavenly Father, who knew it was a lie of Satan's, and could see to it that the work should not suffer in consequence.

After all was paid for in connection with the building and furnishing of the three homes, I had nearly £2000 in hand. Still, with the accommodation increased to 1150 orphans, I had 900 applicants waiting. Again this brought me to my knees, and at length I said if the Lord wanted more orphans to be cared for by his help I would build two more houses, though to do this £60,000 would be needed. By that time I had become so acquainted with God that if £560,000 had been wanted I could trust Him for it. After six years the two houses, Nos. 4 and 5, were built, and, though they cost £60,000, I had £5000 in hand after they were paid for, and God's richest blessing has rested on the work. Thousands of the orphans are now in heaven, and thousands are on their way to heaven.

Do the Converts Stand?

THE following is the copy of a note recently received by Mr. C. Boardman, of Stratford:—

"Remembering the great interest you took in the mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, at Stratford, I thought the following might be of some interest, as you will doubtless remember it is twelve years since that event.

"In connection with our (Congregational) church there were sixty-seven converts of the mission who remained with us as members. During the twelve years twenty-seven have been taken from our books as having ceased to attend. I know, however, that some of these were and still are true Christians, but prefer to worship elsewhere. Three resigned, one of these, an active worker, is still living a holy life in active service. Ten are dead. Seven died fully prepared. Two I cannot call to mind. One for several years was an efficient Sunday-school teacher, then removed to a distance. Ten were transferred to other churches. Seventeen are with us to-day.

"So we may say that upwards of forty, at least, turned out to be good cases. If those taken under the care of other churches have turned out as well, it is, I think, ground for encouragement to go forward, with devout thankfulness to our Heavenly Father.

Possibilities of Sainthood.

By REV. SAMUEL PEARSON, M.A.
Of Broughton Park Church, Manchester.

IT is important to turn the mind away from the question of the possibility of sin to that of the possibility of holiness. The less of negation we have in our Christian life the better. The expulsive power of Christ's righteousness within the soul is beyond calculation; and the best way of escaping sin is to set our faces constantly toward the positions of holiness which have yet to be attained.

There are some controversies which ought to be avoided; because we can see at a glance that they will prove unprofitable; or because they concern themselves with questions which no man can answer. Whether persons can live for an hour, a day, a month, a year "without sin" in the sense in which that term is sometimes used, is a dreamy, metaphysical, and unending controversy into which the Scriptures do not enter. Why need we? Considering that it led some of the old mystics into most grievous immorality let us eschew it.

But it is one of the most hopeful signs of the Church's future victory that the possibility of a higher life has really dawned on a large number of minds; and that already so many new types of the spiritual life have been produced. It is this attitude that the leaders of the churches ought to welcome most heartily and seek to guide as wisely as they can. Christians are called to be saints; and we have yet to explore all that is meant by that old and Scriptural word. The New Testament "saints" were on earth, and we must be careful not to banish them in thought to heaven. They are here. We are surrounded and helped by them. And we find them to be much what the saints of the New Testament were, and sometimes much better. The imperfect Christians at Corinth were "sanctified in Christ Jesus and called to be saints" (1 Cor. 1, 2).

I. GOD IN CHRIST IS BOTH THE SOURCE AND THE IDEAL OF SAINTHOOD.

When our Lord told his disciples to be perfect as their Father in heaven was perfect (Matt. v. 48), He meant that there was no deficiency in God's love; that He loved us; and that we were to aim at the same all-comprehensive affection toward men of every class. The word perfect is one of those terms which does not permit of degrees, for a being is either perfect or imperfect; but the term used in the New Testament is one which refers to completeness of action, as in this case; or to maturity of character, as when Paul uses it (Phil. iii. 15). There is only One who is good. God is that One, and must remain ever far beyond all his creatures, who, whatever their goodness, are always capable of progress toward a goal of holiness which lies ever in the future. It is this ideal of absolute goodness whose contemplation is at once our joy and strength. And lest the vision should be too great for our mortal eyes Christ became one of us; God in the Person of his Son became incarnate. There are boundless studies possible for us, if we will continually look at the spirit in which Christ passed his time here on earth; and without vulgarising the incidents of his course, we shall find how wonderfully the influence of his character helps us to solve the ever-recurring difficulties of our own time.

For sainthood we need God. The gate of holiness is through the wounded flesh of Christ; sin must be atoned for, and it can only be atoned for by God Himself in the work of his own Son. The defeat of sin is at the cross; the horror of it is learned by us there; and pardon for it is received there. The perfect God provides a perfect sacrifice. But He does more, for He sends a Perfect Paraclete. The Holy Spirit moves on all hearts; He brings the forces of grace to those who look to Christ for redemption; and He is the perpetual presence of God to grant us that "power from on high" which we need to lead the heavenly life. Looking at our own inward tendencies, and at the outward temptations of life, we ask in despair, "Who then can be saved?" But our despair melts into a certain hope as we hear Christ's reply to our fears, "With God all things are possible." The possibilities of sainthood are in Him.

* From addresses given at Bethesda Chapel, Bristol.

II. THE SPHERE OF SAINTHOOD IS MAN.

When God made man He limited his own action, for He granted man the awful power of moral responsibility, the power to defy Himself. And not only so: man is finite, and what is true of the Infinite cannot be applied to the finite. Man at his very best can never in essence be perfect as God is, and we have therefore to be careful of our choice of terms. If we are not we lead men to expect what will never come, and there will probably be a sad reaction toward doubt, and even despair. Men have found that they could not be perfect in the sense they were led to expect; and they then gave up the search altogether, or turned away from Evangelical truth to the cold regions of Deism. Instances of this tendency have not been unknown in our own time. And they can in some measure be accounted for by the extravagant and exclusive way in which the Divine fulness has been spoken of, apart from the vessel which had to receive the influence. The same Saviour who said "With God all things are possible," also said "If it be possible."

Analogies, when wisely and soberly used, may help us. The babe is neither perfect in itself, nor in its relation to its own future. In health, function, mind, and beauty, all that we can hope is that it approaches an ideal. You cannot cut up its life into days, and say that on such a day it was perfect, for its very essence is that it is growing into another stage of existence. The babe is Paul's picture of an immature Christian. The "full-grown man" is his parable of the mature one, but in this stage the Christian is neither complete in himself, nor in his relation to his own future; for the essence of the child of God is that he is ever growing more and more like God. In contrast to illness, a man may wake up one morning and find himself so well, that as he breathes the air of spring he may exclaim, "I enjoy perfect health." Yet in relation to the future, he can but say this approximately, for he, too, will decay and die! The Bible takes for granted that we shall know something about man, and that we shall use our knowledge. Its truths are not intended for those who are to be made equal with God, nor for those who are superhuman, but for those who at their best belong to a finite, a fallen, and a temptable race.

There will be infinite types of sainthood; for God has many ways of fulfilling Himself in our sanctified natures, and it is by comparison and even competition that we at length shall find out which type comes nearest to the Perfect Man, the Only One.

But when any spiritual man wants to reach the ideal we hear the Bible ask him such questions as these:—(1) Are you sincere in your surrender of self to Christ? (2) Are you stretching out your faculties to their fullest extent that they may be used by Christ for the good of the world? (3) Are you seizing faithfully every opportunity for doing daily duty as a service for Christ? In other words, the will, self-culture, daily duty are some of the channels through which the Holy Spirit ordinarily moves to do his marvellous work in building up a character which shall stand the rough tests of this work-a-day world, and the severer ones which heaven's white light will bring to bear upon us when we find that nothing that defileth can enter the Celestial City.

Letters from Africa.—3.

REV. ANDREW MURRAY'S HOME.

JAN. 7.—I went from Capetown to Wellington, and spent New Year's Day with Rev. Andrew Murray and his family. The town is amidst mountains, which rise on either side during the whole journey. The variety and beauty of the lights and shadows as the sun was setting were beyond my powers of description. Mr. Murray's house is advantageously situated for quiet and restful thought; the verandah, upon which the sitting-rooms and study open, overlooks a field of vines, which a brook divides from the farm beyond.

The elegant institute in which the young ladies receive their education has a history. The whole was the gift of Mr. Goodnow, an American gentleman, who supplied the architect's plans, and sent the woodwork, prepared and fitted, from the United States. The ship foundered, and all was lost. But not many days after the whole was picked up on the beach, with the exception of the front of the gallery; it cost £50 less as salvage than the import duty would have been; and the wood was greatly improved by the submersion.

Mr. Murray preached on New Year's morning in Dutch. His son, who sat by me, kindly wrote for me the following résumé of the address. The text was 1 Peter i. 3-5, specially the words: "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation."

Our inheritance is preserved for us, and we for the inheritance: a double safe-keeping. A father preserves his inheritance for his children. This is not enough: they must be made fit to receive and appreciate the inheritance. God does both. This is the comfort given us in the text. The preservation is expressed in two ways—safe-keeping through the power of God on one side, through our faith on the other.

We know not what awaits us in this new year. But we know that whatever befalls, God is our Preserver. I must enter by faith into his almighty power of preservation. In the first place I speak of the safe-keeping from God's side. What must I think of his power? (1) It is unlimited. It is not confined to certain things in our life. An illustration used in Europe. I lend a man my watch. He allows it to be ruined, and returns it ruined internally, though the case may be unharmed. This is not preservation. God does not only wish to preserve us for heaven, but our lives, our tongues, our temper, our character. Do you think God only wishes to keep you safe from gross sin? God forbid.

(2) This safe keeping is all powerful. God's power keeps me all the day. God's unlimited power may be called upon at any moment to keep us. The son of a millionaire knows that he can draw on his father to an unlimited extent. Why is it, you ask, that you experience God's power so little in your life? (a) You don't expect it. (b) You will not give up your own attempts. God works only in those who declare themselves helpless. Oh that we may know and trust God as all powerful.

(3) God's power is secret. He works slowly and in secret. Compare the growth of an oak. God has patience. He will not force us. One lesson for me to learn—to be still before God and thus to learn to know God. "The people that know their God will be strong and do exploits" (Dan. xi. 32). One book to study—the heart of God. Personal intercourse is the school in which I learn to know God.

(4) This safe keeping is through faith. Faith has to do with the unseen. No faith is needed to know there is someone sitting next me. God lives in the darkness and is only seen by faith. With the heart, not the head, we believe unto righteousness. I want God to shine more clearly into my heart than the sun now shines into my face. God can and wills to do this. Soul, believe this—we must withdraw ourselves from the seen to know the unseen.

Faith is based upon surrender. In sitting down you trust the pew to support, you surrender yourself to the pew. Faith is an acknowledgment that someone else is willing to undertake for you. There must be surrender to God in a growing desire to know God better.

(5) Safe keeping is a continuous state in life. My heart may rest continuously in God. It must be the deep undercurrent of my life. "Praised be God who hath begotten us again." "Kept by the power of God." Let these words be engraved on your heart in the year to come. What anyone keeps he uses: know that God wishes to use you.

I hope to visit Wellington again when the students return after the Christmas vacation.

THE Y.M.C.A. AT CAPE TOWN.

flourishes under the able management of its genial secretary, Mr. W. G. Sprigg, nephew of Sir Gordon Sprigg, the Premier at the Cape.

At present his time is considerably occupied with the numerous young men who arrive from England, seeking employment. I am asked to say emphatically, that while the present state of excitement lasts, there is no opening for young men in South Africa. It is pitiful to see the number who are stranded here, some with little chance of employment at any time.

The effect of our Education Act has been to give the sons of working men the desire to take the next step higher, which they conceive to be into the counting-house; and foolish mothers instil into the minds of their boys the idea that they should get their living without taking their coats off. Consequently the sons of artisans become clerks, and with the addition of young ladies and Germans, the clerical ranks are filled to repletion. We should need another planet, or a treble trade in this one, to employ them all. "Let ours also learn to maintain good works—to profess honest trades for necessary uses—that they be not unfruitful" (Tit. iii. 14). "Let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." This apostolic counsel is wisdom which comes from God; and those who obey it will find themselves sought after, and will not long remain out of employment.

The straight talk to young men in the well-filled hall of the Y.M.C.A. on Sunday afternoon, from 4.15 to 5 sharp, is an admirable and successful institution. On the last Lord's Day of the old year Rev. David Russell, who is one of the live ministers here, took for his subject, "Playing the fool," and drew some valuable lessons from the history of King Saul; showing why, with many advantages, he failed disastrously; and urging young men to the obedience of faith—a course leading to opposite results. On the first Sunday of the new year, Rev. A. H. Hodges spoke from 1 Cor. xvi. 13, "Quit you like men," which he interpreted, "Play the man," and made it the occasion of a most useful and practical talk. Be industrious, be thorough, be faithful, be thrifty, cultivate self-respect, be a man of your word, read good books, above all read the Word of God, digest what you read, don't live spiritually on snacks. The importance of personal dealing with God was pressed home with good effect.

I refrain from saying anything about the complications consequent upon the rising at Johannesburg.

Midnight Meeting Movement.—The voluntary workers connected with this movement assembled at Exeter Hall last week to ask God's blessing on the Society during this year. Mr. Drysdale, a member of the committee, presided, and an excellent address was delivered by Rev. W. H. Dickinson, of Notting Hill, on the parable of the talents. Friends were present from Holloway, Brompton, Clapham, Whitechapel, Westminster, and Paddington, showing that the Society has supporters in all parts of the metropolis.

Social Purity.—A very impressive meeting was held by Mr. James B. Wookey, at the Lozells Mission Hall, Birmingham, on Sunday last. The theme of social purity was fearlessly, eloquently, and tactfully treated by the speaker. The large audience of men was evidently deeply moved by the appeal made to them to abstain from impurity of thought and life, and to realise what grievous wrong is done to the weaker sex, who suffer the shame and the misery, whilst the greater sinner, often escapes (in this world) the consequences of his wickedness.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

"HE GAVE HER THE UPPER SPRINGS AND THE NETHER SPRINGS."—Josh. xv. 19.

CALEB had conquered his giants, and so he was able to give his daughter an inheritance of land and springs of water. It was when Jesus had overcome the sharpness of death that He opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers: it was as He trampled under his victorious feet the principalities and powers of darkness that He gave to his Church the upper and the nether springs.

There are two departments in our life, which are closely related and yet one. We occupy the one in our contact with men and our work in the world; in our holy moments of meditation and prayer, the other. It is said of our Master, "Every day He was teaching in the Temple, and every night He went out and abode in the Mount of Olives." His sheep go out to their manifold activities, and come in to feed on the green pastures beside waters of rest. In each of these we stand in daily need of the springs, that are fed from the River which proceeds from the Throne of God, and which is an emblem of the Holy Ghost.

On the Lord's Day, in the House of God, or in private prayer, we climb the hills and stand on the margin of the upper springs that rise there; in the solemn hush we hear the murmur of their waters; on Monday we descend into the valley amid the clang of the battle and the cries of human need, but, thank God, plentiful springs are there also. Upper springs from the Mount of Transfiguration; nether springs for the Valley of Humiliation. Upper springs for the days of health and abounding activity; nether springs for days of depression, and pain, and death. Upper springs in praise, adoration, and rapture; nether springs for taking the yoke, bearing the burden, and drinking of his cup.

"AND THE CHILDREN OF JOSEPH TOOK THEIR INHERITANCE."—Josh. xvi. 4.

What a wonderful wealth of blessing these children of Joseph came into! There were the precious things of heaven, the dew, and the deep that couched beneath; the precious fruits of the sun and of the growth of the moons; the metals of the ancient mountains and the everlasting hills; the precious things of the earth, and the fulness thereof; and, above all, the goodwill of Him that dwelt in the bush (Deut. xxxiii. 13-16). Surely they were blessed with all manner of blessings, more than they had asked or thought! The rich gifts of God's grace! An inheritance which could not have been won by their prowess or arms, but was the free gift of God's love—to be taken and enjoyed!

These things happened to them as types: the spiritual counterparts of all are ours in Christ. He is precious—nay, priceless: there are exceeding great and precious promises. The blood by which we were redeemed is precious, has meanings not yet explored; the very trial of our faith is precious as the gold taken from the everlasting hills. How much preciousness there is for us who believe! (1 Pet. ii. 7, R.V.) But we are poor, and wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked, because we have not taken our inheritance.

We need to do more than ask for it. He that asketh may not rest satisfied till he receiveth. We must take by a faith, which claims, appropriates, employs. Open your heart to Christ, that He may cause you to receive and enjoy all his precious gifts; believe that you do receive; thank Him, and go on your way rejoicing, and attempting what you would have shrunk from, apart from His bestowment.

"THE HILL COUNTRY SHALL BE THINE."—Josh. xvii. 18.

The hills were steep, irregular, covered with forest. "These shall be yours," said Joshua to the children of Joseph, "you are a great people, and have great power; cut down the forest, terrace the slopes, turn their bare declivities into cornfields and vineyards, fill these vast untenanted spaces with life and song."

There is always room for us higher up. When the valleys are full of Canaanites, whose iron chariots withstand your progress, get up into the hills, occupy the upper spaces. If you can no longer work for God, pray for those who can. If you cannot move earth by your speech, you may move Heaven. If the development of life on the lower slopes is impossible, through limitations of service, the necessity of maintaining others, and such like restrictions, let it break out towards the unseen, the eternal, the divine.

Faith can fell forests. Even if the tribes had realised what treasures lay above them, they would hardly have dared to suppose it possible to rid the hills of their dense forest-growth. But as God indicated their task, He reminded them that they had power enough. The visions of things that seem impossible are presented to us, like these forest-covered steeps, not to mock us, but to incite us to spiritual exploits which would be impossible unless God had stored within us the great strength of his own Indwelling. Difficulty is sent to reveal to us what God can do in answer to the faith that prays and works. Are you straitened in the valleys? Get away to the hills, live there, get honey out of the rock, and wealth out of the terraced slopes now hidden by forest.

"JOSHUA CHARGED THEM THAT WENT TO DESCRIBE THE LAND."—Josh. xviii. 8.

In every age of the Church's story, God has sent forth men to walk through and describe the land of our spiritual inheritance. They have become dissatisfied with the low attainments of their brethren, and with great desire have followed the divine suggestions which pointed to a wider knowledge and enjoyment of the possibilities of Christian living. In the first ages, this was the work of men like Chrysostom and Augustine; in later ones, of the Reformers; in later ones still, of men whose names are still fresh in the memory of the Church.

But there is a sense in which all the experiences of life, all our walkings through the land of promise, all our discoveries of springs and valleys and far-stretching campaigns of territory, are not intended for ourselves alone, but for others. We are led by a certain path, that we may know how to direct a poor wanderer on his way. We are comforted, that we may be able to comfort those who are in any trouble. We are shown the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, that we may be able to unfold their joy and helpfulness to others.

The books which come to us from holy men who have traversed the land are of priceless value, like this Domesday book which Joshua prepared. But we who cannot write books should yet describe the land. "Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what He hath done for my soul." There is a divine warrant for experience meetings of the right sort, where the form is subordinate to the fresh and living Spirit.

THURSDAY, February 13.

"IN THE MIDST OF THEM."—Josh. xix. 49.

Since Joshua prefigures the Lord Jesus, we are led to think of His inheritance in the midst of his brethren.

In the midst on the cross. "They crucified Him, and with Him two others, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst." Forasmuch as we partook of flesh and blood, He shared the same; and since we were under the curse of a broken law, He also bowed beneath its weight, and was made a curse for us. He took the mid-current of pain; where the pressure was heaviest, there the Lamb of God bore the sin of the world. On Him God made to meet the iniquities of us all, alike of those who refuse, as did the one thief, and of those who accept, as did the other.

In the midst, in the gatherings of his people. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." He is the centre of unity. We come from different quarters with our peculiar pre-possessions and pre-conceptions, with no special affinity to each other, but touching Him, we become one with all who touch Him also. See that, not the sermon, not the supper, not the form of worship is the centre of fellowship, but Christ always and in all.

In the midst in heaven. "In the midst of the throne, and in the midst of the elders, a lamb standing." All the circles of the redeemed, of angels, and of all other beings, revolve around Jesus, as their common centre. They thus become concentric. Jesus is the Heart of Heaven; the Sun of Paradise; the Essence of its bliss; the Centre of its love; the innermost Soul of its life.

FRIDAY, February 14.

"AND FOR THE STRANGER THAT SOJOURNETH AMONG THEM."—Josh. xx. 9.

In this verse there is that great word "Whosoever." These cities of refuge were not for Hebrews only, but for whosoever had killed any person, without malice or forethought, but quite unintentionally, and had fled thither. Some poor Gentile might be sojourning among the chosen people, and suddenly find himself liable to the pursuit of the avenger of blood, but the gates of the refuge city were open to him, and the elders of the city were bound to give him a place that he might dwell among them (4), not only safely but in rest and peace.

Herein there was a foreshadowing of the days when God should open the door of faith unto the Gentiles. "For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same Lord is Lord of all, and is rich unto all them that call upon Him."

There were two mysteries unfolded to the Apostle Paul; one he unfolds in the Epistle to Ephesians, the other in the Epistle to Colossians. First, he teaches us that the Gentiles may be fellow-heirs and fellow-members of the body, and fellow-partakers of the promise of Christ through the Gospel. Next, he expatiates on the riches of the glory of this mystery, among the Gentiles, that the living Saviour is prepared to dwell in their hearts also, as the Hope of Glory. It is a serious question, how far we are participating in our inheritance. The gates of the promises made to Abraham and his seed are open for us to enter in and dwell there, but there is too much backwardness and hesitancy in us all. "Whosoever will, let him take."

SATURDAY, February 15.

"THERE FAILED NOT OUGHT OF ANY GOOD THING WHICH THE LORD HAD PROMISED."—Josh. xxi. 45.

Such will be our summary of our lives, as we review them from the land of the sunset. We shall see plenty of our own failures, shortcomings, and sins, and sadly acknowledge them. We shall see that our unbelief and disobedience have deprived us of the enjoyment of much that God intended for us. We shall see that whatever was lacking was in no wise due to Him, but to ourselves. The land of our inheritance had been all given us in Jesus, but we suffered the lack of much, because of our failure to enter in.

There may be long delays in the fulfilment of promise. But delays are not denials; and it is better to let the fruit ripen before you pluck it; wait till God drops it into your hand, it will be ever so much sweeter.

There may be enemies and obstacles. But they will give back, before the will of God, as the gates of night roll back before the touch of the dawn. Do not scheme, or fret, or be impatient, God is doing all to make thy life full of favour and blessing. Wait on Him, and keep his way, He will exalt thee to inherit the earth.

There may be ignorance and weakness. But God can deal with this also. Take to Him thine imperfect apprehension, thy faltering faith, He can make right what is wrong, and adjust thee to receive all He waits to give. Heaven will be full of wonder at the way in which God has kept his word, and done all that He had promised, and more.

"Put in Trust."

IT is a great thing to be trusted, and a greater thing to prove worthy of trust. The sentinel is put in trust to watch the camp day and night against surprise or sudden attack. The sailor on the out-look is placed in trust for the safety of the ship, to see that no other vessel comes too near, lest there be a collision. The engine-driver and guard of a train are in trust for the lives of the passengers, and have to watch the signals and see that all is right. The men of the lighthouse have to look after the lights, and see that they are kept bright and burning, lest harm or accident should come to those out upon the sea. We are all trusted to do certain duties.

When a child is sent on an errand he is in trust; when told to buy something and bring back the change, how careful he has to be over the money. Mothers sometimes trust the baby to an elder child to take care of when asleep or awake. Such confidence should always awaken honour and fidelity.

It is very beautiful for a father or mother to be able to say, "I can always trust my boy or girl; even when my back is turned I know that they will be faithful to the charge I give." A gentleman said once to the master of a British school, "I want a lad I can trust. If I leave money with him, I want to feel it's safe, and when I am away I must have confidence in him. I want a boy whose word I can always rely on." The master recommended a lad he could trust with anything. The gentleman took him, and found him to be worthy of all confidence in word and deed; and though the gentleman has passed away, the lad, grown to manhood, is respected by all in his house of business, in which he has risen to a place of honour and responsibility.

In contrast to that lad there was once a boy at boarding-school who was made treasurer of the school cricket club; he kept an account of the money received and spent. The lad did not know much about business matters, and put all the club money away in a purse with his own pocket-money that he kept in his school locker. One day towards the end of the term a new cricket-ball was wanted. The captain asked the treasurer if there was money enough to buy a new ball. The boy looked at the accounts, and saw there was enough for the ball, with a little over. He then went to his purse, and found, to his great consternation, that he had not, by a few pence, the sum necessary for the ball. He could not tell how this was, but supposed that he must carelessly have spent some of the cricket cash, thinking it to belong to him, without any intention of doing wrong. His shame and sorrow were very great; he did not know what to do. He felt himself to be a thief, and to have betrayed the trust reposed in him. He had to borrow the extra money for the ball, and wrote home to his father making a full confession of his carelessness, and begged for stamps to be sent to make up the deficiency, asking that his pocket-money might be stopped till the debt was paid. His father wrote him a wise, kind letter, accepting the boy's penitence, and urging that this should be a lesson for life, and in future never to touch any money entrusted to him, but always to keep it separate and sacred. The boy did learn a lesson, and the disgrace of that one act taught him to be most careful of all things left in his trust.

It is a great honour and privilege to be put in trust by people we know; but it is a far greater blessing to be trusted by God. He places many gifts and treasures in our keeping. He gives to each of us something to use for Him. Anything God gives us is precious, but God has given to us his very best gift, the knowledge of his love in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Paul, in writing a letter to some friends living in a town now called Salonica, said, "We were allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel," or, as the new version of 1 Thess. ii. 4 gives it, "We have been approved of God to be entrusted with the Gospel," in order to make it known. God commits to us his Word, that we all may obey it and tell it to those who have not heard it. Since God has been so good as to put us in trust of so great a treasure, may we be as faithful to it as to our mother's last word, and honour it as soldiers do their flag, and guard it as a king would his crown.

The Dog and His Muzzle.

I DON'T know if it is so in your neighbourhood, but where I live all the dogs have to wear muzzles when they go out. This rule was made on New Year's Day, and the poor doggies have had anything but a "Happy New Year" in consequence.

I saw a pretty collie on Saturday, such a big shaggy fellow, out for a walk with his young master; and every few steps he would stop and rub his nose with his paws to try and get the muzzle off; but he only made his face very dirty, and worried himself for nothing, because the muzzle was so firmly fastened on.

There was another dog, a terrier, coming behind him, looking as perky and as happy as could be, with his little tail high in the air. He seemed to regard his muzzle as a necessary evil, and thought about it as little as possible, and so enjoyed his walk.

I thought how much that is like some of us boys and girls and grown up people. Sometimes we have to obey rules which seem to us "such a bother!" But they are generally made for a wise purpose, to keep us out of some kind of mischief. Let us try and obey them cheerfully, then they won't seem half so hard as if we fret and squirm and cry. What queer faces some children get with tears and dirt! And yet I am sure you are much happier when you are contented and bright. So think of the doggie, and whatever your "muzzle" may be, make the best of it, and wear it as bravely as you can, to please your parents, and, above all, for Jesus' sake.

Here is a letter from a little boy in Canada:—

DEAR UNCLE TOM,—I have much pleasure in reading the "Children's Column" in THE CHRISTIAN. My aunt goes to the Orphan's Home in Kingston, and I go with her. I read them your page among other things, and they enjoy it, I am sure; at least, they pay great attention. I think, perhaps, that they would write your questions. I have been out shovelling the snow to-day; it is great fun. Now I will stop.—Remaining, your little friend,

About Prizes.

On March 26 there will be special "Bible Searcher" Questions, for which prizes will be given. But only those boys and girls will be allowed to compete whose names have appeared in the lists as "correct" nine times during the twelve preceding weeks.

Those who have joined too late, or have been unsuccessful too many times, to make up nine "correct" weeks by that date, must wait till the next Prize Questions, of which I shall tell you in good time. But you see how important it is for you to send "correct" answers every week if possible, so that you may be able to compete for the prizes when they are offered.

UNCLE TOM.

A Queer Creature.

"I AM going to tell you," said papa, "about an animal that sees without eyes, hears without ears, eats without tongue or teeth, and walks without feet."

"Oh, papa, you are making fun," cried George.

"No, here it is," he replied, and he pointed to what looked like a bright coloured flower growing just under the water. It had a thick stem and a crown of beautiful pink leaves.

"But that is a flower!" exclaimed mamma.

"Do you think so?" said papa. "Can a flower be afraid?" He touched the thing, and in a minute all the long leaves had curled up, and it looked like an ugly knob. The children watched, and presently it uncurled again, the stem swelled, and it was a wide-open flower.

"Can a flower eat?" asked papa. "Look here!" He caught a little shrimp and dropped it just over the pink leaves, or tendrils, and—would you believe it?—they snatched the shrimp and sucked it down into the middle, where papa said it would be digested.

"You see, this animal, which is called a sea-anemone, has no eyes nor ears, but it saw and heard the shrimp coming; no tongue nor teeth, but it has eaten up Sir Shrimp; no feet, but when it pleases it can get off the rock, to which it seems to be fastened, go off to another, and fasten itself there. Now let us remember that God has filled the earth and sky and sea with marvels like this, and greater than this. We can look up to Him and say, 'O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast Thou made them all.'"—Selected.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTANIA.

WARFARE AND FAMINE.

WE have first two pairs of Psalms: Ps. cxliv., xxxiii., and xx., xxi., which give us a premonition of the expected war; they place it in plain connection with the famine, and give the key to the subjects treated in Ps. xviii. and 2 Sam. xxii., namely, the granting of David's prayer and his deliverance.

In Psalm cxliv. we have David's prayer against "the sons of the stranger," i.e. the Philistines; the only tribe which had broken their oath of allegiance (8)—an oath sealed with clasped hands (comp. 2 Kings x. 15). The Psalm, which alludes to the deliverance from Ishbi-benob's "hurtful sword" (10) in the first year's war with the Philistines (2 Sam. xxii. 16), may probably have been written in expectation of the war in the third year, when Goliath the Gittite appeared (2 Sam. xxi. 19). There is evident reference to this in the heading of the Psalms in the Septuagint "Against Goliath." This of course, refers to Goliath the Second, also called Lahmi. David prays to God to intervene by means of an earthquake and lightning (5, 6); he refers to his weakness (4. "David waxed faint," 2 Sam. xxi. 15); he concludes with a prayer for a good harvest because of the famine (13, 14. comp. Psa. xxxiii. 19), and for deliverance from defeat.*

PSALM CXLIV.

A Psalm of David.

1.

2. Blessed be Jehovah my rock,
Which teaches my hands to war, my fingers to fight.
2. My lovingkindness and my fortress, my high tower and my deliverer,
My shield and He in whom I trust,
Who subdues my people under me.

3. Jehovah, what is man, that Thou takest knowledge of him?
The son of man, that Thou makest account of him.

4. Man is like to a breath,
His days are as a shadow passing away.

2.

5. Jehovah, bow thy heavens and come down,
Touch the mountains, and they shall smoke.
6. Cast forth lightning and scatter them,
Send out thine arrows and discomfit them.
7. Stretch forth thine hand from above!
Rescue me and deliver me out of great waters,
From the hand of the sons of the stranger.

8. Whose mouth speaks falsehood,
And their right hand is a right hand of lies.

3.

9. I will sing a new song unto Thee, O God,
On a ten-stringed psaltery will I sing praises to Thee.
10. It is He that giveth salvation unto kings,
He that rescueth David his servant
From the hurtful sword.
11. Rescue me, and deliver me,
From the hand of the sons of the stranger.
12. Whose mouth speaks falsehood,
And their right hand is a right hand of lies.

4.

12. So that our sons may be as plants grown tall in their youth,
Our daughters as corner stones hewn after the fashion of a palace.
13. Our garners full, affording all manner of store,
Our sheep bringing forth thousands and tens of thousands.
14. In our fields our kine abundant in increase.

* Maclaren has in a very graphic manner summarized the result of the former impressions of Psalm cxliv., in the following words:—"The force of compilation could not farther go than in this psalm, which is, in the first eleven verses, a rechauffé of known psalms, and in vv. 12-15 is most probably an extract from an unknown one of a later date. The junctions are not effected with much skill, and the last is tacked on very awkwardly. The seam is clumsy." It is hoped that the freeing of this psalm from traditional misapprehension will be welcome, and that then it will repay careful study by throwing light on an entire group of psalms.

- No breach and no sally,
And no outcry in our streets!
15. Happy the people that is in such a case!
Happy the people, whose God is Jehovah!

(1) In the midst of the great distress caused by the war, from which David only sees deliverance through God's immediate intervention, the Psalmist has recourse to the praise of Jehovah, who has made him an accomplished and experienced warrior. Everything necessary for belonging to warfare Jehovah is personally to him: fortress and high tower, deliverer and shield; but above everything else, he calls Him "My rock and my lovingkindness," in whom he trusts, and who subdues his people under him.*

In spite of his confident recourse to God as the "Praised One" (1), and in spite of all his great qualities as a warrior, David is constrained to speak the touching words which refer to the mortality of man (3, 4), his likeness to vanity, and his days passing as a shadow. All this will be fully understood when we remember that David had "waxed faint" (2 Sam. xxi. 15). His martial strength was broken, which induced his soldiers to beg him not to take part personally in the battle, that the "lamp of Israel" be not quenched.

(2) All the more does David in this his utmost need require personal and distinct assistance. He therefore prays that God will come to his aid in the approaching battle by sending an earthquake and lightning, in order that he may be saved from the deluging inrush of the false, oath-breaking Philistines, reference to whom, by the name of "the sons of the stranger" (5-8), might be understood by every man in Israel.

(3) In the conviction that God will strike a last decisive blow against them, David will sing a new song on the ten-stringed lute to the God to whom kings owe their salvation, and who has saved him, his servant, from Ishbi-benob's "hurtful sword," a weapon newly fashioned, in order, at one stroke, to slay David (2 Sam. xxi. 16). To Him he again repeats his cry for help against the Philistine (9-11).

(4) By such assistance Israel will derive temporal blessings, and succour from the miseries of war. The whole representation will be immediately understood and acknowledged as an integral part of the poem, on reading Deuteronomy xxviii., where the destruction of Israel by means of war is depicted by Moses as a consequence of Israel's apostasy. Instead of that with which the people are threatened (Deut. xxviii. 32), "thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people," David prays that there may grow up strong sons and fair daughters. Instead of the fruits of the land and all labour being eaten up by strangers (Deut. xxviii. 33), there shall be given garners full of all manner of store—the blessing so sorely needed during the famine. Instead of a strange nation eating "the fruits of thy cattle" so that Israel should not be left, "the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep" (Deut. xxviii. 51), there shall be plenteous increase of sheep and cattle. Moreover, instead of a strange people besieging Israel in all its gates, to the destruction of its walls and defences (Deut. xxviii. 52), Peretz (breach or defeat, the word so well known from the Philistine war in Baal-Perazim, 2 Sam. v. 20), shall as little strike Israel as sally or captivity and cries of terror from the assaulted in the streets. Should not such gracious assistance be granted the people who call Jehovah their God? How would not this fresh picture of plenty and succour take the people by storm, and cause them to pray with the king in the language of Psalm cxliv.?

(To be concluded.)

* As it is not to be supposed that David would have used the words, "subdue under me" with reference to Israel, it is probable that here "my people" alludes to the subjugated Philistines, whom David still calls "my people," although they are rebellious. He also means the same by the sudden introduction of the word "them" in verse 6.

For the Sake of the Name.—2.

I WOULD ask the reader to leave the little room and its band of workers, where together we have had a glimpse of the possibilities that open to those who, while toiling for their daily bread, yet find time to minister to hungry ones the living bread, and to come with me to a street hard by, filled with tall factories and warehouses. It is mid-day—the dinner hour—and outside every building are small groups of men, smoking, reading, and chatting together, lounging away the time till the whistle disperses them to their several works. We will enter one of the buildings, and climb the rickety stairs till we reach the top floor. Here is the women's department, and just now they are busy with their dinner. Inside the room we are greeted by a regular hubbub of voices, mingled with a clatter of knives and plates, and by a strong smell of cooking. About sixty girls and women are present, some of them, in clusters of twos and threes, are seated on bales of goods, eating their lunch in thorough picnic style. Two are stretched full length on the floor fast asleep. Three or four are combining dinner and work by having the former beside them, while they get a little extra work done in the intervals. It is piece work, and the pay is poor, so that the trifle thus gained is only too acceptable. Wrong of course it is, and illegal. Bad, too, for their health, for the constant grind in that hot stuffy room hour after hour will only mean in the long run a breakdown in some way for several of them. But you cannot make them see it. The present, the present, not the future, is so much in the lives of those who live from hand to mouth.

We sit down amongst them, waiting for our guide, the Christian foreman who has allowed us to come with him. He is going to speak to them. Every week for a few minutes he comes in to hold this short service among the girls. Willingly and joyfully he gives up the precious minutes of his mid-day hour to bring, if he only can, joy and peace to some dark soul. There is no platform, no hymn, no formal introduction; the audience pay little heed to us, and the hum of talk goes on. Then our friend, who is himself a plain working-man, not specially eloquent, but very decidedly in earnest, stands up in the middle of the floor and begins to speak.

The burden of what he says lies in the question, "To what end was I born?" "What are you doing with life, sisters, what are you making of it? Is it a play or a jest, a thing to be just breathed out, or is it something serious, awful, full of responsibilities? Oh, not to fritter it away, not to flutter round its surface a mere giddy moth, but to heed the One who seeks to save you and raise you to a life of peace, and joy, and righteousness. Will you not let Him do so?" So he pleads in some such words as these, and gradually the hum of voices is hushed and there is almost silence in the room. One girl at the far end sits with face buried in her hands, another has turned round from her dinner and is drinking in every word uttered. For a brief ten minutes the address lasts, then the honest, kind voice of the speaker is drowned by the shrill screech of the whistle from below, and, with a hasty prayer that God may bless the spoken words, the little talk is over. The girls wake up from the curious spell under which some of them seem to have fallen, and busy themselves with their work, and our guide beckons us to follow him out of the room.

A dinner hour talk by a working man. That is all on the outside, but in its "inwardness" who can say that it may not have been a work for eternity.

(To be concluded.)

ISABEL M. M. KENWARD.

South Africa General Mission.—At a meeting held in connection with this mission at the school-rooms of Trinity Church, Finchley-road, Mr. Mercer, the secretary, received an offer of £20 a year to the funds of the mission if three others would be willing to contribute a like sum.

Rev. Ernest A. B. Sanders, Rector of Whitechapel.

THE popular ideal of a clergyman is one that most people do not expect to see manifested in the flesh. It is right that the standard should be high, but the combination of intellectual, moral, and spiritual qualities, in such well-balanced proportions that the possessor stands out conspicuously in the high degree of success attending all parts of his work, is of rare occurrence.

It is in some such comprehensive way that the rector of Whitechapel should be regarded. The neighbourhood bears a name which is a constant by-word of reproach against England. Yet here is to be found, in connection with the parish church, one of the most perfect organisations for Christian effort. In addition to the open wickedness of a large part of the population, there is an immense foreign contingent of people who know nothing of real Christianity and cannot speak English. The large-hearted rector regards these also as his charge, and has provided machinery and obtained workers capable of dealing with the requirements of all in the parish. It may be well to say a few words about this energetic personality.

Rev. Ernest A. B. Sanders is the son of Mr. Frederick Sanders, of the firm Woolley, Sanders and Co., of Wood-street, and was educated at Highgate School, whence he proceeded to Worcester College, Oxford. He spent a year at Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, under Canon Girdlestone. At ordination he accepted the curacy of St. John's, Upper Holloway, under Rev. W. H. Dearden, and soon afterwards married Jane, third daughter of the late Mr. J. Graves Biggs, of Dallington, Sussex.

In 1884 Mr. Sanders was appointed diocesan home missionary in charge of the new district of All Saints, Holloway, and vicar in the following year. It was here that the attractiveness of the faithful preaching of Evangelical truth in a simple and direct form drew many to his ministry, and the charm of his personality soon turned his hearers into friends. There is a power in his quiet kindliness which makes one feel able to go to him, without hesitancy, upon any matter. This ministry and personal intercourse are rendered more effective by his broad sympathy and tolerant views, which are held and expressed without giving any idea of laxity, or the relinquishment of any essential principle, while the Gospel of the Lord Jesus is proclaimed in all its fulness. The people recognise in him a humanity broad and deep, and say, "He thinks and feels as a layman. He is one of ourselves." At All Saints Mr. Sanders displayed those business qualities that are requisite for the making of a new parish, and the inevitable building operations which ensue. The permanent church was built and endowed, also the vicarage. The parochial organisation was fully completed upon a basis suitable to present-day requirements. Mr. Sanders believes in getting everyone to work, and in having a church council so constituted that every worker is encouraged to take a deep interest in all its affairs. When he left, after four and a-half years' effort, the communicants' roll numbered over 600.

Such a man could not be hid, and in 1891 the Bishop of London appointed Mr. Sanders rector of Whitechapel as successor to Rev. A. J. Robinson, who took the place of Canon Cadman in the rectory of Holy Trinity, Marylebone. The new sphere of work afforded full scope for all his powers. The great poverty of the people makes it necessary that most of the money required should come from outside. Over £3000 per annum is required to carry on the mission work of this unique parish, and the "annual record of work done" in it is a wonderful demonstration of what can be accomplished under great difficulties. The indifferent life of so many of the people, and the large foreign population, chiefly Jewish, require robust faith and a determined Christian spirit to prosecute successful work among them.

It is impossible even to enumerate the various forms of activity in which the 240 church workers are engaged. The local conditions under which the temperance work, the Lodging-House Mission, the Church Army Labour Home, the Home for Working Girls, the Home for Christian Workers, the Boys' Brigade and Clubs, the work at the mission church of St. Barnabas, which Mr. Sanders has built, etc., etc., are carried on, have much of interest. Mr. Sanders has taken hold of the working man question with resolution and success. The work carried on among Jewish parishioners is also very remarkable. Another way in which the Church goes to the people in Whitechapel is in open-air services. Upon every night in the week except Thursday, when the service is held in the church, the Banner of the Cross is unfurled to both Jew and Gentile, while on Sunday two other open-air services are held in Buck's-row and Charlotte-street.

It must not be supposed that reference has been made to all of the work carried on by that wonderful group of workers, so well handled. More than half cannot be told, but here, as in the case of other energetic churches, many ardent spirits go forth to carry the Gospel into the regions beyond. Since 1888 fifteen have gone to China, Japan, India, Kashmir, Uganda, etc., and two ladies are now waiting to go to China.

Mr. Sanders has now accepted the parish of St. Mark's, Dalston, but will remain in his old parish until the end of March. We hope that similar success will attend his labours in Dalston.

Birmingham.—An effort on behalf of the young women employed in the theatres of this city was made last week by Mr. Wm. Forbes. Some forty or fifty were present at a social meeting in the Temperance Institute, when various friends gave suitable addresses.

Rev. J. McNeill in Leeds.

A WORK of great importance and far-reaching in its results has been going on during the last three weeks in the Coliseum of Leeds. There has stood day by day that stalwart man of God, John McNeill, preaching with fire and earnestness. Viewed from the platform, the audience have presented a sight never to be forgotten. How the preacher moved and swayed the mighty crowd, composed principally of men; how his wonderful tact and knowledge of human nature, with a quaint and charming humour, have been used the more forcibly to send home to the hearts of his hearers truths that will change the lives of hundreds and bear rich fruit to the glory of God.

The midday meetings for business-men, with more than a thousand men, all intently listening, have furnished the strongest testimony to the power which God has wielded through the preacher. He has touched the homes of many in Leeds and district, bringing peace and joy where formerly was discord. How the preacher has made the Bible stories to live before his hearers. To the self-righteous or careless Christians he has cried aloud in tones that spare not, and which must burn into the soul. How gently he has pleaded in Christ's name with those who do not know the love of God in Christ, while those who are timid and full of self-upbraidings have been lifted out of themselves and filled with rejoicing. Such is the testimony given by many.

The scene on the last evening of the mission was a remarkable one. Every part of the huge building was packed to its utmost capacity, while outside stood a crowd of disappointed people. On the platform and orchestra were a large number of ministers of all evangelical sections of the Church of Christ. Rev. David Allison, vicar of St. James', Leeds, spoke telling and appropriate words. Professor Banks, of the Wesleyan College, also spoke; saying that only one feeling animated their heart, that of thankfulness and praise to God for the blessing He had given to the mission in Leeds. Similar sentiments were expressed by Rev. A. E. Greening, Baptist minister, and Mr. Robert Slade. The most telling and touching testimony as to the blessing the mission had been in Leeds was given by Mr. William Beckworth, chairman of the mission committee. Mr. McNeill expressed his gratitude to all who had helped him in his efforts for Christ during the mission.

And so this wonderful mission of three weeks' duration has closed. Many blessings from souls that were weary and well-nigh hopeless follow Mr. McNeill to his work for Christ in Sheffield.

Church Association Vans.

At the monthly prayer meeting of the Church Association, held on Monday in the library of the society, Mr. C. J. Brooks, colporteur in charge of the society, Mr. C. J. Brooks, gave an account of his work in the eastern counties—mainly in Norfolk and Essex. The day's work begins usually about 6.30 a.m., with cleaning up and driving to the village planned for the day. Arrived there, he seeks, as a rule, the clergyman of the parish, in order to gain his sympathy—alas! the effort is often fruitless; for many who themselves are Low Church are unwilling to identify themselves with the C.A. Van, lest they give offence to High Churchmen. This, however, does not daunt these earnest workers. Pitching on the green or some convenient spot, a meeting is called for the evening, when goodly numbers of the villagers usually assemble, and generally hear the Word gladly. Various incidents were given by the speaker in which sinners were converted, and those who had been led away by ritualism were brought to see the dangers thereof, and to return to the simple faith of the Gospel. He maintained that a valuable work is being done, not only by this particular van, but by all the eleven vans sent out by the Church Association. Trials and difficulties there certainly are, but the encouragements have been very manifest. Both in the way of counteracting sacerdotal teaching, and in the direct proclamation of the Gospel, these van itinerations in out-of-the-way villages and hamlets are being greatly blessed of God.

LONDON POVERTY.

Common Lodging Houses.

HITHERTO the present series of sketches have dwelt with the home-dwelling poor, those who, terrible as their straits may have been, have so far contrived to keep a roof over their head, to retain one little room they call home. Further it may seem impossible to sink, but there are depths beyond. Driven by drink or misfortune, men and women lose at last the little all, to which they so tenaciously cling, and are compelled to hide in those last sad refuges of despair, the common lodging-houses; or to tramp the streets seeking some friendly arch, doorway, or unhitched wagon, some vacant seat on the Embankment or in the parks; wherever, in fact, they can hope to secure shelter from the wind and an hour or two's rest, unless disturbed by the constable's imperious "Move on."

Common lodging-houses—taking the most ordinary class "fourpenny kips"—are to be found in all corners of London. I have visited houses as far apart as Kentish Town and Croydon, Shepherd's Bush and Stratford, but the largest, and those I know best, are in Spitalfields, Ratcliff Highway, St. Giles', Westminster, Southwark, and Lambeth. In a limited area, almost under the shadow of the historic Abbey, there are thirty-five common lodging-houses; in Spitalfields parish there are forty-seven; hence the sum total must be large indeed. Some houses are for men only, others for women, a few are for couples, while some seem to be specially affected by lads.

The interior aspect varies remarkably; some are airy, well-built, designed expressly for their purpose; others (the majority, I believe) are simply old ruinous buildings, ill-adapted for their present use. In the way of cleanliness and ventilation, the most of them leave much to be desired, though the improvement, in this respect, in recent years is very marked. Comfort and privacy there is none. Those who are compelled to resort thither must be content with the company they find—mostly foul-mouthed, unwashed, noisy and quarrelsome. Much depends on the character of the deputy; but at the best this is not an enviable post, and for the most part the deputy is content so long as his lodgers pay their coppers and do not become sufficiently uproarious to attract the attention of the police. As to the inmates, it is one of the to stand in a crowded kitchen and watch the hopeless, forsaken, care-for-nothing faces of the men who, amid clouds of vile smoke, throng the tables, lounge on the forms, or struggle round the great fire, cooking scraps of food, picked up somehow and somewhere. For this quiet observation I have found leisure, while those with whom I entered were conducting a Gospel service—for in many districts there are now bands of daring Gospellers who, facing the risks, have won an entrance into such places.

One who has had sad experience of common kitchens declares that not more than 5 per cent. of the inmates are in regular employment. The rest includes street hawkers, petty thieves, crossing sweepers, street musicians and artists, market loafers, railway-station hangers-on, begging-letter writers, "glimmers" (who watch to open or close cab doors), cab-runners, public-house touts and beggars, and a vast army of tramps and casuals, who pick up a trifle somewhere and somehow. The "dossers," as the inmates are termed, have many of them known no other life; but some have been once decent, respectable men; while every here and there one lights upon who once stood high in society. I have myself met and conversed with a clergyman, an ex-cavalry captain, several doctors, and lawyers, who have sunk into this awful existence through intemperance. It has been estimated that 95 per cent. of the inmates have fallen through strong drink. Nor have the dreadful results of the vice cured them—far from it. Generally they are ready for anything to get liquor. Their enemy is their master. They know it perfectly, but are helpless slaves to their appetite. Hence in these common kitchens are to be found the most dangerous class in the metropolis. They have nothing to lose; they cannot sink more deeply. They will play the meanest tricks on any unfortunate who comes among them. If he has a copper or two, a decent shirt or boots, he will be robbed remorselessly, unless he is very wide awake. Moral or social restraint there is none, only the strong hand of law, and that happily they instinctively dread.

But, apart from such men, one finds in every lodging-house a number of lads, and again and again one asks what brings these boys to such places, surely the

for lads. The answer is that many of them are simply homeless, friendless boys, who are either unsuitable for the Homes for Working Boys—Homes which rescue many from this sad life—or care not to avail themselves of such homes, dreading dimly the thought of discipline. Many would not do well if they had a chance, but others have been decent lads from the country, who, coming up to find work, have been unfortunate, and being too proud to communicate with their friends, have drifted hopelessly into these horrible haunts. But, in addition, one is astonished to find that not a few have parents who have turned them out to do the best they could, owing to the crowded state of the little room called "home." Surely, poor as the parents may be, they cannot know the life to which they send their boy, or the company he is compelled to keep.

So far I have spoken mainly of men's lodging-houses, but there are many for women; and verily these are saddest and most repulsive of all. It is to go in and out of the female houses in St. Giles', Westminster, or Spitalfields, to see the class of women who resort thither, and hear the way they talk. Most of them are lost to shame, and have forgotten their womanhood, but, alas! every now and then one comes upon a decent girl—usually a servant out of place—who has come in for cheapness' sake, and at first is horror-stricken at what she sees and hears. All the workers with whom I have gone from house to house keep their eyes open to such cases, and whatever it may have been some time ago, it is now the girl's own fault if she remains in the house.

If this rescue of such unwitting inmates were the only good results of lodging-house work, it is well worth doing; but it is far from exhausting the usefulness of such forbidding service. I know many, once inmates of common kitchens, now leading Christian and respectable lives through the coming of the messengers of mercy. Difficult as the work seems, hopeless as the inmates appear, many have heard and heeded the Word of Grace

But again, others working in diverse ways are doing much good. The Victoria Homes for Working Men in Whitechapel and Spitalfields provide a decent home for hundreds, and have been blessed to many. Lord Rowton, who is opening this week a second house, has done good service in his first model lodging-house by giving thousands a tolerable home and inculcating cleanliness and decency. In the same way the County Council house in Parker-street has been of great service. Along these lines, as well as in the way of direct Gospel effort, much valuable work has been done, but the field is vast, and among the tens of thousands who, in London alone, find shelter in the common kitchens, there is room and work for many more devoted and daring servants of Christ, who, like their Master, will give themselves to seeking and saving the lost.

Children's Ministry.

L.—CHRIST AND THE CHILDREN.

By REV. R. LEITCH.

Little Children.—Matt. xix. 13.

CHILDREN occupy a large place in the Bible. God has much to tell us in its holy pages in reference to them. He is the God of the children. He told his ancient people Israel that they were to teach his commandments and statutes to their children. He gave them some minute directions regarding the training of the young; and when the Great Teacher appeared in human form in the "fulness of the time," Childhood arrested his attention, evoked his sympathy, and afforded material for some of his most sublime and significant utterances.

Jesus made use of the simplicity, innocence, helplessness, and humility of little children to illustrate and enforce certain great moral and religious truths. One of the tenderest and sweetest names that He applied to his own disciples was that of "LITTLE CHILDREN." On one occasion we read of his having taken a little child, and having placed him in the midst of his disciples, telling them to take a pattern from him; and assuring them that the Christian life was, in a certain sense, a return to a state of childhood. Yes, and those very arms, that "for us men and for our salvation," were distended on the cruel cross, took up little children and folded them to his loving and sympathetic bosom.

Christ was, indeed, the Children's Friend. Their childish looks, and speech, and ways touched his large and feeling heart. The climax of the pathos in his lament over Jerusalem is reached when, after speaking of the fate of the city, He adds: "And thy children within thee." The hosannas of the little ones in the Temple were sweetest music to his ear; and when he would comfort his disciples in the hour of their sorrow, in view of his death, He borrows an illustration from children deprived of their earthly parents, and says: "I will not leave you comfortless"—literally "orphans." In fact, one feels as if there would have been something incomplete, something wanting in the life of Christ, if in that biography no mention had been made of the way in which He regarded and treated little children.

Though little is said in the Holy Scriptures about the childhood of Jesus Himself, yet we know that He passed through the stages of infancy and childhood, as "the man Christ Jesus." "The Child grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him." The child grew. His was a healthy and natural development—body, mind, and soul gradually expanding into manhood, like the sapling into the full-grown tree. Christ knew experimentally what it meant to pass through childhood's days and childhood's experiences.

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy," and whilst the earthly teacher says to the child, "Be a man," the Heavenly Teacher says to the man, "Be a child." "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven."

THE EVANGELIST.

Plucked from the Burning.

A TRUE STORY.

MY father was a very good sort of man, and looked up to as an earnest Christian; he was an office-bearer and local preacher among "the people called Methodists." He was esteemed in the little town where we lived as a most honourable and upright man in all his business and other transactions.

But I could never understand why he, an out-and-out Methodist, and a very zealous worker among them, should have educated me for the ministry of the then Established Church of Ireland. As the sequel will show, it was fraught with disappointment and disaster. I did not at the outset understand all that it involved.

I went to school, and in due time matriculated in Trinity College, Dublin. I passed all my examinations with credit; they were proud of me at home, but a crisis they little dreamed of was rapidly approaching; nor had I myself the least suspicion of what was at hand. I only thought the die would soon be cast, and for good or for evil I would take my place as an accredited minister, fully qualified to take the cure of souls.

I did not yet realise what I was about. I only felt I was obeying a good father, who, I thought, had my welfare at heart. At last the day came, when I presented myself for private conference and examination before my worthy bishop. That day I shall never forget, or at any rate one very memorable incident in it, that really proved to be a crisis point for evil in the whole of my after life.

It happened in this way: I was asked for the first time, "Do you trust that you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost, to take upon you this office and administration, to serve God for the promoting of his glory, and the edifying of his people?" My heart, my conscience, my manhood were all aroused, and I dare not reply, as I was expected to do, in the affirmative, and say, "I trust so." For me this I felt so I honestly gave the reply, the only one really possible to my then state of mind, and said, "No, I do not feel moved by the Holy Ghost." It was my father moved me to this office and work."

I pass by all the arguments and entreaties then employed to get me to look differently on this question. However, I was firm, and dared not yield. Indeed, I could not without doing violence to my sense of righteousness and truth. The whole process then and there proved a very rude shock, and for me a terrible awakening. I returned, a broken-down, dispirited man, to my home, dreading above all things a meeting with my poor disappointed father, for I suspected the shock would be greater and more keenly taken to heart by him than even by me.

I now pass over all the incidents in that very painful episode of my early history, only to remark that my father at once ordered me into his workshop to learn the carpentering business, and I went with the same unquestioning obedience that hitherto marked all my relations with him.

Here I came into associations that turned out to be anything but improving to me.

I soon learned to drink and keep very low company. Things went from bad to worse with me. I got completely on the "down grade," and to make matters worse and far more difficult of any prospect of future improvement, I married, from mere impulse, one in every way most unsuitable. Together we led an awful life, she stolidly indifferent, I completely given over to the power of my contracted craving for strong drink. Now I had to live in a very miserable one-storey cottage, with an earthen damp floor. Here I frequently beat my poor wife, often threatening her very life. All self-respect was dead and buried. I was forsaken by my best friends, and felt that lower I could not sink, except indeed I dropped into the abode of the lost, which at times I thought was more than likely, as my drunken sprees were of every-day occurrence.

About this time a good and most devoted minister was appointed by the Wesleyan Conference to labour on my father's circuit. He took a wonderful interest in my welfare, temporal and spiritual. God greatly owned his very self-denying and zealous efforts, and the little shanty of a preaching house gave place to a very neat little church. He used to pray for me, oh, how earnestly, while the tears of sympathy flowed copiously from his eyes. With what affection he used to warn me! A father could not feel more deeply for my spiritual welfare than he did. I promised, times without number, to give up the drink, but my most solemn vows and pledges were all in vain while

THE TYRANT APPETITE REIGNED within, ever crying, as only such a lust can, "Give, give."

One day I came home from my work, and found my wretched house as comfortless and untidy as it well could be. I was just maddened, and I grasped my wife with my left hand, and a carpenter's hatchet with my right. It was raised ready to descend on her head, when someone from behind grasped it very firmly. Greatly disappointed, I looked fiercely round to see who dared to interfere thus with me in my own house. To my utter astonishment it was a young minister, lately come as helper to the circuit. I scowled at him and let my wife go, he still holding by the hatchet, and looking me fearlessly in the face. Mustering up all the bad courage I possessed, I turned suddenly on him and growled out, "Sir, are you not afraid? Do you not know I am a very dangerous man?" He very quietly replied, while his steady gaze seemed to pierce me through and through, "G—, I know very well you are a dangerous man, but I am not a bit afraid of you: God is here, and He sees and knows all and will protect me. Now, down on your knees at once, and ask his forgiveness for your great sin against Him and your dear wife."

I had no power to reply, and even if I had it would be of no avail against his ready method, for he dropped on his knees, and so did I; and then, in earnest and most impassioned tones, he began by confessing what a guilty sinner I was, and how much I needed forgiveness and a change of heart and life. The tears came, and at once I wept like a beaten child; and how earnestly I did promise him to live a different and changed life. But like the "washed" but unchanged "sow" I returned to

MY OLD HAUNTS AND WAYS.

This same young minister again and again came after me with Christian prayerful entreaty and kindly warning, but all in vain. On the eve of his leaving our circuit he paid me a farewell visit, and I shall never forget his words or look as he took my hand in his, and held it fast while he said, "G—, as long as I know you are out of hell, I shall be praying to God to save you." He left, and I never saw him more. Yet I could never rid my memory of these burning words of his. Drunken or sober, day or night, they used to ring in my ears; till at last, in very desperation, I used to shout in the dialect of my native little town, "This is to let you all know, I am going to hell and I know it; but if I go there it will not be the young minister's fault." Changing to another corner I would just repeat the same words; then stagger home as best I could. My case was now, humanly speaking, hopeless in the extreme.

Shame was gone, credit was gone, my poor, heartbroken father was gone to the better land. Friends had really done all that seemed possible to reclaim me; and signally failed. At this time I was shunned as a perfect nuisance, and the question was, "What can we do with him?" Under these sad circumstances a subscription was set on foot to raise sufficient to send me to America with my poor helpless family.

It proved a success, and they placed me and mine on board one of those old-fashioned sailing vessels. We were three weeks at sea. What progress we made I know not, but contrary winds drove us back on a rock-bound coast, where the old ship was completely wrecked. Providentially our lives were spared, with those of the other passengers. We were taken in all sorts of available vehicles to a city distant some twenty miles or more. The fatigue and exposure brought on me a very severe attack of fever, and for three weeks more my worthless life hung in the balance, while I was absolutely unconscious of all passing on around me. In my delirium I thought I had passed entirely off the stage of time, and been consigned to the abodes of the lost, that I had so richly merited, having sinned against both light and love. But it pleased the Great Father, in the riches of his grace and mercy, to raise me up again.

GIVING ME ONE MORE TRIAL.

Consciousness returned, after twenty-one days wandering in dreamland, and once more I woke up to the realities of life. My very first act on the restoration of reason was to look round in wonder and gratitude on the walls and windows of the hospital and murmur to myself, "This certainly is not hell. That young minister said 'he would be praying for me as long as I was out of it.' If he is praying for me it is God who put it into his heart. If God put it into his heart to pray for me He is willing to save me. And if He is willing to save me He is willing to save me now. for now is his time."

Thus I crawled to the Cross, and the great and merciful Saviour received and saved even me, giving me a change of heart. I was a new man, and I knew and felt it.

I returned as soon as health would permit to my old home, but received no welcome, my very best friends felt greatly disappointed and vexed at my return. However, I bore all, and went to work in the name of Him who mercifully delivered me from so guilty a past. Step by step I gradually rose to more than my former prosperity, and lived to witness "He is able to save to the uttermost."

My story is told; I have coloured nothing. Am not I "a brand plucked from the burning"? X.

All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.

There is none righteous, no, not one.

There is none that doeth good, no, not one.

We all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind: and were by nature the children of wrath.

Thou wast altogether born in sins.

Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.

(Rom. iii. 23, 10, 12; Eph. ii. 3; John ix. 34; John iii. 3).

Bessbrook Homes for Sandwich Men.—The president, Mr. George Maynard, entertained a large party on Thursday night at Craven Hall, Foubert's-place, Regent-street, when about 1000 of them were provided with a substantial dinner, and were invited afterwards to a meeting at Craven Chapel, to hear of the advantages of the homes and their various agencies. The homes now provide 105 beds at fourpence and sixpence per night, and as a proof of their usefulness it may be mentioned that many of the inmates have so far recovered themselves as to be able to pay for the superior accommodation, and to provide themselves with new clothing. The improvement is, to a great extent, due to the benefits they derive from the labour agency attached to the homes, which undertakes the work of providing sandwich men and pays them on an exceptionally liberal scale undertaking also work suited for wet days, such as circular folding and addressing, and circular delivery. This latter branch furnishes employment for men who have shown themselves to be thoroughly trustworthy.

A Strange Advertisement.

TWO years ago there appeared in an influential London paper the following advertisement:—

"Wanted, for a responsible position, a young man not over 30 years of age, educated, and whose chief credential is that he is a consistent Christian. Salary £400. Apply, etc."

Hundreds applied for this El Dorado of situations, and among them hundreds who did not know the meaning of even the words "consistent Christian." Among the latter was a young man of good appearance, perfect education, high references, and undoubted abilities and character.

"I am not a Christian," he said in reply to the interrogation of his prospective employer, "but I will become one if it is necessary to the position and you wish it."

He said this in the most perfect good faith and without an idea of the painful absurdity and contradiction of his proposition.

"Why are you not a Christian?" was all the other asked.

"Well, to speak candidly, sir, I have never thought about it. But when my brother and I saw your strange—pardon me for calling it this—advertisement, we thought that if I suited the position in other respects, I might easily become a Christian, as I am not an enemy to religion."

"What then do you understand by the word Christian?" asked the gentleman. "You interest, while you astonish me."

The young man seemed to think for a moment, then he said:—"I believe the dictionaries define a Christian as one who follows Christ, who is described as the Saviour, the Anointed One."

"Strange that you should know so much, and not know, or wish to know, more!" said the elder man. "But it is no part of mine to catechize or to sermonize you. The fact that you are not a Christian prevents my engaging you, though I feel that you are fitted in every other way."

The young man thought of the invalid mother and the delicate sister in the beautiful town of Penzance, for whom he and his brother loved to work.

"Oh, sir," he said, and yet in a manful way, "this means so much to me! I am at once if you will but allow me to enter upon this work, if only on trial."

WILLING TO BE A CHRISTIAN

"The work needs Christian experience, my dear sir," said the gentleman, "and I have the name here of a young man who has had that experience; but in other things he is not equal. I think I must give him a trial. Yet I hope to see you again."

"Is there no hope for me, sir, then?" asked the young man.

"Every hope," was the reply, "but not without experience."

The employer's manner was kinder than his words; he held out his hand to the disappointed candidate, and shaking it he said:—"Call upon me soon—I should like to meet you again, for I like you. And will you, perhaps, read this?"

He put a copy of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" into the other's hand.

Two days after this, the brothers, searching the papers, came across another advertisement setting forth that a good reader, one able to make notes, was wanted temporarily by a student. A small honorarium was offered.

"It will be better than nothing, until I can get something of a permanent character," said he whom we shall call John.

"Yes," said Edward, angrily, "and you can snap your fingers at the churl who wanted to see you again! What for I should like to know?"

"Perhaps it was just a matter of form," suggested John. "I cannot complain of the man, I had not the necessary qualification."

John, among two or three hundred others, answered the later advertisement and much to his own astonishment and delight, he was chosen. He found his new employer to be a young man—a student preparing for examination—suffering from cataract; he was all but blind, and was expecting in a month's time to have his eyes operated upon. In the meantime, and after the operation, he needed someone to read to him, and to write for him; the former would be chiefly Greek—the New Testament.

Those were happy hours to John, for he found Mr. H—a man of fine mind and heart, and he wondered if he was a Christian. He was very soon to know.

"Do not be offended with me if I ask you a question," said Mr. H—one morning, "but you read this beautiful Gospel as if you had a living interest in it. Have you?"

"Do you mean by a 'living interest' to ask me if I am a Christian? If so, I must say no, for I have never professed any form of religion, though I am against none."

A shadow, as of pain, crossed Mr. H's expressive features, he sat silent for a few minutes, then he said:—

"The verse (Matt. xxiv. 44) you have just read, then appeals especially to you. I am a Christian, preparing for the ministry of God's Word, therefore I speak plainly to you; but speak how I will, I cannot speak so directly nor with such authority to you as does my Lord."

The other was visibly touched—he liked this honesty, even while he understood nothing of that which gave it origin. He said: "A week ago or so I lost a good appointment through not being a Christian of experience. I offered to become one, but someone was before me in experience; he got the post."

"HOW WOULD YOU HAVE BECOME A CHRISTIAN?" Mr. H—asked. "Had you any idea of what the doing so involved?"

"I would have gone to church regularly, tried to observe the rules of life as taught by the Church; I would have tried to do nothing contrary to those teachings, and I would be faithful to my vows."

"Very good, so far as it goes," said Mr. H—, "but the religion of Christ demands not only your service, but yourself. Christianity is a personal thing, as between a personal Saviour and a person to be saved. Christianity is the sinner's life-long response to Christ's call to a holy, perfect life——"

"Then I can never be a Christian, sir, and we will, if you please, dismiss the subject once and for all," said John.

They went on with the reading; notes and remarks followed, and at the close of the appointed time John went home—if that could be called "home" which they, the brothers, rented of a stranger—two rooms with scant attendance, and which they commonly termed "diggings." But, dancing before his eyes whenever he read; arranging themselves to the proper airs he hummed or whistled; obtruding themselves upon his every thought; entering silently into every conversation; disturbing his calmest moments and even forming part of his dreams, were the words of that verse which, done into English, read thus: "Therefore, be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh" (Matt. xxiv. 44). To escape uncomfortable thoughts, he accompanied his brother, one Saturday afternoon, over Bisley Common. A sudden storm of hail, succeeded by thunder and lightning, overtook them; and even as he turned to Edward, after a particularly vivid flash, he saw that his brother had been smitten, and that his clothes were burning. Over the common, in the blinding play of the lightning's flash, he carried his brother's corpse—his past a chaotic dream; his future an awful dread.

A year afterwards the "strange advertisement" again appeared, and again John saw it. He was just home from six months of foreign travel with the invalid son of a well-known Christian lady.

"Do you think," he asked her, as he showed her the advertisement, "that I have experience enough to warrant me in again applying for the position? For I am still a learner."

"That you will ever be," said the lady, "all God's children are. I should consider you peculiarly fitted for the position, and I advise you to apply for it. I will give you a letter to Mr. L——."

He got the post at once, without a word from himself. "And," said his new employer, "I should like to hear, if I may, your story."

"It is brief," was the reply. "I was tormented by the words 'Be ye also ready,' and had begun to think I was losing my reason, when my brother was struck dead at my side. My mother, an invalid, was so overcome by the shock that she died two days afterwards. I had a very severe illness myself, and my sister came up from Cornwall to nurse me. My ravings sent her to the Bible, and there she found One whom she had for years unconsciously needed—her Saviour. As I recovered she prayed with me and for me, read to me, explained what still appeared mysterious to me, and comforted me until she took the fever and I was like to lose her. One day when I was fairly convalescent, the doctor told me it was but a question of hours, 'only a miracle can save her,' said he. Then I knew I was a Christian, for a conviction flashed through me that Elsa would recover—that God would give her to me from the grave for the asking, and He did. All the afternoon I besought Him—I felt that I could almost hear Him, He was so near; and as I prayed, in an hour when I had not thought Him so near, He came, but not for death. My sister is now in perfect health, and though we have lost our mother and brother, we are happier than ever before in our lives, for we know that we have passed from death unto life, and that we are ready for the coming of God our Saviour."

Modern Preaching.

IN a leading article in a Philadelphia daily on the mission in progress there under Mr. Moody, the writer says: "A large portion of the Christian clergy to-day are in the habit of preaching almost constantly as if they were on the defensive; not infrequently conveying to their hearers the suggestion whether they themselves are not in some doubt as to their creed or even as to the fundamentals of Christianity. It may be doubted whether these efforts to reconcile religion with science and to refute the critics of inspiration do not puzzle, disturb, or discourage a hundred to the one that they may convince or convert. Mr. Moody, for example, would preach to empty seats were he to play the part of a controversialist, no matter if he had the training or the capacity to answer the questions of the scientists or 'the higher criticism.'"

"The religion which he preaches is the religion that consoles, exalts, and sustains the multitude. There are scores, indeed hundreds, of Philadelphia clergymen who, in preparing their sermons, might well ponder the lessons of what we may call 'Moodyism.' Some of them may profess to look upon his homely eloquence with the mild contempt of the scholar, but how many of them are able in a year to touch the hearts of half as many as those whom Mr. Moody in a single week has sent away with new hopes or stronger hopes of the future, with a sense of cheer and content and strength in their troubled lives, or with their faces turned to better things?"

The Liverpool Mission.

AT the twentieth annual meeting of this Mission in the Town Hall, Liverpool, the Earl of Derby presided in his novel character of Mayor of the city. The splendid work done by the Mission in recent years attracted a very large and sympathetic audience.

Rev. CHARLES GARRETT, who has from the first been so closely identified with the Mission, sketched its origin and development. Having traced the history of each branch, indicating the kind of work each was doing, and declaring that every place in the Mission was a romance, he said, there were now a thousand members of Society, two thousand children of the streets in the Mission schools, while three thousand men and women every Sunday night heard the Gospel preached with a glow of special gratitude. In the three Homes for Lads, they had received 651 lads. Of these 166 were now in situations, sixty-seven in the Royal Navy, thirty-two at sea, and seventeen have been sent to Canada or the United States. The police reported last year 276 runaways, each case representing a desolated home. Of these, nearly one-half they had been able to restore to their friends. He emphasised the fact that they know how to deal with impostors, and instead of pauperising the lads found them work and made them taste the joy of self-support. Last year the lads paid towards their own maintenance and lodging no less a sum than £1,198. The first lad received, whose sad plight really led to the establishment of the Homes, is now a teacher of music in a Church of England College, and one of the earliest lads is a student for the ministry. This deeply interesting sketch closed with the cry of the homeless girls who assailed him even in the street and drove him, when sorely over-weighted with the care of so large and complicated a Mission, to add the Girls' Home. Miss Irene Cannington and her father, by their courage and generosity, first made this enterprise successful. Mrs. Garrett, who now takes charge of the Homes in Liverpool and Southport, has 111 girls under her care.

The cost of the Mission last year amounted to £5,111 7s. 2d. The income covered the expenditure, leaving a balance in hand of £8. The Mission is in the happy position of never being in debt. So far, each year's income has met the expenditure.

The noble chairman, who followed, said that Mr. Garrett, with pathetic eloquence, had shown them the need for the Mission. He had told them of the difficulties, and the success attending it. Mr. Garrett's few sentences about the workers living amongst the people they sought to save had touched him deeply. Like true fishers of men, they had followed the shoals of fishes as they moved about under the surface of the commercial life of the city. This floating about was unavoidable, and the organisation of the Methodist Church enabled them to follow them as the Church of England cannot. It does not confine itself to any limit where good work can be done. Anyone going about the streets of Liverpool could see its need. Like all seaport towns, there was here an enormous amount of fluctuating and uncertain employment, and this often led to poverty. He was thankful for the good agencies at work in Liverpool. There need be no overlapping. There was ample scope for all, and the aim of Mr. Garrett's mission was to make it easy to do right.

Rev. JOHN WATSON, in the course of a vigorous address, said that he came there with a deep feeling of interest, not only in the cause, but in Mr. Garrett, who had given himself with such devotion to the needs of the city. The work of the Mission was not to weaken the churches, but to increase the kingdom of God. Probably they had churches enough in Liverpool; what they wanted was to fill them. They had plenty of preachers of different sorts; what was wanted was the people to hear them.

Revs. H. J. POPE, D.D., and JOHN THOMAS also supported enthusiastically the claims of the Mission as doing a great work among the lapsed poor of the great city of the Mersey.

Mrs. Whittemore's Work.

THIS lady, whose portrait we gave in November last, is now on a visit to our shores. She was the chief speaker at the Aldersgate-street noon prayer-meeting on Monday, and deeply interested her auditors by the recital of God's leadings in connection with the work of rescuing young sisters from a life of sin and shame. She described her own conversion from a frivolous profession to the joyous and fruitful life of whole-hearted trust and consecration. Briefly rehearsing the way in which she was led into rescue work (told in some detail in our issue of November 21), she said she could now thank God that He had not only given her the "Door of Hope" in New York City, but twenty-one other organisations in different States of the Union.

One case of rescue narrated was singularly pathetic; and remarkable too, as showing clearly the guiding hand of God. She had received a letter from a father in the old country, beseeching her to try and find his erring daughter, saying that the paternal home was still open for her if she would but return. When the letter was received God gave Mrs. Whittemore the faith to believe that the girl would be found. Just then an invitation came to address a drawing-room meeting, with the view of interesting some worldly ladies in such work. Being much pressed with engagements, she was about to write declining the invitation, when the prompting came to her that she ought not to refuse. She replied that she would be glad to go. Meantime the plan of the meeting was altered; instead of a "drawing-room" affair, the meeting was to be held in a certain institution. The meeting was held, and God indeed opened the windows of heaven upon those present.

During the proceedings Mrs. Whittemore's attention had been directed to a group of young women at the back of the room, especially to one who wore a weary and unhappy countenance. Her heart went out towards this poor sister, and she walked straight to the group of girls at the close. After a few words she asked this particular girl if she had ever seen her before. Yes; she had been at the Door of Hope for two or three days many months ago. Her name was asked; it was that of the very one whom she had been entreated to try and find. A thrill of tearful sympathy pervaded the audience as Mrs. Whittemore went on to tell of the sound conversion of this girl, and also of the subsequent finding of the man who had been the instrument of her degradation, of his conversion, and of the immediate marriage of the couple.

Any friends who would have their hearts thoroughly stirred and their Christian zeal quickened, should ask Mrs. Whittemore to speak to them. Letters for her may be addressed to our care.

Four Places for Four Kinds of Christians.

I. A PLACE OF SECURITY FOR THOSE IN DOUBT.—In his hand—for work (Isa. xlix. 16), for rest (John x. 28).

II. A PLACE OF STRENGTH FOR THOSE WHO ARE WEAK.—On his shoulder (Exod. xxviii. 12; Luke xv. 5).

III. A PLACE OF AFFECTION FOR THE TROUBLED.—On his heart (Exod. xxviii. 29).

IV. A PLACE FOR AN UNINSTRUCTED CHRISTIAN.—At his feet (Luke viii. 35, x. 39).

Egypt.—The Medical Mission in Alexandria, which was closed for a time, reopened at the beginning of January. Quite a number of children come under religious instruction in the classes carried on there by Miss Watson and Miss Van der Molen, and soon, it is to be hoped, with additional reinforcements about to start, more extensive work will be undertaken.

St. Petersburg.—The Evangelical movement in St. Petersburg, begun many years ago by Lord Radstock, and so successfully developed by Colonel Pashkoff, has again taken a fresh impetus forward, having invaded several families of Russian aristocrats. Two or three ladies, prominent in Russian society, are holding drawing-room meetings on Sunday afternoons, which are numerously attended by the "best" people. The police will probably find it more difficult to deal with these ladies than with the unprotected peasants of the South.—N. Y. Independent.

Salvation Army in U.S.A.

REGRETS are widely expressed in American journals at the contemplated withdrawal of Mr. and Mrs. Ballington Booth from the command of the "Army" in the United States, where they are universally respected, and have won the love and admiration of all who have seen anything of their work. In announcing the fact to their followers, they say:—

The orders to relinquish our command are in accordance with the discipline of the organisation, it being of a strictly military character.

In pursuance, therefore, of military obedience, regardless of our own feelings, we are proceeding to put all things in preparation. . . . that our successors may find as little difficulty as possible upon assuming their command.

We have not at present had the slightest official information as to who our successors will be.

As yet no other command has been offered us, and we have at present no idea what will be done in that matter.

We are glad to note the following tribute to the Army's work in so substantial a contemporary as the New York Independent:—

"Their work here has been unusually successful. They have made the Salvation Army in the United States an influential instrument of Christian reform, and have won the high regard of all Evangelical Christians.

"Mr. and Mrs. Booth came to the United States nine years ago. They had just been married, and they came here to enter upon their life work. They took the first steps immediately to become citizens. They have given themselves heart and soul to the work of the Army, and under their administration the prejudice against it has almost entirely melted away. They are sincere, sweet-spirited, cultivated people. Mr. Booth has proved himself to have excellent qualities as a leader. He has ruled so wisely that mutiny has been almost unknown. Studying carefully the character of the field in which his work was to be done, he adopted the best policy for success, and proceeded with rare skill and excellent judgment to make the Army in spirit and practice an American army and not a foreign army on American soil. The earlier criticisms against the Army have not been renewed under his administration. As to Mrs. Booth, she has captured all hearts. Her sweet and womanly ways on the platform, her simple, eloquent, and effective manner of presenting the cause of the Army, have made her very popular. They have given themselves to their work, Commander and Mrs. Booth, with the utmost zeal and devotion, and the whole Christian community will be sorry to lose them.

"It seems to us a great pity that the Booths should be taken from their work at this particular stage. When a general is very successful in leading an army it is not good military tactics to take him away and put someone else in his place. We hope that such representations will be made to the headquarters of the Army in London as will induce the General to change this order of recall, and allow Commander and Mrs. Booth to remain at the head of the Army in this country. It would be very greatly to the interest of the Army itself as well as to the cause which the Army was organised to advance."

Tetuan.—Miss Banks and Miss Bolton reached Tetuan on December 10, receiving a warm welcome from the people. Miss Bolton and her sister are taking the school for Spanish children, and Miss Banks and Miss Hubbard are hoping to give more definite time to house-to-house visitation. Most of the girls attending their classes have lost relations through the cholera; some, one, and others both parents. One result of the plague has been the removal of some of the numerous rubbish heaps, so that the streets are for once fairly clean.—Norin Africa.

The Azhar, or Mohammedan University of Cairo, is the great University of the Mohammedan faith. It was founded A.D. 1000, and the students are gathered from all parts of Africa and many places in the East. There are usually from ten to twelve thousand students in attendance, and 321 sheiks, or instructors. The instruction imparted is very superficial, and consists principally in committing to memory and reciting lengthy portions of the Koran and the numerous traditions founded upon it. When their education is finished many of the students return home or get employment in the country, while others, who are to be missionaries, join one of the caravans for the south to spread the fame of Mohammed in the heart of Africa.—North Africa.

TRACTS.

DEAR SIR,—Will some of your readers kindly tell me from personal knowledge some of the best tracts for distribution?

Those who have long worked in the Lord's vineyard must learn to value some more than others. I have a great horror of giving away anything but a really good tract or book; it does more harm than good.—Yours faithfully, S. M. SIMMONS.

UNIONS FOR PRAYER.

DEAR SIR,—In prayer unions numbering thousands of members, there is doubtless much mutual help. God knows all about the individual "requests for prayer;" and answers according to the riches of his glory. But we have only a vague idea, and consequently a less intense sympathy with those for whom we thus pray, than if they were members of our own family or personal friends.

Could there not, in many places, be a union for prayer the members of which should never exceed the number we can easily remember, that in our prayers we may be able to do something more than merely name? For example, four or five families or individual members of those families might join in such a union for prayer. There are five persons, say, in each family; some unconverted, some backsliding, some in special need. These would be quite sufficient for us specially to supplicate by name, in addition to other requests.

What a help it would be. There need be no elaborate organisation, no expense. And when the prayers are answered, each member could record the answer as an incentive to ask still more from Him who is able to do for us exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think. W. D.

ARMENIA AND PROPHECY.

DEAR SIR,—Some few years ago I bought Dr. Grattan Guinness's book, "Light for Last Days," which I read and re-read, again and again, until I became thoroughly familiar with its contents. It has ever since been a prophetic text-book to me—an index to the hidden meaning of passing events. The Armenian atrocities, which shocked, and still shock, the civilised world, reminded me of a critical terminal date, given by Dr. Guinness, in relation to the Mohammedan Power, as represented by Turkey. It is given on page 176, and any of your readers who have the book will see that it is 1897 on the solar scale. Did your space permit, I would have liked to transcribe the whole paragraph in which it occurs, as it is profoundly interesting and significant just now.

We all mourn over this abominable butchery of our Armenian brethren, and, I trust, unceasingly pray to our Great Father to intervene on their behalf; but in doing this, do not let us cease to trust his love and his wisdom. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out."

We have wondered, perhaps, at the delay to take measures to stop this horrible tragedy by the European concert of nations, but recent events have thrown considerable light upon this matter. The British Government, I feel sure, would act if it could, but it cannot, in spite of the so-called concert of nations, for underlying the surface there are jealousies and a bitter opposition to this nation among other nations, as recent events have shown. Is there not a hidden meaning in all this? "God maketh the wrath of men to praise Him," and restraineth the remainder. His hour has not struck, but the "Judge is at the door" and very soon this blood-thirsty and red-handed apostasy of the East will feel his hand. Events are ripening, and the bitter harvest for Turkey is sure. The old man, now sick, will be in his death struggle. The wheels of God grind slowly, but they grind surely.

At the beginning of the times of the Gentiles, Nebuchadnezzar, in deep affliction, learnt and acknowledged his own impotence and God's omnipotence (Daniel iv. 34-35); and at the end of these times the Sultan, and all like him, will learn it, if not in their meek submission to Christ, by his righteous judgments. The blood of martyrs cries from the ground, and their souls from under the altar in heaven are saying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should yet rest for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled" (Rev. vi. 10, 11). For the fulfilment of this time, and the coming of the King to reign in righteousness and peace, is the prayer of yours very sincerely, FRANK RUSSELL.

The Month & Its Lessons.—2.

FEBRUARY.—The Rainy Month.

FEBRUARY was the last month of the ancient Roman year, and the one during which they made their sacrifices of expiation. Even in these dark days the people had a consciousness of guilt, and sought for something to put away their sins. It seems they had no knowledge of God's method of putting away sin, and therefore no knowledge of his pardon and peace.

February has been called the Whisper of the coming Spring, the season of life and liberty for the early flowers, and the time of rain, and thaw, and preparation for nature to awake out of sleep. The time when God "renews the face of the earth" (Ps. civ. 30, Ps. cxlvii. 16, 17, 18).

LESSONS FROM THE RAIN

1. A Mark of God's Goodness (Ps. cxlvii. 8, Matt. v. 45).
2. A Proof of God's Faithfulness (Deut. xi. 14, Acts xiv. 17).
3. A Type of God's Word (Is. lv. 10).
4. A Sign of God's Blessing (Lev. xxvi. 4).
5. A Picture of God's Grace (Deut. xxxii. 2, Hos. x. 12).
6. A Token of God's Promise (Ps. lxxii. 6, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4).
7. A Warning of God's Judgment (Gen. vii. 4, Matt. vii. 25).

The shining sun, the refreshing rain, and the fresh air are all emblems of the freshness, fullness, and fruitfulness of God's boundless love.

Bishop Trower once said, "You have seen the ground so hard and parched that it might almost be taken for rock, but the rain has come in gentle shower, 'He maketh it soft with the drops of rain,' and it receives into its bosom the seeds that shall bear fruit in due season. So many a hardened heart has been softened into penitence, and penetrated by the heavenly doctrine. In due time, the 'good tidings of great joy' are the truths which fall upon the heart like showers on the mown grass and like the dew upon the tender herbs. Silently and gently the truth makes its way, when all else is hushed; it has a 'still small voice' to tell of mercy and hope. It comes from above. In the solemnity of Divine worship the heart is filled with freshness and power, and the signs of Divine life are seen in the fruits of a holy life." C. EDWARDS.

Requests for Prayer.—For a special mission now being held in the Tralee (co. Kerry) Y.M.C.A., by Mr. Wm. A. Boyd.—For Gospel meetings in the village of Whitellets, Ayrshire, by Messrs. Kemp and McRostie.

Indian Villagers.—Mrs. E. Lemmon writes of much encouragement in work in the villages round Gonda (Oudh), where she and her husband have gone for a short time. "We are getting calls from all sides to come and tell them the old, old story of Jesus and his great love. We go out every day preaching to the poor natives in these villages. The first Sunday we went out three times and preached the blessed Gospel. A poor native followed us a long way. He said, 'The words have touched my heart, I wish to follow you. Take me with you to your house.' I told him to follow Christ, the hope of glory, and we shall meet in heaven. One who was deeply touched begged us to come to his own village—the distance was six miles. I promised to go, the Lord helping me. Last Sunday we went, and had a very good time."

Tientsin Hospital.—Dr. G. P. Smith reports signs of blessing in the hospital at Tientsin. Three patients have lately entered their names as inquirers. One was a young scholar who had been cured of opium-smoking, and who acknowledged that his memory had been impaired by the habit, but was now improving. Another case was that of an intelligent Hunan soldier, who has been spending the time he has been at the hospital in searching the catechism and other books, and who shows by the calm smile on his face that he has got the gift of salvation. Dr. Smith has also heard from a friend that, while travelling to Chi Chou, he met many soldiers who had been treated in the Tientsin Hospital, and one in particular had given evidence of his conversion, and had proclaimed the fact among his fellow-villagers.

THE BOOK WORLD.

Herbert Fry's Guide to London Charities (1s. 6d. Chatto & Windus) has gained general appreciation by its clear and comprehensive list of philanthropic institutions. The new issue for 1896 is revised up to date.

Four Months among Mission Workers in India. By Miss L. R. Goodbody. (1s. Stoneman.) A series of chatty letters by an observant visitor, in full sympathy with missionary effort, and not least with the recently developed work of the Y.M.C.A.

Which House? the New Year's issue of Regions Beyond, is a striking missionary study. By letter-press and diagrams it drives home to the heart and mind of the reader the spiritual need of the heathen world, and gives some account of efforts made to meet that need. (4d. Partridge.)

Messrs. Cassell & Co. are publishing a cheap issue, in sixpenny parts, of the new and revised edition of their well-known illustrated History of England. The work is to be completed in fifty-two weekly parts, and deserves the attention of all who would read the story of Great Britain and her people.

The One Great Voyage of Life: An Allegory. By John Ashton Savage. (4s. Partridge.) This work depicts the history of a human soul during its progress through mundane life to the eternal world, somewhat after the manner of Bunyan's great allegory. There are many striking illustrations, and Scripture authority for the most important statements is indicated on the margin. The privileges and perils of life are set forth in a way which should make this a very attractive book to young and old alike.

Night Scenes of Scripture. By W. T. P. Wolston, M.D. (Nisbet, London; "Gospel Messenger" Office, Edinburgh.) A series of Gospel addresses, wherein the plan of salvation is set forth with point and potency. The evangelist has a firm grasp of vital truths, a command of fluent speech, and a large store of personal experience, on which he draws freely to illustrate and enforce his appeals. In many respects these are admirable types of what Gospel addresses ought to be. From first to last it is Jesus who is set forth as able and ready to meet the sinner's need.

The Ministry of the Lord Jesus, by Rev. Thomas G. Selby, is a new volume of the series of "Books for Bible Students," edited by Rev. A. E. Gregory. (2s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.) The pages really bring before us the Teacher and his Doctrine; and they do so in a style which is in striking contrast with some modern works professing to cover similar ground. Mr. Selby knows Scripture and human nature; he writes with grasp and insight. Those who know him as an author will, of course, read this his latest work, which we cordially commend to the attention of all who would study the words and deeds of Christ.

Jesus Christ and the Present Age. By James Chapman, Principal of Southlands Training College. (2s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.) This is the twenty-fifth Fernley Lecture, and was delivered in August last at Plymouth. To use his own words, the author "considers the work of Jesus Christ, his teaching, life, and death, in order to see how it stands related to the general modes of thought at present prevailing; how it harmonises with the best aspirations of our time, and satisfies its deepest needs; how it works amid our confusions, confirming what is true, correcting what is false, strengthening what is useful, and rebuking what is bad." The purpose is high and laudable; the performance able and of great practical importance. Though by no means disposed to agree with the author in some of the positions maintained, we admire his lucid and vigorous discussion of great issues.

PILGRIM SONGS. By George Morison. (6d. The Author, 203, Corio-street, Geelong, Victoria.) This is a collection of verses, written in youth and age, by one who has a spiritual mind as well as a poetical sense.

PRAYERS ANSWERED; AND OUR FATHER'S PROMISES TO HEAR US. This booklet exhibits some of the passages of Scripture whereby we are commanded and encouraged to pray without ceasing. (2s. 6d. per 100. H. J. Guerrier, Colville, Woking.)

WORD-GEMS OUTLINED is an excellent booklet, containing useful heads of address for God's busy workers. The author, Rev. R. Raiton, B.A., rector of Clitheroe, knows well how to treat homiletically the stories and teachings of Holy Scripture. (3d. St. James's Book Depot, Clitheroe.)

WHO KINDLED THE FIRE? By Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor. (1d. Marshall Brothers.) A pointed address on some of the serious responsibilities, from a Christian and social point of view, of neglect and indifference to the well-being of others; and not least the injury we may do our weaker brethren by setting a snare before them in the way of drink.

EARTHLY FOOTSTEPS OF THE MAN OF GALILEE. A re-issue of these Palestine pictures, of which over a million copies were sold last year, is being made by The Christian Globe, Great Thoughts, Methodist Recorder, Christian Pictorial, Freeman, and Independent. Each of the twenty-four sixpenny weekly parts contains sixteen beautiful photographic reproductions of views (taken in 1894) of scenes in the Holy Land, illustrating events in the life of our Lord and his apostles.

The Y.M.C.A.

NEW rooms were opened last week by the Kirkintilloch Association.

A demonstration will be held on February 14th, at Hamilton, by the Scottish National Council.

Mr. Clifford Hall, of Hastings, has been appointed assistant secretary of the Croydon Association.

A deeply interesting series of week evening Bible studies is being conducted at the Cambridge Y.M.C.A. A mission to young men is being held this week.

Abergavenny Y.M.C.A., which is not large, has a Bible class of seventy members, and holds a Sunday morning prayer-meeting with an attendance of sixty.

The Totnes Association is doing a good and growing work in the small town in which it is placed, having a membership of 160 young men out of a population of 4000. A new hall and gymnasium have just been added to the building.

The Cheltenham Association is maintaining a good work, a most useful department in connection with which is a well-managed boarding-house for young men. It is proved that this meets a great need, and the young men for whom it provides are warmly appreciative of its benefits.

The annual meeting of the Tunbridge Wells Association was held on January 29th, Lord Kinnaird presiding. The report showed that the Association was in a healthy condition, there being a manifest growth in all departments of the work. The membership is 266 against 232 last year.

The Halifax Association is holding monthly meetings for the deepening of spiritual life and other scriptural truths. At the last meeting Rev. J. C. Smith (late of Dufftown) was the speaker. He intends holding a fortnight's mission in Liverpool, commencing February 9, and the Lord's people are asked to pray for rich blessing.

At Southport Association a kind friend had handsomely refurnished the drawing-room at a cost of £150, and the funds of the Association have been greatly helped by a bequest of £1000, which has been invested. The Bible class has risen in attendance to fifty-six, and the spiritual work has been much quickened by the recent visit of Rev. Dr. Pierson.

The Scottish Union of the Y.M.C.A. and Fellowship Union are seeking for two travelling secretaries. The committee say:—"The position affords rare opportunities for usefulness, and will draw out the highest talents which can be consecrated to the Master's service. It combines the work of evangelist, pastor, and business man. The travelling secretary has special means of getting at young men's confidence and of leading them to Christ."

The Bayswater Association held on Tuesday week a social gathering, alike profitable and pleasing. Mr. W. H. Mills presided. Mr. C. C. M. Baker (barrister-at-law) said that while recognising the social department, yet they endeavoured to "Keep first things first"—viz., to go straight for a young fellow, and rescue him from the power of the devil. Pastor F. B. Monti gave a pithy and forcible address on the reasonableness of taking a bold stand for God, and confessing Him bravely before the world.

The Trowbridge Association has just established a ladies' auxiliary to meet for work fortnightly, and perhaps take up other matters to promote the welfare of the Y.M.C.A. A horizontal bar has been erected, and other improvements effected calculated to increase the welfare of young men, while an endeavour is being made to secure larger premises. Mr. J. Poynton Haden (president) presided over the quarterly members' meeting recently, when fairly good progress was reported, and several young men received as new members and associates.

Y.M.C.A. work throughout France, and particularly that of the large and successful institution in Paris, has sustained a very heavy and irreparable loss in the sudden death of M. Alfred Andre. As president of the Paris (French) Y.M.C.A., M. Andre took a prominent part in the jubilee proceedings in London in 1894, and on his return did much to make the influence of these great gatherings felt in the Associations of his own country. He was a magnificent supporter of the Paris centre, having contributed 300,000fr. to its building and other funds, and was a generous helper also of all Protestant and philanthropic institutions.

The annual meeting of the Fulham and South Kensington Y.M.C.A. was held at the Fulham Town-hall on Tuesday week. The chair was occupied by Mr. W. H. Seagram, who warmly commended the Association in its desire to help young men. Dr. Anderson, C.B., advised young men if they were going to be sceptics, instead of reserving their scepticism for God's Word, to spend it freely upon those who attacked that Word. Prebendary Webb-Peploe pleaded for the consecration of our whole being to the service of God, and no more to call common or unclean that which God had cleansed. The report presented of the past year's work shows that the boarding home has been well patronised, and the spiritual work a success.

The Y.W.C.A.

OPENINGS IN INDIA.

THE following notes of work in India have been received by the Hon. E. Kinnaird:—"At C—— we received a most touching welcome, and the people would hardly let us leave. The need for workers is so very great. It is terrible to think of nominal Christians lapsing into heathenism owing to the lack of teachers or real Christians. For seven years a native earnest C.M.S. catechist has worked there without any conversions, owing, he said, to the shocking lives of such people. I feel that God must wish us to have a light in that dark spot. Miss Bishop and Miss Lambert start to-night. The C.M.S. will lend an old empty Mission-house for a month, but it cannot be used longer as it is not healthy; we must have one high up to catch the breeze from the river, as C—— is very oppressive in the hot season. We are trusting the Lord for all needed supplies.

We had a time of great blessing in the Calcutta Home during our stay at Christmas. I can truly say I have never spent a happier Christmas anywhere. God took away every bit of home sickness, and more than made up for all one would have had at home. India, with its climate, and fever, and difficulties, with the King, is a thousand times better than home with all its joys if He wants one here, and it is more than worth all that looks like sacrifice to feel that in some measure one has been able to make God glad. Mrs. Constantine and Miss Orlebar are again leaving us. We spent three or four days at Barrackpore, and left full of joy, as it is all so wonderfully gracious of our God. A week's mission was held at the Garakhpur Y.W.C.A., and three days' mission at Patna. Dear Mrs. Constantine has been greatly blessed to many, and, wherever we go, they want us to stay longer or come again soon—so keep praising God and praying for us.

WORK IN GLASGOW.

The annual meeting of the Glasgow Association was held on January 29th, in the City Hall, which was crowded in every part. The Lord Provost, Sir James Bell, presided, and in a sympathetic speech expressed his interest, as chief magistrate, in such societies as the Y.W.C.A. which were doing so much for the moral and spiritual welfare of the young people of the city. The annual report showed a membership of 2,321, with nearly 1000 more attending the meetings and classes without being on the roll. There were forty-one branches, including teachers' branch and hospital nurses' union, and two institutes were in full working order. In the central institute forty boarders were in constant residence; in the servants' home 605 had lodged during the year; in the registry office there had been on the books 3658 employers' names, and 3466 servants. The financial statement was made by Mr. Alex. Sloan, who reported the income as £2937, and the expenditure £2450. After addresses by Miss Reynolds, international secretary, and Miss Guinness (London), Lord Overtoun gave a telling closing speech, relating the touching experience of a friendless girl whom he had met, and forcibly appealing from it to the Y.W.C.A. members present. Revs. Wm. Nelson and J. Buchan also took part in the proceedings.

BRIEF NOTES.

The annual gathering of the Dove Holes (Derbyshire) branch took place on January 20.

The annual reunion of the members of the Inverary branch took place on January 21.

The annual meeting of the Ambleside branch was held on January 21. Miss A. Dixon presided. The number of members at present is 110.

Miss Snelling, secretary of the Tonbridge Y.W.C.A., has recently died from the effects of cancer. She was an active worker in the temperance cause, and will be sorely missed.

At the twenty-first annual meeting of the Exeter branch, Mr. Savile presided. There are now 200 members. In connection with the Institute a duly qualified nurse is giving a course of lessons on sick nursing.

A large company attended the New Year's gathering of the Boscombe branch, held on January 15. A mission is to be held by Miss L. Barter this month, when it is hoped many young women will be reached. Nearly £300 have been collected towards the £3000, the estimated cost of the new building, intended as the future home of the institution.

Through the kindness of Miss L. Duff (district referee for East London), about fifty waitresses from the various bread companies of the City were entertained at the Finsbury Institute on the evening of January 29. Refreshments were provided, and after a pleasant time, spent in friendly intercourse and games, addresses were given by the Hon. G. Kinnaird and Miss Morley.

Christian Endeavour.

SAYS Christian Endeavour:—"Seven thousand seven hundred and fifty new Christian Endeavour Societies were formed last year. That is one for every sixty-eight minutes."

The Golden Rule gives some interesting details of Endeavour work in Laos, where a C.E. Society was founded last year, and in four months had 230 members, with weekly and other meetings.

On Sunday the C.E. movement attained its fifteenth birthday. The progress made in these few years is certainly wonderful. Our exchanges show that preparations were being made by the young people in many lands to celebrate Endeavour Day.

The World's Christian Endeavour Prayer Chain has for its theme this month:—"For the young converts who have recently been brought to Christ, that they may be strong, unselfish, winsome Christians, and that they may begin at once to show their love to Christ by working for Him."

The Llandudno branch has organised a plan to raise money to support a representative in China. Thirty young people each undertake to obtain one penny a week from ten subscribers. This will produce £30 a year. The scheme is the direct outcome of the Liverpool S.V.M.U. Conference, at which some of the members were present.

The report of the Cambridge-street Chapel, Glasgow, says:—"A valuable agency in connection with the work of the congregation has been the Christian Endeavour Society, which has over 120 members. Several branches of the work are almost wholly carried on by this society, as for example the Gospel temperance tea-meeting and the Band of Hope."

Endeavour work for sailors is progressing with encouraging results, especially on the Pacific Coast. The C.E. Societies of a town appoint committees, who visit ships as they enter the harbour, greet the sailors with Gospel songs and Christian handshakes, invite them to the churches, and to the private homes of the members. Meetings are also held on board ship, and much personal work is done.

Oxford Notes.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

TERM has commenced very encouragingly in things spiritual. A special sermon was preached last week by Rev. F. S. Webster, of Birmingham, addressed to University men, and the Word was definitely blessed to several present.

The daily prayer-meeting, too, has made a first-rate start, both as to numbers and power, and there is every evidence of a term of blessing coming.

It is very suggestive of the influence of the work of the Inter-Collegiate Christian Union that a daily union for prayer has been formed among the earnest High Church undergraduates, whose Christianity is not robust and large-hearted enough to unite with Christians who are not too Churchmen. "'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true," but yet, on the principle of Phil. i., we may rejoice so long as Christ is sought.

The Missionary Union meeting last week was addressed by Mr. C. T. Studd, and about eighty men were present. Mr. Studd also spoke to the Men's Bible Class at the Y.M.C.A.

We are anticipating the anniversary of the C.M.S. next week, including Canon Christopher's missionary breakfast. This will be followed on the 18th to 20th by a visit from Dr. Pierson, who will be welcomed by many.

The People of Manitoba have declared for unsectarian public schools and against the Romish hierarchy. Of the thirty-nine seats in the provincial Parliament, those opposed to sectarian schools have won thirty-five, and it is not likely that the Canadian Government, in view of this triumph, will dare to coerce Manitoba. All lovers of liberty will rejoice at this victory. The province of Quebec should now throw off the shackles of Rome that have bound her so long.—Christian Secretary.

The Poor of Naples.—In a lively account, in the February Advance, of an ascent of Vesuvius presumably from the pen of Mr. or Mrs. Price Hughes, there is the following reference to the Neapolitan "submerged tenth":—"The way lies first through the poorest suburbs of Naples, where we had a vivid experience of 'how the poor live,' for they do literally live in the streets. The wretched, filthy houses are merely holes or dens, to which they retire at night to sleep, like rabbits to a burrow. With that exception, toilet, meals, work, family intercourse, etc., all go on in the open air! As our carriage dashed along, pursued by beggars, and shouted at by the natives, we saw enough to sicken us, and to convince us that the social problem exists in La Bella Napoli as well as in grim, foggy London."

Irish Notes.

THE Methodist Female Orphan School in Dublin, which has been in existence since 1804, is doing a valuable though unostentatious work. It has at present 17 girls in residence, and 233 girls have altogether passed through it since its foundation.

A party of boys and girls from the Children's Home, Bonner-road, London, are at present visiting Ireland under the charge of Dr. Bowman Stephenson. Meetings have been held in Belfast, Portadown, and various other centres, which have been largely attended.

The Belfast Female Mission, which has been in existence for thirty-six years, and which by means of female missionaries endeavours to 'carry the Gospel to the homes of the poor, held its annual meeting last Friday. The report showed that during the year the agents paid 12,734 visits, conversed with 18,184 persons, held 621 prayer meetings, and visited 621 sick persons, besides helping many to regain a position of independence. The Mission is a purely undenominational one.

The Qua Iboe Mission held its annual meeting on Jan. 27, in the Large Hall of the Belfast Y.M.C.A. The report presented was most encouraging, a cheering fact being the building of a new church on the site of an idol temple at the Ibuno Station, and almost entirely at the expense of the native Christians, who gave most liberally out of their deep poverty for this purpose. Mr. S. A. Bill, the senior missionary, who is at present on furlough in Ireland, stated that he knew of many centres where new stations could be opened, and that the men could be found who were ready to go, if the means were forthcoming.

Scottish Notes.

MRS. E. W. WHITTEMORE, of New York, has addressed several meetings in Glasgow during the few days of her stay there. Her eloquent appeals and pathetic incidents deeply impressed her audiences.

Rev. James Lyall, from Chicago, has been conducting an evangelistic mission at Kirkintilloch, for the last four weeks, and there is abundant cause to be thankful for his visit. A considerable number have been led to the Saviour, and professing Christians have been much helped and quickened.

Last week a deputation from the Dundee Citizens' Association appeared before the magistrates, and presented a memorial urging that the licensing laws should be more strictly administered with a view to the diminution of drunkenness. Rev. D. M. Ross said that the state of the streets in Dundee on Saturday nights and on holidays was a disgrace.

Some Greenock friends of Mr. Daniel Crawford, who is actively engaged in missionary work in Africa, have in their spare hours built a steel sailing-boat for the purpose of assisting him in the way of conveyance on the great African lakes, and in that way removing a considerable hindrance to his work which at present exists. The boat is fitted with two masts, is about 14 tons measurement, and is furnished with everything necessary to working a boat of her description. She will be taken to pieces, and shipped at Glasgow for Africa.

The annual meeting of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society took place last week in the saloon of the Royal Hotel, Princes-street, Edinburgh, Sir T. Grainger Stewart, M.D., president of the Society, in the chair. The annual report mentioned that the year under review had been a somewhat anxious one for those engaged in missionary work abroad, and touched upon the various mission fields in different parts of the world. Dr. Sargood Fry appealed for more liberal subscriptions, and mentioned that eight medical missionaries, including one lady, were about to leave for foreign mission stations. Dr. Stalker, Glasgow, in moving the adoption of the report, said that thoroughly-equipped hospitals ought to be established in every place where there was a medical mission abroad, because the scientific acquirements of the medical men were very much lost when they had not the means of putting their talents to their proper use. Dr. Westwater, Manchuria, and Dr. Fenn, Madagascar, gave experiences of medical missionary work, and spoke of the many advantages which a medical missionary had over a man who knew nothing of medicine.

Jews in Montreal.—A mission to the Jews of Montreal has been opened by Rev. John McCarter, with headquarters at 354, St. Lawrence Main-street. Mr. McCarter is a Presbyterian minister. Besides being experienced in general mission work, he is familiar with the language used by European Jews. He is being assisted by Hebrew Christians, who conduct classes and carry on visitation work.

Temperance Notes.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON has intimated his intention of bringing in a Local Veto Bill in the House of Commons at the earliest opportunity.

Drunkenness and disorderly scenes being on the increase in Chatham, the magistrates threaten to deal more severely with the offenders.

It has been decided to form a department, to be called "The College of Scientific Temperance," in connection with the Washington University.

The Bishop of Liverpool, speaking in connection with the Diocesan Temperance Sunday, made special reference to the increase of drunkenness amongst women.

The Fulham Vestry has complained to the Chief Commissioner of Police that pavements were obstructed by the process of lowering casks of beer into publicans' cellars.

The county council of Cardiff, in framing a new set of bye-laws for the regulation of lodging-houses, has passed one prohibiting licensed victuallers taking in seamen as boarders.

The Irish Temperance League is giving increased attention to Band of Hope work. Sound temperance teaching, with songs and recitations, is generally superseding mere entertainment.

A brewer in Nelson has been fined £20 and costs, and his retail licence forfeited, for selling beer without a licence in a neighbouring district. The brewer's agents took orders, and the beer was delivered the following week.

The Secretary for Scotland, having had his attention called to the practice of collecting public rates in hotels and public-houses in several parts of Scotland, has replied that he "concurs with his predecessors in strongly disapproving of the practice."

The pitiful tossing to and fro of Jane Cakebread seems ended at last, as it ought to have been years ago. Two medical men having reported that she is not responsible for her actions, the North London magistrate has made an order for her removal to an asylum.

A special meeting for nurses has been arranged by the Women's Total Abstinence Union, to be held by permission of the Duke of Westminster, at Grosvenor House, on the afternoon of Friday, February 14. Admission by ticket only. The Lady Elizabeth Biddulph will preside, and addresses will be delivered by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson and Mrs. Hawkes.

The clergymen of Brooklyn have united in an endeavour to constrain the municipal authorities to enforce the prohibition of Sunday liquor-selling. On January 12 this was the theme of a hundred or more sermons, beside which petitions were offered to the church-goers for signature. The law has been enforced in New York, but evaded in Brooklyn.

The Manchester Women's Christian Temperance Association held its annual meeting last week, the Lady Mayoress presiding. A general summary of the work of the ten departments of the Association showed active educational, social, municipal, scientific, and political work. Direct Gospel and rescue work occupies special attention, and these were greatly blessed in many directions. It was stated that Mrs. Lewis, one of the prison workers, has received official permission to visit Strangeways Gaol.

A law was passed in New York in 1892, forbidding the licensing of a saloon within 200 feet of a school or church. The Tammany Excise board interpreted this to mean that no new licence could be granted within the prescribed limits, but that places licensed before the law was passed could have their licences renewed indefinitely. But the new board, appointed by Mayor Strong, took the view that as a licence is issued for only a year, the board could not renew such a licence, since it would practically be a new one. This action of the Excise board has been sustained by the Court of Appeals. The result will be the closing of between 1500 and 2000 saloons in New York city, and many throughout the State.

The Manchester Retreat for Inebriate Women received 125 applications for admission during the past year. The number of new patients admitted was twenty-eight. There are twenty-five patients at present in the Retreat. The institution has hardly been in existence for six years, and therefore the permanence of its cures can hardly yet be said to have been tested. But it points already to four patients of 1890-1 who are doing really well, five who left in 1891-2, eight of 1892-3, five of 1893-4, and eleven of 1894-5, who stood firm. Experience proves that effect should at once be given to the recommendation of the Departmental Committee on the Treatment of Inebriates, in the report of 1893, that power should be given to compel a confirmed inebriate to enter a retreat when the person would not enter voluntarily, and that the magistrate should have power to commit to a retreat instead of dealing with a drunk and disorderly case by means of a short and ineffective imprisonment.

International S.S. Lessons.

FEBRUARY 16.

THE GREAT HELPER.—Luke vii. 2-16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Verse 16.

CHRIST proves Himself the Great Helper by the two miracles this lesson describes. The first is a miracle of healing; the second a miracle of resurrection.

I. THE MIRACLE OF HEALING (2-10). The scene of this miracle was Capernaum, where most of our Lord's mighty works were performed (Matt. xi. 23). The subject of it was the servant of a Roman centurion. It is beautiful to note the affectionate relationship between the master and his bond servant. The master did as much for the servant as the most faithful servant could have done for him. The lesson of the incident as taught by Jesus Himself is furnished by the faith of the centurion (9). It was such faith as caused Him to marvel. The following are some of its remarkable features:—

(1) It was found in an unlikely subject. Do we not naturally expect to find the greatest faith where there has been the greatest privilege? Yet our Lord puts "the children of the kingdom" in contrast with this man (Matt. viii. 11, 12). His nationality, his occupation, and his very slight knowledge of Christ make his faith the more remarkable. Strange, was it not, that Gehazi in Elisha's household should have been unbelieving, while faith was found in the Jewish maid in the heathen household of Naaman.

(2) It was accompanied by great humility. A sense of unworthiness is sometimes pleaded as an excuse for not coming to Christ. Yet our conscious unfitness is our truest fitness. This man's faith was rooted in his deep humility. And his humility was the more remarkable because he had done something of which another man might be proud (5). Observe the three estimates of his character. Our Lord's: "I have not found so great faith" (9); the Jewish elder's: "He was worthy" (4); and his own: "I am not worthy" (6). The greatest enemy to faith is pride and self-sufficiency. We shall never think much of Christ until we have learned to think little of ourselves.

(3) It expressed itself in a remarkable way.—"Say in a word, and my servant shall be healed" (7). There was no necessity for personal contact with the sick man. The disease was as much under authority to Jesus as the servants of the centurion were under authority to him (8). No other suppliant had paid such honour to the Saviour. Such is the faith He asks of us. He still "sends forth his word, and heals." True faith receives the word, and asks for no confirming sign or wonder. He who trusts what Jesus says shall never be put to confusion.

II. A MIRACLE OF RESURRECTION (11-15). "Nain" was a small town about twenty-five miles south-west of Capernaum. It is now only a small hamlet, inhabited by a few families. "Carried out" (12)—the custom being to bury outside the city. "Bier" (14)—not a coffin, but a sort of flat couch, sometimes made of wickerwork.

The miracle is specially connected with the compassion of Jesus (13). Before the widow either asked his help, or knew of his presence, his heart was moved with compassion for her. What Jesus was He is still. He is as tender and compassionate now as then. To "heal the broken in heart and bind up their wounds" (Psa. cxlvii. 3) is the work He still delights to do.

Two things:—(1) The object of his compassion. Picture the funeral train leaving the little city. The company make a doleful sound, "weird cadences, heartrending cries of agony," "loud, high, prolonged wails" of women. Every detail of the event appeals to the Saviour's compassion. It was the funeral of a young man, "the only son of his mother, and she was a widow" (12). Death could not rend holier bonds or cause more bitter tears. Our every sorrow is a voice that speaks to the compassionate heart of Jesus. The youngest child who knows what it is to weep may find a sympathising Friend in Jesus.

(2) The power which accompanied his compassion. The words "weep not" (13) would have seemed almost like trifling if the miracle had not followed. By restoring the dead, and reuniting those whom death had severed, Jesus gave true comfort to the sorrowing widow.

The miracle is a picture of what Jesus now does for us. Many are dead even while they live (Eph. ii. 1). The word of Jesus gave life to this young man; and the same word calls to life those who are dead in sin (John. v. 25).

It is also a prophecy of the future resurrection (John. v. 28, 29). In that all will have a part. Will our resurrection be to life, or to judgment?

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

WE are thankful to receive many letters from parents and teachers, who are finding our Children's Page helpful to them in the instruction of their little ones. We hope its usefulness will be widely extended, and that our readers will recommend it to their friends who find, as one correspondent puts it, that

There are always some of our children not out at church on Sabbath evening, and it is a little difficult to keep them suitably employed.

Some missionaries have planted themselves in Bhot in the Himalayas, at a height of 11,000 feet, in the hope that by winning the Bhutiyas for Christ they may also win the Tibetans. The Bhutiyas have the privilege of regularly visiting Tibet, and of openly associating with its people; thus, where Europeans cannot enter, a neighbouring people may give access for the Gospel. The enterprise seems to be a promising one, notwithstanding the ungenial climate in which the workers have begun, as the natives accord them a welcome.

The Church Times notes with great satisfaction, as a sign of the influence of "Catholic doctrine," that at the funeral of Prince Henry of Battenberg, before the prayer of committal was read, an anthem from the liturgy of Chrysostom was sung, which included the following words:—

Give rest, O Christ, to thy servant with thy saints, where sorrow and pain are no more, neither sighing, but life everlasting.

Our contemporary hopes that the precedent once set in high places may be followed. We hope not; for this "Catholic" departure, in reality an intercession for the dead, encourages unscriptural expectations, and sanctions false ideas of human accountability. It is sad to think of the consequences of such an example set by personages in high station.

Cardinal Vaughan is maintaining the right of every English parent to have his children taught, at the public expense, the religious faith which he believes and practises. This he says, in order to secure State aid for schools managed by Roman Catholic priests! Now, what is good for England is good for other countries; but we know of no instance in which, where dominant, Rome has practised toward others the tolerant policy for which her dignitaries now plead. That parents should teach their children the faith which they personally hold, is reasonable, but that the State should pay for this being done by public agencies is not reasonable. Carried to its logical issues, the Cardinal's plan would involve as many schools as sects, and spread confusion through the land. What Rome wants, however, is clear; she wants a priest at the elbow of every teacher, in preparation for the time when she may elbow them out, and use elementary schools, as she uses her own, as instruments of tyranny, in the propagation of superstition, and the perpetuation of darkness and ignorance.

The action of the Irish party on the education question is a wedge which is splitting up the union between them and Nonconformist Liberals. The Irish party are, first and above everything, Romanist. The time has come when they can get no political advantage through union with Nonconformists; hence they throw them overboard. They believe they can get religious advantage from the party now in power; hence they join it. It is said that Mr. Dillon,

On his recent honeymoon visit to Rome, was sent for by the Pope and enjoined to give the priests the control of education.

The priests are straining every nerve to get it; and in their endeavours abuse "the Protestant Bible" with unmitigated violence. It is the old struggle renewed between a religion born of the Word of God and one born of a corrupted church; there ought to be no hesitation which side Christians should take.

It is gratifying to note that the differences between the various temperance societies as to Legislative demands, which have long divided the camp, are in the way of being merged in a desire to make common cause. Some via media ought surely to be possible, in which all the friends of sobriety may work in harmony. They have the same end in view, and sectional policies should be set aside in favour of a policy which could be pushed forward with a solid front. Divided counsels mean a weakened cause, impeded legislation, a postponed victory. The first condition of success is a thorough conviction, the second is unbroken unity throughout the ranks.

The extraordinary profits obtained in the drink trade, as well as the excessive drinking prevalent, were shown up by the Bishop of London in introducing the temperance deputation to the Prime Minister. He pointed out that whereas it took 1000 people to support a baker's shop, and 700 or 800 to maintain a butcher, both of whom deal in the necessaries of life, there was in many parts of the country a public-house to every 100 or 120 inhabitants. It is a standing disgrace that this excessive number of beershops should be permitted; and, as the Bishop of Guildford afterwards said, a debt of gratitude is due to those magistrates who try to close public-houses. He affirmed that they had partly succeeded in doing this in Hampshire, and that the result was a distinct public benefit.

The friendly memorial sent over from the Sion College Conference to the American Churches in favour of a Court of Arbitration between England and America has been cordially received on the other side. It was signed here by the official representatives of all the churches, from the Chief Rabbi to the President of the Wesleyan Conference. Pending a more formal reply, we are glad to find that the leading representatives of the American churches have written several enthusiastic letters, among whom are Dr. Barrows, of Chicago; Rev. Josiah Strong (general secretary of the Evangelical Alliance of the United States), Dr. Lyman Abbott, President Thwing, Dr. Gunsaulus and others. A town's meeting of the citizens of Chicago has been summoned by the mayor to consider the proposal of an Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty. This movement is one that every true lover of peace will further to his utmost power. The churches that contain so large a proportion of the best blood of both nations cannot find a nobler channel for the exercise of their energies.

There is one aspect of the overgrown armaments of Europe that is a little hopeful. The art of war, the more it is perfected, becomes more and more dangerous to those who take part in it. The issue of any struggle is increasingly uncertain, not only because new weapons introduce an unknown element, but because once war is declared between any two countries, it is impossible to forecast its effect in drawing others into the struggle. A German military authority has recently pointed out that there is an increasing ferocity in the spirit of war as well as in its methods. The aim of each side will be, in future, not a mere honourable victory, but utterly to crush the power of the other side that it may be able to dictate its own terms.

Curious as the paradox appears, as civilisation advances in humanity, it thus becomes more cruel in war; and yet as the preparations for war become more elaborate and finished, the dread of striking the first blow becomes more deep and salutary. As a result the forces of hatred work on the side of peace—till the first blow is struck. The moral is a great and simple one. It is a call to the peoples of Europe to the development of greater national self-restraint; to the Press to lead public opinion in a spirit of greater tolerance and concession; and to the churches that embody the Christian sentiment of every land, to use their influence with greater courage and aggressiveness on the side of righteousness and peace.

A foot passenger in the City of London might think, as he tries to get along between twelve and two o'clock, that there are a great many mischievous lads and giddy girls about, not to say anything of quiet men and women who are standing in groups or sauntering along. It is the labouring population out for dinner. Some Christian men and women have found their sphere of work among the employees in City shops and factories. There is good food provided for girls in some places at small cost, such as the "Old Welcome" in Little Britain; there is good music in other places, such as the City Temple; there are short religious services elsewhere, such as the twenty minutes service at Bishopsgate-street Chapel. The daily help is the most useful, though the weekly is also prized. The work of God may be carried on at many other than the usual days and hours and places.

The millionaire has found a friendly critic in Mr. Bernard Shaw, who has done that much-abused individual the honour of writing the first magazine article extant for his benefit. In a partly satirical survey of his trials and troubles in the current Contemporary Review, he opens up for him a distinctive mission. The difficulty of the millionaire, he thinks, is that he can do scarcely anything worthy of his resources, without pauperising society or individuals; and the only safe rule for him is to do nothing for the public which it would have to do for itself without his intervention. "Never give the people anything they want; give them something they ought to want, and don't." To do this would make him a philanthropist indeed; but, unfortunately, his interest does not often lie in that direction. Hence he is usually content to pile up fabulous sums to be squandered by his descendants in a way that works untold mischief, and does no one any good. "He heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them."

The character of our soldiers and sailors and their influence abroad are serious questions for the nation, more so than the kind of rifle they carry. To an inquiry, "Is the camp and barracks life of native or European soldiers in heathen countries demoralising?" which was sent by the Liverpool Peace Society to several missionaries, the answers are emphatically in the affirmative. One missionary says: "The influence of men-of-war's men, when ashore, is vile"; and a medical missionary in China testifies that "where a garrison of Christian (so-called) soldiers exist, missionary work is enormously handicapped." German and American sailors are blamed as well as the English. Every effort, therefore, to Christianise those who are supposed to represent Christianity should be warmly supported.

For truly Christian men have everywhere a good influence. An Indian missionary says that "good soldiers are helpful, bad a hindrance to missionary work." The sympathy between Christian sailors and missionary work is beautifully displayed in the gifts which, on three occasions, Miss Agnes Weston has sent to the L.M.S. from seamen and marines of the Royal Navy. Finding in missionaries in many lands true friends and brothers, and receiving not a little kindness at their hands, our tars have expressed their gratitude by helping a society that sent some of the missionaries abroad.

Immoral ways of conducting business and governing countries inevitably lead to poverty and distress. The farmers' distress, on account of the low price of wheat, is, it seems, due in some measure to gambling in wheat, a practice which began in America in 1876, and in this country in 1883. One expert affirms that if it had not been for the existence of this plan of dealing with "futures," the value of English wheat would never have fallen below forty shillings a quarter; and a leading agriculturist has recently expressed the same view. A Bill is therefore to be introduced into Parliament, intended to draw the line between "proper future sale and fictitious gambling"; all contracts must terminate in actual property. We shall be thankful indeed if this Bill or anything else checks gambling in trade, removes distress, and gives back to our English landscapes the rich colour of the golden corn. Green grass is pleasant, but corn in the field is a feast for the eyes.

Amid the trash that figures among the favourite books of the season, we are glad to find that the biographies of the missionaries who were massacred in China last summer have been much appreciated, of which edition after edition has been called for in a very short space of time. The value of good biographies is not sufficiently acknowledged. Fiction, especially such as is filled with questionable condiments and spices, makes the palate stale towards simpler and more nourishing food. But it is plain bread that is the staff of life: and the plain recital of the lives and words of real men and women is a thousand times more nourishing for the soul than the imaginary sorrows of beautiful nonentities.

The study of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles is now contributing evidences of the truth of Christianity. In his new work on "St. Paul, Traveller and Citizen," Professor Ramsay deals with the question of the miraculous element in the Acts. After an exhaustive examination, he has come to the conclusion that the narrative, apart from the miracles, is stamped as authentic; and, secondly, that they are an integral part of it. He further adds that Paul clearly believed himself to be the recipient of direct revelations from God, that he was guided and controlled in his plans by direct interposition of the Holy Spirit, and that he was enabled to move the forces of nature in a way that ordinary men cannot. Nor can we think Paul, or the writer of the Acts, who Professor Ramsay says was unquestionably St. Luke, was a mere victim of hallucinations. Whereas twenty years ago he found it easy to dispose of the miracles in the Acts, Professor Ramsay is now forced, on grounds of evidence, to believe in them.

Publishers of religious books seem to be favouring, and they do well to favour, small works on experimental religion. Many of these may be doomed to an early burial in obscurity; a few may continue to be read for a decade or two; and one, in the course of a century, may be found to possess enduring qualities. The larger portion have a mission for their day; the elect few are books for all time and peoples. The "Imitation," "Pilgrim's Progress," "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying," Augustine's "Confessions," will never wear out; genius and piety guarantee their immortality. Few, if any, others seem likely to take rank with them, yet a small book which treats wisely and sympathetically of the great questions of the soul's relations to God is of more use than learned quartos.

In his little book on "The Four Temperaments," Dr. Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh, points out, under the head "The Phlegmatic Temperament," one of the besetting sins of many ministers. That is dilatoriness in the performance of duties that are capable of being postponed from day to day. Both in pastoral work and in preparation for the pulpit, this is fatally easy to men of easy-going disposition. A striking picture is drawn of a week's procrastination and its consequences. Nothing but punctual performance of the daily routine, systematic study of the Word during fixed hours, and a businesslike adherence to each hour's duties, will overcome this temptation. The man of business is bound by his office hours and fixed engagements; the Christian minister is a law unto himself, and for that very reason should see that he is filled with the passion of earnest, faithful, and unremitting toil. Otherwise his very freedom will prove the most ignoble bondage.

Stones for Bread.

NO HELP FOR ARMENIA!
NO HOPE OF TEMPERANCE REFORM!

TRULY Lord Salisbury has struck minor chords which will reverberate with a dismal echo in the hearts of all who desire that God should be honoured in the home and foreign relations of our national life. It is not a question of this party or of that. There are many among the supporters of the present Government who are distressed at the Premier's decisions, as there are also, no doubt, among his political opponents many who are led by their interests to applaud them. It is not the mission of this paper to take sides in politics as such, but there arise from time to time occasions when the Christian conscience must declare itself, whether against the horse-racing proclivities of one Prime Minister or the easy-going time-serving of another.

Small wonder is it that Lord Salisbury's "Nonconformist speech" has greatly pleased the Sultan, who has sent a personal message of thanks to him; and it has given undisguised delight to the official party at the Porte. It is openly spoken of there as a signal confession of English diplomatic failure. Meanwhile, it has filled the surviving Armenians with despair. In this country a feeling of shame has throbbled in the breast of the nation at the heartless abandonment of a stricken race. It is a hideous and intolerable blot upon the honour of England, that a God-fearing and God-loving people, whose tenacity of their faith puts us to the blush, should be forsaken in the hour of its extremity by a "concert" of so-called Christian nations.

That we have obligations to other Governments we do not dispute, but the wording of our treaties stood the same in November as it does to-day. Why, then, did Lord Salisbury raise hopes which he now declares are impossible of fulfilment, thereby blocking for three months action which, had the truth then been revealed, might have been taken in other directions? We may yet have to acknowledge that we have also obligations to the Lord of the nations, the Most High, to whom the blood of his martyred saints calls aloud for vengeance.

Then as to temperance legislation, the Prime Minister, though courteous to the C.E.T.S. deputation, was frankly antagonistic to its appeal, and Mr. Balfour was politely vague. Lord Salisbury believes in no restrictive legislation beyond what would involve "raising the character of the accommodation afforded, and therefore of increasing the respectability." In other words making facilities for drunkenness respectable. There rests the gravest responsibility upon the head of our Government to legislate in the direction of temperance reform, which, from a financial as well as a moral standpoint, is of the highest importance to the nation. We can only hope that Parliament will not be many days old before some decided expressions of opinion will be made to influence our leaders toward a better mind. It has been said that "the Government floated in on beer, and does not mean to float out on water." Let us hope they will disarm such unfriendly criticism. Meantime, it is not enough for us, as Christians, to blame official inaction. Now, more than ever, is it our duty to join hands and hearts in unceasing endeavours. Those that are "ready to perish," from drink or Turk, call piteously for succour. May God stir the nation to respond, and thus transpose the minor chords of hopelessness into the major harmonies of prosperity and peace.

Athaliah.—I.

THE RESULTS OF WORLDLY ALLIANCE.

By PASTOR F. E. MARSH.

AS THE TREES by the lakeside are mirrored in the water, so New Testament truth is seen in Old Testament incident. Where we may not take the incidents and characters of the Old Testament as actual types, we may use them as illustrations. The story of Athaliah thus illustrates the cause, the career, and the culmination of evil, and the curse which such persons bring on themselves and upon others by their conduct.

Athaliah was the daughter of the wicked King Ahab. Her mother was the idolatrous and cruel Jezebel. Athaliah married Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat. After the death of Jehoram, his son Ahaziah reigned in his stead for one year. Both father and son were influenced to an evil course of conduct by Athaliah (2 Chron. xxi. 6; xxii. 2, 3). When she found that Ahaziah, her son, was dead, she determined to destroy all the seed royal to gain the kingdom for herself (2 Kings xi. 1); but she was frustrated in her design, for Jehosheba hid the infant son of Ahaziah in the Temple.* While Joash is growing up, Jehoiada, the priest, in a secret manner informs the priests and a number of soldiers of the presence of the infant king. Then, on a given occasion, Joash is proclaimed king. Athaliah, hearing the acclamations of the people, wonders what it all means, and when she is told, she exclaims, "Treason! treason!" She is hurried from the precincts of the Temple and is slain. Thus ended the career of a cruel and wicked woman. She reaped what she sowed, and fell into a pit that she had dug for others.

There are many lessons which are suggested and illustrated in the brief sketch of this wicked woman. I direct special attention to one, namely—Athaliah's presence and power in Judah were

THE OUTCOME OF AN UNHOLY ALLIANCE.

Many good men have made great mistakes which have been fruitful of much evil. For example, when Jehoshaphat came to the throne of Judah, he "strengthened himself against the King of Israel" (2 Chron. xvii. 1), but in an evil moment he "joined affinity" with Ahab (xviii. 1) in war against Ramoth-Gilead (xviii. 3), and nearly lost his life (31). Association with the ungodly always means danger, damage, and distress to the servant of God.

(2) Jehoshaphat joined himself with Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, in a commercial undertaking to make ships to send to Tarshish, but the ships were broken on their first voyage, and never reached their destination (2 Chron. xx. 35-37). Loss and damage again to Jehoshaphat; but he learnt a lesson, for he would not proceed in the unholy partnership (1 Kings xxii. 48, 49). (3) Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, forms an alliance with the house of Ahab by marrying the daughter of Ahab (2 Chron. xxi. 6), who is Athaliah (2 Chron. xxii. 2). Doubtless, through Jehoshaphat's intimacy with Ahab she got to know Jehoram; hence the house of the wicked king of Israel becomes identified with that of Jehoshaphat. From this unequal yoke Ahaziah is born, who reigns for one year in Judea after the death of his father. When Ahaziah dies, Athaliah determines to kill all the seed royal, and reign over Judah herself. These are the links in the chain. Her wicked life is traceable to the blunder of Jehoshaphat. By forming an alliance with the house of Ahab he brought a blight upon himself and his house.

Do not parents—Christian parents—often make the same mistake when they endeavour to make "good matches" for their children? Alas! as someone has said, many of them turn out to be "lucifer matches." Better a humble cottage in the Lord, than a palace in the world.

Rallying Points.

VI.—VIGILANCE.]

"LET US WATCH."—1 Thess. v. 6.

"Watch well the fort, guard every part,
But most the traitor in thy heart."

OVER and over again are we urged to "watch" as well as to pray—urged by the very lips of our Lord Himself! Yet how slow are we to do it!

Even by our own confession, we are "thrown off our guard," or, in other words, we are not sufficiently careful to be "found in Him" when temptation finds us, as it certainly will find us, whether or not we are prepared for its assaults.

Is there in our hearts an unexpressed feeling that we have, perhaps, passed beyond the need of watching, that it is a thing incompatible with the higher experiences of Christian life? Nay, but let us listen to the Master's own word, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch" (Mark xiii. 37). "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching" (Luke xii. 37).

Our security in seasons of spiritual danger does not indeed depend upon our vigilance—pitiable were our condition if it did! but we are, not the less, living in disobedience if we are living unwatchful lives.

"Hear, above all, hear thy Lord,
Him thou lovest to obey;
Hide within thy heart his word,
'Watch and pray.'"

Many benefits which result from vigilance will readily occur to us; but there are others which can only be unfolded to us as we obey the loving command, "Watch."

Nor let us think it is only for trial and temptation that we are to watch. That were truly an unworthy thought! Let us, just as eagerly, be on the outlook for blessing. "Watch and pray" must certainly mean this, as well as other things, that we are to watch for the answer to our prayers. How much we miss through the lack of a holy expectancy. What would not the heavenly Father give to his children if He could see their hearts firmly and fully set on receiving the blessings for which they plead!

An earthly parent hesitates to disappoint the child who is full of trustful anticipations, based on his love and power. The weary, toil-stained father would trudge cheerfully another mile or two rather than bring a shadow over the baby face pressed against the window-pane in eager hope of some promised trifle. "How much more" will the Heavenly Father do for those who wait for Him. "My expectation is from Him" is perhaps the most impregnable position a human soul can occupy.

"Not only wait, but watch!

Pray at the door of hope and sing,
Faith's finger on the latch."

Above all, let us watch for the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let our ears be ever alert to catch the sound of his approaching chariot-wheels. Let us, by earnest expectancy as well as by loving labour, "hasten the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Shall we give the world occasion to think that we are indifferent to the many signs of his return? Shall we practically give the lie to our professed belief that his reiterated promise, "I come quickly," nears its fulfilment? God forbid!

No subject could possibly be more important and more practical than this one. Let us by loving watchfulness "prepare the way of the Lord," and make it our rallying cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him."

"We are watching, we are waiting,
For the glorious King of day;
For the Chiefest of ten thousand,
For the Life, the Truth, the Way."

Pondering those words in Isaiah xxxv. 8, "the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein," a servant of Christ was led by them—or rather by Him who spake them—to visit an asylum, and speak the words of peace to those of the inmates who would listen to them. Amongst these was an old lady whose extreme restlessness had made her a most trying patient. She eagerly listened to the sweet story of old, and was won by the Love that came to this poor world to seek and save the lost ones. Not only so, but she drank in the good news that He who came once to die is coming again to receive his own to Himself, to live with Him in his own bright home. When Mr. — paid his next visit to the place, he found this aged one sitting, as he firmly believes, at the feet of Jesus, but he found her also watching. At the window she sat, gazing (like those who saw Him go up) for "this same Jesus" to return. In her simplicity she had taken the words very literally indeed; and her attendant stated that all the former restlessness had subsided. "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple" (Ps. cxix. 130). Her heart was at rest, and her poor troubled mind had fixed itself on the bright hope of his appearing, "whom, not having seen," she loved.

"I want to be the very first to welcome Him" were her own simple but beautiful words of explanation; and tears of love and joy flowed down the aged cheeks as she spoke of Him. Day by day, as the months wore on, found her still at the window, still waiting and watching for her coming Lord.

Is there, nothing in this simple but true incident which rebukes our own slothfulness?

Are our eyes as eagerly bent on the red streaks across the dawn? To his assurance "I come quickly" is there ever the fitting response, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus"?

"Lord, we are growing older, the days and years have fled;
And time and change have done their work; and some we loved are dead.

But the Day is nearer now,

Far nearer—

And the signs of thine approach

Far clearer!

"Lord, make us ever ready, as each day hurries by,
To raise the welcome shout of joy, "The Lord, our King is nigh!"

For the Day is nearer now,

Far nearer—

And the signs of thine approach

Far clearer!"

LUCY A. BENNETT.

Seamen's Christian Friend Society.—At this society's headquarters in Ratcliff-highway, Mr. George Lampard recently presided at the annual meeting of the "Gospel Pioneer Band," when an excellent report was given of the year's open-air work by the secretary, Mr. Joseph Kidd. Many members of the band, including Christian seamen, took part in the meeting. On Thursday last the monthly muster of the "Christian Harbour Lights" was addressed by Mr. H. W. Maynard, of Wimbledon. Rev. G. J. Hill, Captain Blackburne, Mr. W. J. Cairns, and other workers gave encouraging accounts of the progress of the mission.

* Josephus says:—"Coming to the palace, where Athaliah's executioners were murdering all the rest, Jehosheba found Joash, an infant of about a year old, amongst the dead bodies of the slain, which, it seems, had been concealed by the nurse."

Conditions of Sainthood.—I.

By REV. SAMUEL PEARSON, M.A.,
Broughton Park Church, Manchester.

IN addressing Christian people on this subject there is one condition which must be made clear, viz., that they are bound to aim high. They have entered into bonds with Christ to live after his commandments; and they cannot release themselves from this liability by any reference to what is the level of conduct and purpose among their fellow disciples. Indeed, most of our difficulties would be removed were we earnestly and persistently to take our life-plan from the "pattern on the Mount." But it must be evident to our own hearts and to the consciousness of others that this is what we are very loth to do. There are some books we are afraid to read, some preachers we are afraid to hear, some claims we are disinclined to listen to, because they would make a demand upon us which we are not ready to meet. This state of mind is fatal, at the outset, to any great attainments in the Christian life. For, as George Herbert says:—

*Sink not in spirit: who aimeth at the sky
Shoots higher much than he that means a tree.*

It is this inward ambition which is essential to high attainment: its presence means inspiration, and that spontaneous response to all God's calls which forms the good ground for the seed of his Word. But, besides this general consideration, there are some particular ones which are also necessary to the attainment of "holiness." These may be arranged under three divisions for the purposes of thought, though in conduct they are all united.

1. THERE ARE SPIRITUAL CONDITIONS OF SAINTHOOD.

Here we are confronted at once by a phrase which is of great value, but which needs explanation and enlargement—"the life of faith." If faith is used to cover all the faculties which must be employed in order to live the Christian life, it is a word so large that it needs analysis and amplification; and if it is narrowed down to a mere passive "trust," then it requires to be supplemented by other terms. We must be masters of our phrases, and not let them master us. The Christian life might be described very appropriately as "the life of love"; but we should then have to be very careful to lay stress on the beliefs of the mind, and on the activities of the "daily round." Faith is indeed one of the greatest words of the Bible: it is so because it refers to a faculty of the soul which unites us to God for ever, and also because it is used in such manifold ways to describe our duties, our privileges, and our possessions. A glance at the Subject-Index of the Oxford Bible, under the heading of Faith, will show this at a glance. It is objective for the truth for which we have to contend; it is subjective for the apprehension on our part of that truth; it is active in relation to the works which we have to perform; it is passive as far as the trust in Christ which we have to exercise is concerned.

The Christian's vocabulary should be varied and rich. He may rightly call his course the "life of prayer"; for as the body is sustained by incessant breathing, so the soul-life is made possible by constant supplication. But it would be unwise so to fix the mind on this supreme duty of prayer as to forget everything else. The doctrine of justification by faith emerged into prominence through the stress of controversy; and that of sanctification by faith has become necessary in order to rebuke sharply the twofold modern tendency to lean on form or mere morality for the power of the "inward man."

Naturalism and formalism both rob us of the living Christ; and it was time that we were reminded that neither by works nor by rites could we be perfected, but only by Christ working in our hearts by faith. But all lines of thought if pursued exclusively tend to run to seed; and they then become half errors, because they omit the truths which are complementary. And it has been so with this use of the word "faith." Yet how infinitely precious the word is! We must not allow it to be monopolised by any school; but we must be careful to show that, rightly understood, it includes the due exercise of all the spiritual faculties with which we have been endowed.

And we ought to accustom ourselves to a variety of phrase, so as to see our duties in manifold lights. Is faith the hand by which we lay hold of Christ and of unseen realities? Then prayer is the mouth by which we speak to and for God, moved and helped by the indwelling Spirit. Love will be the heart beating in healthy rhythm the blood of new purposes through the whole being. Hope will be the eye ever looking forward to fresh enterprises and to new victories. Work will be the feet of the soul moving swiftly and readily on the road of active service for God and man. Meditation will be the ear of the saintly mind drinking in fresh messages from the Divine oracles. And the enlightened and developing conscience will be the sense of smell, disgusted with the ill savour of respectable wickedness, and allured by the sweet odours of those flowers of grace which are to be found in the garden of the Lord! It is not one faculty alone that is active in such a case as this, but the whole inner man, alive and energetic toward God and toward man. If this be the "life of faith," it is one which we need to see more and more in all the churches of Christ at the present day.

(To be concluded.)

A Penny a Week.

REV. THOMAS EVANS, who has recently returned from India, writes:—As I am just now in full work endeavouring to stimulate our churches in Wales to a higher standard of devotion on behalf of work, both spiritually and fiscally, it may afford others a hint if I say that as to money matters I have so far been able to work the "penny a week" system successfully.

Little and often is, I think, the best way to secure enlarged contributions for mission work, and while one penny a week is not a burden to anyone, a goodly number of names for this easy and small sum weekly mounts up to a considerable sum in the year, as a hundred names secures in twelve months no less than £20.

That can usually be given in addition to the ordinary collections and subscriptions. In most of the churches in Glamorganshire that I have so far visited, I have secured on an average fifty names, which means, in each case, £10 in addition to the ordinary contributions.

In Wales it is the common custom for the few to give 2s. 6d. subscriptions, while the great bulk of the people drop one penny a year in the annual collection. The best way to get out of this old low-level rule is to ask for one penny a week, which no one can deem a burden, but which if secured in goodly numbers will double the usual contributions and maintain week by week a lively interest in the good cause and a desire to pray for its success.

Did we but secure one-tenth of the weekly pennies spent on tobacco and alcohol, we should soon have abundance of funds to evangelise the whole world. Let us give the system a fair trial, and ask the Divine blessing to rest upon it, and upon those who contribute.

Liverpool Town Mission.

ANOTHER year's work among the masses of this great city has gone. We have held our two annual meetings—one for the general public, which was well attended, and the other for our volunteer workers. The first was presided over by Mr. Thomas Matheson, J.P., a noble Christian citizen, and the second had for its chairman Mr. A. Guthrie, a son of the late Dr. Guthrie, and himself in the front of all good work.

The meeting of the volunteers was a grand sight. There were over 600 present from our twenty-five mission halls, the most of them the fruit of the Mission. When Mr. Guthrie rose to address the meeting, he frankly told us "that till that moment he had no idea that the Liverpool City Mission was so strong, as represented in these 600 picked workers." Rev. C. Musgrave Brown, vicar of Bevington, gave a special address to those thus gathered, and God wonderfully made him a mouth-piece. "The sight of so many earnest and happy faces," he said, "had made a great impression upon him."

This Mission has now been working in Liverpool for sixty-seven years, and it never was more used of God to the salvation of souls than it is to-day. The staff was never more consecrated, so anxious to do all in their power to advance the glory of God. Not a few of them are "out-and-out" Christians. Their private meetings for prayer, and their hours of waiting upon God, all indicate hearts on fire. One told us the other day, in a public meeting, he had been in the midst of the earnest prayer meetings which were held in Scotland in the days of the Revival; but the prayer meetings he was now witnessing, "were such taking hold upon God, that they were beyond anything he had ever seen or felt."

The results have been seen in almost all the districts. Visiting has been easier, more fruitful, and the gatherings in the mission halls large, solemn, and awaking, as with tears the preacher has appealed to his hearers to be reconciled to God.

Those who have been hopefully converted are from all classes, the young and old. A lad of fifteen, "known for his fearful swearing," now takes part in prayer. An old man, seventy-nine, wrote thus in his Bible, "Saved, by the grace of God, our Heavenly Father, through faith in Christ Jesus, our blessed Lord and Saviour. Sunday, November 17, 1895. Welcome Mission Hall." Others have been brought in, in their drink. Wreckers of homes, both men and women, have been changed, and wrecked lives have been saved, and taught to save others.

As this Mission is a mission to the city, all sorts of Christian work is undertaken. The men at the docks are visited, where not less than 1200 are seen each week, and many an earnest word spoken to these sons of toil. The public-houses and lodging-houses are regularly visited. Also all the cabmen of the city, and several of the adjoining districts. The weekly visits to the hospitals are often times of blessing, and our work among the railway men is encouraging. From 500 to 600 meetings are held monthly, with an average attendance of 30,000, and our aggregate attendance at children's services and Sunday-schools for last year was 250,000.

This work could be greatly extended, if the funds would allow us to occupy districts which are at present vacant, and where house-to-house visitation is greatly needed: for whatever other work we do, this "house-to-house" work is ever our chief business, and our most fruitful field.

J. BARNABAS BAIN, Superintendent.

The Dock Labourers' Mission, which seeks to sow the good seed amongst the masses of poor, starving men, women, and children around the docks and wharves in East London, has issued its report. After reference to the bitter cry for food and fuel last winter, which demanded the utmost efforts to meet the intense suffering, it is stated that, "In addition to daily visits among the men at the docks, wharves, etc., we visit above 200 homes weekly and leave a word of comfort, books, tracts, etc., for the women and children. During the past year the Lord's servants were kind enough to supply us with above 30,000 tracts and books, the greater portion of which have been distributed amongst these poor people, and the Lord has led sinners to repentance by means of these." The superintendent is Mr. C. Coleman, 150, Boletyn-road, West Ham, E.

King David and His Psalms.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANIA.

WARFARE AND FAMINE.

(Concluded.)

WHERE, then, and how, has David kept his promise of singing to Jehovah a new song upon the ten-stringed harp? There can be no doubt but that this takes place in Psalm xxxiii., which alone among the "new songs" in the Psalter (Psalms xvi., xviii., and cxlix.) is called a new song on the ten-stringed harp.* This song consists of two parts, comprising altogether twenty-two verses after the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet: it aspires thereby to a certain wholeness and completeness. Clearly it exactly suits the times and their conditions; the first section (4-11), after the prologue with its exhortation to praise, refers to the counsel and devices of the heathen, which Jehovah with his fast-standing counsel will now bring to naught. In the second section (12-19) it is pointed out that Jehovah will also deliver from death and famine. As in Ps. cxliv. 10 reference is made to the salvation of the king, so in Ps. xxxiii. 16 the same thought is repeated in the words, "there is no king saved by the multitude of an host"; and Ps. cxliv. 15 is in effect repeated in Ps. xxxiii. 12. The epilogue is an appeal for a proof of Jehovah's favour towards those who wait for, and hope and trust in Him, and by the use of "our" and "we" David includes himself with the community of believers.

PSALM XXXIII.

1. Rejoice in Jehovah, O ye righteous,
For the upright praise is comely.
2. Give thanks unto Jehovah with harp,
On a ten-stringed psalter sing praises to Him.
3. Sing unto him a new song,
Play skilfully with a loud noise.

PART I.

- 1.
4. For the word of Jehovah is right,
And all his work is done in faithfulness.
5. He loves righteousness and justice;
Of Jehovah's lovingkindness the earth is full.
6. By the word of Jehovah the heavens were made,
And all their host by the breath of his mouth.
7. He gathers as an heap the waters of the sea;
He lays up the deep in storehouses.
- 2.
8. Let all the earth fear Jehovah;
Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of Him.
9. For He—He spoke, and it was,
He—He commanded, and it stood.
10. Jehovah brings the counsel of the nations to naught;
He makes the thoughts of the peoples to be of none effect.
11. The counsel of Jehovah stands fast for ever;
The thoughts of his heart to all generations.

PART II.

- 1.
12. Blessed is the nation whose God is Jehovah,
The people He has chosen for his own inheritance.
13. From heaven Jehovah looks down;
He beholds all the sons of men.
14. From the place of his habitation He looks forth
Upon all the inhabitants of the earth.
15. He that fashions the hearts of them all,
Who considers all their works.
- 2.
16. There is no king saved by a powerful army;
A mighty man is not delivered by great strength.
17. A horse is a vain thing for safety.
Neither shall he deliver any by his great power.
18. Behold the eye of Jehovah is on them that fear Him;
Upon them that hope in his mercy

* The heading "By David" certainly is omitted, but in the midst of a collection of purely Davidic Psalms (ii.-xli) this cannot throw doubt on the Davidic authorship, which so signally confirms itself. The Septuagint has added "By David." In three other psalms of this same series (x., lxvi., lxvii.), the heading "By David" is omitted, for the same reason, as will be shown later.

19. To deliver their soul from death,
And to keep them alive in famine.

20. Our soul waits for Jehovah,
He is our help and our shield;
21. For in Him shall our heart rejoice,
Because we have trusted in his holy name.
22. Let thy mercy, O Jehovah, be upon us,
According as we have hoped in Thee!

That which qualifies this song for the designation "new" is the fact that, in the midst of dangers from the heathen (10) and the famine (19), dangers threatening as never before, David is able, in the prologue, in the full conviction of the hearing of his prayer, to exhort the righteous and upright to praise. In the epilogue, it is further shown who these "righteous" are.

The saying of St. John, "And if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him" (1 John v. 15), really appears here for the first time, and becomes a truth in David's prayers. Through the declaration that God is worthy to be praised in the kingdom of grace (4) and in the kingdom of nature (6), David attains his object of praising Him as the invincible ruler in history (10). Through the word of grace (4) and through the creation (6), he is led on to a consideration of Jehovah's counsel and thoughts (11). As Jehovah's word of grace is right, and his word of creation almighty, so is his counsel unchangeable. Herein is the guarantee that Jehovah must and will frustrate the thoughts and counsels of the heathen, as He does now those of the Philistines in their desire to crush Israel. That this threatened evil should happen is at variance with the covenant of Jehovah with his people from generation to generation, which is just as sure as the right and true word of Jehovah, whose works are "done in truth" (4), and through whose love of righteousness and justice the earth is filled with goodness (5). The whole of the earth, all the inhabitants of the world, must therefore stand in awe of Jehovah (8), who through his creative word (9) called into being the heavens and their host of stars, the ocean and its depths.

In the second part, with a retrospective glance at Ps. cxliv. 15, David speaks of Israel as blessed, and of her people as the chosen of Jehovah for an inheritance. He places them side by side with all the children of Adam—all the inhabitants of the earth. Since Jehovah beholds all, regards all, considers all their works—He also fashions the hearts of all—Israel's hope and trust must not be in the great power of the king, or in the strength of mighty men, much less in that of horses, in which the Philistines put their trust (comp. Ps. xx. 7); nay, it must be in Jehovah, whose eye is always upon his own inheritance (18), upon them that fear Him and that hope in his mercy. He now fastens his eye upon them with the special object, which just at this time is so greatly required, namely, of delivering them from death in the war and from famine in the land (19). David finally makes the people speak themselves (20-22), with distinct reference to the great words in Deut. xxxiii. 29:—

"Happy art thou, O Israel;
Who is like unto thee?
O people, saved by Jehovah,
The shield of thy help,
And the sword of thy excellency."

The people are to say: "He is our help and our shield." As the two sides of the true religious life of the Israelites is characterised in verses 1 and 18, so it is again here in the words which tell of the waiting for Jehovah, the rejoicing in Him, as well as trusting in his name, and hoping in Him. To fear Jehovah, to rejoice in Him, and trust in Him, leads to that which is now demanded—always to hope in his mercy, to wait for Him, and hope in Him. The answer may be long in coming, but the exciting pain of expectation is more than balanced by the joy of confidence. This is looking into the eye of mercy, the eye that rests on Israel. JEHOVAH'S

WORD (4) AND COUNSEL (11)—JEHOVAH'S INHERITANCE (12) AND EYE (18), might be inscribed over this psalm. Well may it be called A NEW SONG!

Upon the two psalms, cxliv. and xxxiii., David looks back in Ps. lxvi. 17 in the words: "I cried unto Him with my mouth (Ps. cxliv.), and He was praised with my tongue" (Ps. xxxiii.).

Testimony to Israel.

HEBREW-CHRISTIAN Testimony to Israel is the title of the work prosecuted by Revs. D. Baron and C. A. Schönberger, and that title implies a method as well as a sphere of work. Though some Jews may appreciate the solicitude of Gentiles whom they have learned to respect, generally speaking they do not listen to non-Jews with the same interest as they do to brethren according to the flesh, who, with true sympathy, and from a loving heart, are able to say—"Jesus, whom ye slew, hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins; and we are witnesses of these things." The sphere, too, is as broad as the method is definite. Wherever there are Jews who have not yet heard the Gospel of the grace of God, there is a sphere for effort on the part of those who have found the Messiah and wish to pass on the good news.

On Thursday last, meetings were held, afternoon and evening, in the Mission Hall, 114, Whitechapel-road, E., in celebration of the anniversary of the work. At the earlier gathering, Mr. J. E. MATHIESON presided, and, after reading portions of Holy Scripture (Isaiah lxx. 18-25, lx. 21, lxii. 12), spoke of God's purpose regarding Israel as revealed in the prophetic Scriptures, and thanked God for the work done by Messrs. Baron and Schönberger at home and abroad. Among those who hoped to attend but were not able, was Pastor Archibald G. Brown, who in his letter of regret for absence, said that his love and prayer for Israel deepened week by week. As it was, there was a goodly array of speakers, while the auditory was larger than the Mission Hall could accommodate, so some had to retire to ante-rooms.

Mr. BARON described at some length the work of the year. The evangelistic meetings had been well attended, also the Bible-class gatherings held every evening. The aim of the mission in East London is to raise up a band of Hebrew Christians with regard to whose character and testimony there shall be no doubt, who, among their brethren, may be a power for good, because of Jesus in the heart as well as on the lip. Thus the name of the Lord will not, as is frequently the case, be blasphemed, and confession of Christ will not be a stumbling-block to others. Viewed on a wider scale, the work knows no local limitations: wherever there are Jews it recognises a sphere of testimony. Hence Mr. Baron briefly outlined his work in Great Britain generally, and in several continental countries. Mr. A. BOAKE, treasurer, rejoiced to say that the needs of the work had hitherto been met. The premises are already too small, and he intimated a willingness to receive special help towards enlargement.

Rev. Dr. GRITTON followed with a few Gentile words to Gentile Christians, based on Rom. xi. 13, 14. He pointed out that the Church was intended to be a channel of mercy to the children of Abraham. Pastor JAMES STEPHENS, of Highgate, commended the work very warmly. The fact that the enemy had been organising disturbance outside the Mission Hall was to him a good sign, showing that advance was being made upon the kingdom of ignorance and sin. He sought to encourage the workers to rejoice and be strong in the Lord.

A pleasant meeting was held in the evening, at which an address was delivered by Rev. C. A. Schönberger, and other friends spoke cheering words. This meeting was mainly occupied with prayer for blessing on the work.

Salonica, Turkey.—The great need of this place is a home to which the seamen of the Mediterranean Fleet, and any merchant seamen who may visit this port, could go instead of being led into the public-houses, of which there are many. Our great prayer is that an institute or home may be opened for this purpose. Further information could be obtained from Dr. House, American Missionary, Salonica, Turkey.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, February 16.

"A WITNESS BETWEEN US AND YOU."—Josh. xxii. 27.

THE two tribes and a half made the mistake which all Christendom has made since. They endeavoured to erect an outward symbol of unity in this altar. They hoped that it would secure them from excision from the rest of Israel. They sought to make a unity, instead of accepting this as a fact, and endeavouring to manifest it by three pilgrimages a year to God's altar at Shiloh.

Similarly, some Christians set up a church, a system, a creed, and mode of worship, and maintain that the Divine unity can only be realised in connection with one or other of these. You must be a votary at their altar of Ed, or you run the risk of the sin of schism. They substitute an outward for an inward unity, a mechanical for a vital spiritual fellowship.

If we belong to Christ, we belong to one another. The Church, with all its members, is one vine, one body, one family, and therefore we have to manifest, rather than to make the unity, of which our Lord thought so much in his intercessory prayer.

We are one in the thought of the Father, one in the redemption of the Son, one in the possession of indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Let us be one in our relations to others, pitying, loving, aiding each other, forgiving and restoring, avoiding unkind comparisons and criticisms, remembering that the failure or success of one is that of all, and endeavouring to hasten the hour when the oneness of the Church shall compel the world to believe that the Father sent the Son.

MONDAY, February 17.

"TAKE GOOD HEED UNTO YOURSELVES, THAT YE LOVE THE LORD YOUR GOD."—Josh. xxiii. 11.

We may love God from four parts of our nature (Luke x. 27). From the heart, the seat of the emotions; from the soul, the seat of individuality or will; in the strength of our activities; and in the mind, the organ of thought and intelligence. Some natures are more prone to one, and others to another. Each is a gate into the metropolis of Love, or by which the love of God may enter us. And it is of small consequence which gate you use, so long as you use one, and in this way enter the city.

Many people are accustomed to impute love to the heart only, instead of associating it also with other departments of the inner life. Because you have no emotion of love, you therefore conclude that you do not love. But there may be the love of soul, wherein the will crowns Christ as King; or the love of the strength, wherein all the energy of life revolves around Jesus; or the love of the mind, in which all thought is brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Choose which you will.

But we must take heed to ourselves. The love of God will come naturally and easily in us as the fruit of the Spirit, unless we do anything to mar or hinder it. Take heed to your speech, acts, intentions, volitions, affections; watch and pray; keep yourselves in the love of God; love one another and so abide in his love; and in you also the love of God will be perfected.

TUESDAY, February 18.

"YE CANNOT SERVE THE LORD."—Josh. xxiv. 19.

It seemed as though Joshua sought to damp down the enthusiasm of the people. They were all on fire to serve, but he repressed their ardour, crying, "Back, back! This is no place for you." We are reminded of a precise analogy in the Gospels, where our Saviour said to Peter and the rest, "Ye cannot follow Me now" (John xiii. 31-38). Why this Divine reluctance?

The answer is clear, when we consider the sequel in each case. In the one, we have only to turn a page in our Bibles, to come on all the disobedience, anarchy, and backsliding of the Book of Judges; in the other we see that Peter denied and the rest forsook Him. How obviously it was shown that there was a moral incompatibility between their self-confident assertions and the service of the Holy God. But this incompatibility was present to the Spirit's discernment when these strong asseverations were made, first by the Israelites, and secondly by the Apostles.

So it becomes us to speak very reverently and leniently of our ability to obey. We are probably over-estimating our powers. We are like a man, recovering from long sickness, who thinks that he can walk across his room, but finds that he lacks the strength. Created might wanes and fails beneath the searching demands of the Holy One. We need that God should give what we cannot earn by our own endeavour. Lying low at his feet, let us ask Him to work in us to will and do of his good pleasure, content to work out as He may enable us.

WEDNESDAY, February 19.

"THE CANAANITES WOULD DWELL IN THAT LAND."—Judges i. 27.

How persistent evil habits are! They have dwelt in our lives so long that they dislike being dislodged. Why should they quit their dwelling-place, and go out into the void? Sometimes, at the beginning of our Christian life, we make a feeble effort against them, and hope to cast them out, but they stubbornly resist. Whenever a remonstrance is addressed to us, we are apt to reply, "Do not find fault, we couldn't help it." These Canaanites are self-willed and persistent, they would dwell in the land.

But the one point that Israel should have borne in mind was that they had no right there. The land was not theirs, it had become Israel's. And, moreover, God was prepared to drive them out, so that his people would have no fighting to do, but only to chase a flying foe. One man was to chase a thousand (Josh. xxiii. 10).

So these evil habits have no right to persist in the believer's life. The whole soil of his heart has been made over to the Son of God, and there should be no part left to weeds. "Sin shall not have dominion over you," said the Apostle. Nor is this all. The Holy Spirit is prepared to lust against the flesh, that we may not fulfil it in the lusts thereof, or do the things we otherwise would. There is a complete deliverance possible to all who will open their hearts to the might of the Spirit of God. Talk no more of these Canaanites who would stay in the land; but say of the blessed Spirit, "He is well able to drive them out."

THURSDAY, February 20.

"THE LORD RAISED THEM UP JUDGES."—Judges ii. 18.

This was better than nothing. It was better to have even the fitful gleam of deliverance than to settle down under a monotony of servitude; but how much better it would have been if their national history had been a steady progression from one degree of prosperity to another, like the sun rising towards the perfect day. It was of God's kindness and grace that the judges created these temporary respites; it was the fault of their own infidelity and sin that they were not always delivered.

This fitful life is too often the experience of the believer. We have our Gideons, and Baraks, and Samsons, times of revival, times of deep and blessed experience, followed by backsliding and relapse; times when the flood-tide of grace rises high in our soul, to be succeeded by the ebb, with long stretches of desert sand. Thank God for the judges, but be on the alert for the reign of the kings, for David and Solomon, Josiah and Hezekiah—for the reign of the King.

The days of the judges were those in which there was no king over Israel. The fitfulness of our experience is often attributable to our failure to recognise the kingship of Jesus. We worship other gods, the gods of the nations around; the idols of the market-place, the studio, the camp, and the bar. The aims and practices of the worldly and ungodly too much engross our thoughts, and sway our behaviour. Alas for us! Is it strange that God leaves us to reap much bitterness, recalling us when He can, but longing to be able to do some permanent work of salvation and edification?

FRIDAY, February 21.

"I HAVE A MESSAGE FROM GOD FOR THEE."—Judges iii. 20.

God's messages are often secret.—When Eglon was assured that Ehud had brought a Divine message, which could only be delivered in secret, "a secret errand" (R.V.), he fearlessly bade all his retinue go forth from the audience chamber. And in utter loneliness the one passed to the other the message of death. So there are crises in our lives, when God's messengers bring us the secret message, in which none can intrude or interfere. We must listen and obey, each alone and for himself. This is specially so in the death chamber.

God's messages must be received with reverence.—When Ehud said, "I have a message for thee," Eglon rose out of his seat. This was a mark of respect, the attitude of attention. It is with similar awe that we should ever wait for the revelation of the Divine will. "What saith my Lord unto his servant?"

God's messages leap out from unexpected quarters.—Ehud was left-handed, his sword was therefore on his right side, and he appeared unarmed. No one dreamed of looking for his sword, except on his left side; he was therefore allowed to pass unchallenged into the presence of the king. So Nathan strode into David's presence, who thought his sin was undiscovered, and said, "Thou art the man." Cultivate this surprise with sinners.

God's messages are sharp as a two-edged sword, and cause death.—A scimitar is sharp at the edge and blunt at the back to strike, whilst a two-edged sword is made to pierce. God's Word pierces as a two-edged sword to the dividing of soul and spirit in the recesses of the being. When the Eglon of self is dead, the glad trumpet of freedom is blown on the hills.

SATURDAY, February 22.

"THE JOURNEY THAT THOU TAKEST SHALT NOT BE FOR THINE HONOUR."—Judges iv. 9.

Barak preferred the inspiration of Deborah's presence to the invisible but certain help of Almighty God. It was Jehovah who had commanded him to draw his forces towards the River Kishon, and had promised to deliver Sisera into his hand. But he seemed unable to rise to the splendour of the situation. If only he could have Deborah beside him he would go, but otherwise not. He is mentioned in Heb. xi. as one of the heroes of faith, but his faith lay rather in Deborah's influence with God than in his own. Thus he missed the crown of that great day of victory.

It is the mark of the carnal Christian that he has no direct dealings with God for himself, but must needs deal with Him through the medium of another's prayers, and words, and leadership. Barak must have Deborah. It is faith, though greatly attenuated and reduced by the opaqueness of the medium through which it passes. Such do not attain "unto the first three." God cannot honour them as He does those who have absolutely no help or hope save in Himself. "Them that honour Me I will honour, and those that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed."

If God tells you to go alone to a work, be sure and obey. Go, at whatever cost. Dare to stand by yourself, if God is with you. Yet if you are unbelieving, your unbelief cannot make God's faith of none effect. He abideth faithful. He cannot deny Himself. He will still deliver Israel.

I have had such a lot of nice letters that I am going to tell you a little about them. If you get a map you will see what a long way apart some of the writers are from each other.

EZRA MATTHEWS likes the stories very much, as well as the Bible Searcher, and I expect many of you do too.

ARTHUR BONNER (Plumstead) liked the piece about the "Bible Laddies," because he says it shows that even little children can work for Jesus.

HYACINTH FITZSIMONS says:—"I have the toothache and cannot write very well. My teacher says there is no such word as can't, so I have put cannot."

MARY START (Salisbury) is nine years of age, but has been ill a long time, and has only been one term at school, but is better now. I hope she will soon be quite as strong as any of you.

BESSIE SCANTLEBURY (New Cross) very kindly thinks of me and says, "I hope you won't find it too much trouble to read the many answers you have sent to you every week, but I don't fear that much."

ALEC GOLIGHTLY (South Shields) says:—"We have a children's meeting every Thursday night at 7 o'clock, and all who can learn a verse of Scripture; those that repeat it correctly get a prize at Christmas from our teachers."

QUEENIE DALE (Gosport) also liked the "Bible Laddies." She says:—"I like the word 'laddie,' as we often called my angel brother Laddie, but his name was Gwynne. He is buried in the sea, and when Jesus comes He will bring our Laddie with Him." If we love Jesus as Laddie did, then we shall not be afraid to die.

ELSIE HALL (Newbury):—"I am just come back to school, and Miss —, my dear governess, takes THE CHRISTIAN, and she told me there was a 'Children's Page,' and I have tried to answer it. I shall try every week. I am a little motherless girl. I like my governess very much; she is very kind to me. The bell is ringing for supper."

LILY TYERS is Elsie's schoolfellow, and says:—"I have been at school since I was three years old, and now I am nine. I am very happy, and it makes my father and mother very glad. I have been in for examinations."

A Visit to Indian Ladies.

A MISSIONARY physician in India went with an English lady to call on some of her patients.

Word was sent that they would not be ready to receive visitors till four o'clock. Truly when we saw them we were not surprised, for it must have taken the extra hours to take out all their jewellery and put on all the fine paint and clothing.

A gentleman in a blue-and-white turban received us, and we were shown into a very large room, covered with a carpet, but there was nothing else there but a few bamboo chairs and a heap of silk and cashmere shawls, excepting that against the wall were about twenty pairs of boots and shoes, red, blue, and other colours, with pointed toes and no heels.

When the first lady appeared, she almost took away my breath by her astonishing appearance. Her face was painted red and yellow, with a streak of black across her forehead and around her eyes; her finger and toe nails were stained dark red. Her wide yellow satin trousers were fastened round the ankles with huge gold anklets, and from these hung so many jewels that they nearly covered her feet. Her jacket was richly worked with gold. She wore heavy bracelets at the top of her arms as well as on her wrists; around her neck she had put on one gold chain after another, the lowest reaching to her waist. In her hair was one blue and one pink ostrich feather, two wreaths of orange blossoms, and a band of silk; and over that on one side was a black, and on the other a white, gold-spangled veil. On her fingers were nine enormous rings. Her voice was almost as shrill as that of a peacock. She seemed much pleased to turn the musical box with her jewelled fingers.

The second lady now appeared, dressed in all the colours of the rainbow, and, being very shy and foolish, did nothing but giggle, and went to the other end of the room. The door opened again for afternoon tea, carried on a brass tray, the teapot being covered with one large cashmere handkerchief and the cups with smaller ones.

One question weighed on the mind of the yellow-satin trousered lady, and this was, "How do you like my clothes?" The only answer I could think of was, that I had heard and read of such grand clothes, but had never seen anything like them before.

As I could only nod and smile, and the Persian lady folded and unfolded her hands so that every ring might be seen to advantage, I turned out my handbag, and she was enchanted, especially with a work-case, with its little holes for cotton and thimble. Then to crown all, I showed her how to use a safety pin, and made her a present of one.

It was a sad visit, for these poor women have no thought for anything but jewels and dress.

They did not want to hear anything about the Bible, nor to look at our pictures; and when we spoke of the ornament the Lord cared for most, "a meek and quiet spirit" (1 Pet. iii. 4), they accepted the remark with a rude laugh.

Dives and Lazarus.

By REV. J. H. JOWETT, BIRMINGHAM.*

There was a certain rich man. . . there was a certain beggar (Luke xvi. 19, 20).

PROBABLY this is one of the most terrible of all the parables of judgment spoken by our Lord. Here is Dives, wanting nothing that money could procure; his house a centre of festivity, and crowded with gay, fashionable guests. Outside in the darkness, rendered more intense by the glare from the lights of the rich man's house, there crouches a poor beggar, weary and full of sores; hungry for bread, and waiting for some scraps of the feast thrown out after the slaves in Dives' household have been fed. Within the house the rich Pharisee is self-absorbed, revelling in compliments, and feasting on the admiration of others; with neither thought, pity, nor alms for the poor beggar who crouches at his gate.

Then, says Christ, death comes—grim, quiet, impartial death. The beggar died. The rich man also died, and was buried; his carcase was carried in great pomp to its last resting-place. Lifting somewhat the veil that hangs between us and the beyond, the Master informs us that death wrought a strange reversal of the conditions of these two men. The rich, luxurious Pharisee, stripped of all his affluence, lies burdened with the weight of anguish and remorse; the poor, unprivileged, weary beggar has entered into an inheritance of joy. There is something startling in the almost lurid contrast which the Saviour draws.

Such is the parable, and I think it has a very much wider comprehension than we are usually inclined to give it. First, we ought to understand that the teaching of the parable does not confine itself exclusively to the relationship of those who have money and those who have not. Money is one form of power or strength, but only one. Poverty on the other is one kind of weakness and need, but only one. Dives stands for every kind of strength, endowment, privilege, capacity, or opportunity; Lazarus stands for weakness, incapacity, or want of opportunity in any shape or form. So that the teaching of the parable includes the obligation of all kinds of strength to all kinds of weakness. And if that debt or obligation be not paid: if we use our wealth, our endowment, our opportunity solely to please and pamper ourselves, the Master says that death shall reverse the condition. Our strength here will become our torment yonder, and we shall live in the fire of anguish and remorse for ill-spent possessions and a wasted life.

Looking at the parable a little more in detail, let us consider that interpretation of it which regards the relation of the rich towards the poor. How striking is the contrast between the world's way of dividing Society and Christ's way. The world draws across Society a horizontal line, and all above that line are called the upper classes. Then it draws a second horizontal line, rich men, poor men, working men, and peers. Look on the left hand, and we find the same commingling of classes. The world divides Society according to money; Christ divides it according to character. Christ never respected money; never paid homage to the majesty of wealth. And what He never did, He never wants his followers to do. We need money, and the Church needs money; but she certainly needs something more, and we must not impoverish the Church's character in order to enrich the Church's purse. The real wealth of the Church consists not in the length of her purse, but in the number of her redeemed and consecrated men and women.

On the other hand—and this also needs to be emphasised—Jesus never despised a man because he was rich. He always got behind the man's position to the man. The question is not as to a man's possessions, but as to how he regards his possessions. If he belongs to the Lord's aristocracy a man will regard his wealth with almost sacred reverence as the Master's gift. There will also be the element of unselfishness. He will open his eyes to see where Lazarus his needy brother is, and he will open his hand to supply that need. We ministers have the privilege of knowing wealthy men of whom we can devoutly pray that their wealth may be increased. But there are others who, when they are enriched, are only enriched themselves while others become poorer. Lazarus is ignored, and the clamorous needs of the world are ignored. Such men hold their possessions on short tenure. Death will strip them bare, and they will enter into the other world absolutely naked.

The preacher went on to deal in a like impressive and trenchant style with the responsibility of Dives the refined in ministering to the necessities of the Lazarus of vulgarity; and of those rich in faith to carry hope and comfort to the Lazarus of despair. To faith must be added love. In closing Mr. Jowett said:—I record it as my own deliberate view that I would rather be the Lazarus of despair than the Dives of selfish faith. To be rich in faith and to employ one's wealth solely for one's own salvation: to take no interest in the salvation of a sunken, sinking world, will incur the very scorn and condemnation of the crucified Christ.

and all between the two lines are termed the middle classes; while all below the second line are said to be the lower classes. Jesus Christ never drew a horizontal line. He took Society, and drew a vertical line through the whole of it, dividing it into two sections. One He called "the right hand," and the other "the left hand"; or, again, the sheep and the goats. If we look on the right-hand side of Christ's vertical line we find all the so-called classes—

Lisson Grove Mission.—At the annual meeting held in the Dauntless Hall, the president, Mr. C. G. Brodie, took the chair, and the hall was well filled. Mr. Ellis, in making his report, said that besides teaching the young God's Word, there are in connection with the school the mutual help society, the sewing class for girls, the lending library, and the country holidays fund, all of which exist for the benefit of scholars. There are many indications that God is blessing the work.

THE LATE

Mrs. Betsey H. Moody.

OUR readers, especially those of them who have at any time visited Northfield, will hear with regret of the death of Mrs. Betsey Moody, mother of Mr. D. L. Moody. There will be no surprise mingled with the sorrow, as she was within a few days of attaining the great age of ninety-one. From American advices we learn that having suffered from influenza cold for about a week she took to her bed, and after a short attack breathed her last on the forenoon of Sunday, January 26, in the home where she has spent the whole of her long life.

Her son, Mr. D. L. Moody, without knowing of his mother's illness, on the Saturday evening returned to Northfield from holding a mission in Philadelphia. He at once proceeded to her bedside, and in a period of the invalid's consciousness received from her the last greeting she gave to anyone on earth. There were present when her spirit departed her four surviving sons, Isaac, George, Dwight, and Edwin (all living in Northfield), and one of her daughters, Mrs. Walker, of Northfield. The only absent member of the family was another daughter, Mrs. Washburn, who resides at Racine, Wisconsin.

Mrs. BETSEY HOLTON MOODY (says a Boston contemporary) came of Puritan ancestry, and her life has been an example of the indomitable courage of her race, and of what faith in God can do for woman. Her strong character came to light at the death of her husband in 1841. Her eldest child was then but thirteen years of age, and a month after her husband's death another boy and a girl were born. She was left without support, except the little home on the hillside and an acre or two of land, which were encumbered with a mortgage. Some worldly-wise neighbours advised the widow to part with or bind out some of her children, but this she was determined not to do. God had endowed her with unusual strength, both of body and mind; trusting in Him she bravely lifted her burden of poverty and toil. She carried it patiently and hopefully until her children were able to help her, and at last to fill her hands with plenty. Her own brothers in Boston helped her to pay the interest on the mortgage of her house, while the elder sons looked after the little farm. Her children were given the best schooling that the village could afford.

She had abundant experience of adversity in those earlier years of her widowhood, but for many years now her life has been spent in happiness and plenty. In all his success and popularity her son, the evangelist, has never forgotten the mother who sacrificed so much for him. He could never do too much for her happiness in her declining days. For some years past her birthday gatherings (February 5) have been notable seasons at Northfield. She was always an object of deep interest to the thousands of visitors who attended the Northfield Conferences. The success which crowned Mr. D. L. Moody's labours greatly gladdened the mother's heart. One of the earliest buildings of those erected for the use of the young ladies' seminary at East Northfield was the "Betsey Moody Cottage," the name being given to it by her illustrious son.

The Boston Congregationalist, speaking of Mrs. Moody's death, says:—

She has lived to see her son honoured throughout Christendom, but none of the world's plaudits, we are confident, have been so dear to him as the quiet, approving smile with which his mother has met him on his return from his various evangelistic campaigns. One secret of Mr. Moody's marvellous career is the fact that behind him have been, all these years, the potent influence of a mother's love and the example of her godly life. Speaking of this beloved son one day, she remarked, with a twinkle in her eye; "I always thought D. L. would be either one thing or the other." Time has certainly justified her confidence.

Mrs. Moody's maiden name was Holton. Both the Moodys and the Holtons were old families in the little mountain Massachusetts town. The Holtons were among the first settlers on the plantation of Northfield, which was purchased from the Indians in 1678. William Holton, who had a hand in laying out the township, was of English descent, though born in Massachusetts; Betsey Holton was of lineal descent from him in the fifth generation.

The deceased was laid in her last resting-place on Wednesday, January 29. A pathetic incident is recorded by The New York Tribune, in connection with the funeral service held in the Congregational church. Mr. D. L. Moody, standing by the open coffin which held the mortal remains of his departed mother, paid a touching tribute to her life of self-sacrifice and devotion, and recounted in simple language the story of his own early life of privation. As he spoke, the hundreds of people who filled the church were moved to tears. The sight of the world-famed evangelist, reading from the old leathern-bound family Bible, expounding the passages in homely phrase, turning anon to the dead face and saying, "God bless you, mother, we love you still," was sufficient to move the sternest heart.

Eight years ago we gave in these columns a portrait of Mrs. Moody. We now reproduce it, feeling sure that it will be welcome to thousands of readers who know and love her son. We are reminded of the fact that Wednesday of last week (February 5) was not only the birthday of the deceased, but of Mr. Moody himself. The usually joyous celebration of the day by the many Northfield friends, especially those attending the schools for young men and young women, must have been sadly chastened by the sense of loss which he has sustained. As representing a host of friends of the evangelist on this side of the sea, we tender to Mr. Moody and his household our most heartfelt sympathy and loving regard.

True National Strength.

THE American Ambassador, the Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, presided last week at the thirty-eighth annual dinner of St. John's Foundation School, which took place at the Hôtel Métropole, and was largely attended. Nine years ago, when the present secretary, Rev. S. Patterson, was appointed, there was a voluntary income of £8,532; it has now reached £15,714. During that time £27,266 has been spent upon increasing the buildings and land, and there has been an addition to the reserve fund of £16,317. Nine years ago there were 117 boys; now there are 246 boys connected with the foundation.

In the course of a thoughtful address Mr. Bayard said he had been thinking of the resources of this kingdom. The hearts of men who loved England had lately been stirred to consider the true forces of England—how England should be continued and strengthened. The common and patriotic thought had naturally been turned to the armed forces, to the great ships, to the brave armies, to the stout hearts, to the earnest conscience of her people; but there were forces that made and kept a people that were not noisy, but which were ever potential. Therefore he ventured to ask special attention to a most important source of the strength of the country, which, by making this country strong, should make his own country strong. He meant those fountains of moral force which were the true basis of the world's advancement, and formed under God the chief rock of its dependence.

It was primarily the moral and intellectual strength that guided the material forces. Patriotism might be considered enlarged selfishness or enlightened self-interest, but the strength of a community consisted unquestionably in the number of reliable and virtuous individuals that it contained. If computing the strength of England, he would ask what families added most to that strength? They were the families that were found in those plain homes where morality, religion, sobriety, thrift, self-denial, truth, simplicity, and personal refinement were the governing forces. The first element to be noted in the homes of the clergy was peculiar to that profession. They did not work for gain.

He did not mean to speak disrespectfully of the mercantile instinct, or to utter a tirade against the men who struggled to make themselves rich, or make those around them more comfortable, but he did say that in our time the thirst for wealth and for property needed some qualification. There must be something better and higher than that, and he turned for that chiefly to the profession that could not possibly connect personal gain with its pursuit. Among those who followed the profession he bowed his head respectfully to the poorer members. The luxury that sapped morality could not be found in their homes, but there must be self-help and mutual help, or those homes could not exist. He claimed that they had furnished a large share of the distinguished men of the country.

Fellowship with Jesus.

I SEEM to have got beyond wishing for anything in this world, as regards myself. I long only to know a deeper fellowship with the Lord Jesus. I pass by doctrines now to get at once to Him. He leads me to doctrine, not doctrines to Him. Nothing does for me now but my precious Jesus, my ever-loving Friend, who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. "God so loved the world that He gave His ONLY BEGOTTEN SON" [not a thing, but a person], "that whosoever believeth in HIM—" I just seek now to love Him more and more, and then I am sure the believing will spring up.—Samuel Chase, 1871, shortly before his last sleep.

Letters from Africa.—4.

ON our outward voyage in the Moor, Captain Griffin read prayers on the Sunday mornings and the first officer read the lessons. Rev. Andrew Murray conducted a short service on these evenings, each well within an hour. His addresses were (1) from Eph. ii. 8, "By grace are ye saved through faith," and (2) Gal. iii. 13, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." The Gospel was faithfully and uncompromisingly preached. On board ship, in first-class saloons, more than on land or among the steerage passengers, there is a temptation and sometimes a tendency to trim, to which good men have been known to yield. But on both these occasions there were tears, and there was a power in the Word to make men tremble who never weep.

One of Mr. Murray's illustrations was this story. A trader in South Africa, as he was journeying, saw a black man run down to a river's edge, plunge in, and swim across. Almost immediately after, five men appeared, evidently in pursuit. They wounded him with an arrow, and the trader stood to see what would follow.

The fugitive was an escaped slave. The chief ordered his men to kill him, but the trader interceded for his life. The chief said there was only death for a runaway slave, and again commanded one of his men to kill him. The trader caught the stroke on his own arm, and his blood fell on the trembling creature at his feet. The chief, seeing that he had shed the blood of a white man, and fearing consequences, withdrew his order and spared the slave. The trader told the fugitive that he was free, and could go where he pleased, but he clung to his deliverer's feet, saying, "Massa has saved me, I your slave for ever;" and would not leave him.

Mr. Murray also spoke on Christmas morning from Luke ii. 15—Love, Salvation, Free Gift. He is receiving numerous invitations to hold meetings in different places. At present, I believe, he is under medical orders, taking absolute rest for some days. Before this appears there will probably have been a public meeting to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Murray home.

The Week of Prayer has not been observed in Capetown for the last year or two. It is summer time at Christmas and the New Year, and many of those who would organise meetings are absent on vacation. Two united meetings were held, on the Wednesday and the Saturday evenings. The former was at the Wesleyan Church, at which Rev. Mr. Bosman, Dutch Reformed minister, presided, and Rev. Mr. Abraham, Wesleyan minister, spoke on "Praying in the Holy Ghost"—a very valuable Scriptural and spiritual address; evidently the speaker's own experience, and calculated to be very helpful to those who heard it. After reading several passages, such as Ps. xcv. 1-7; 1 Tim. ii. 1-4; 1 Pet. i. 5, 6; Isa. ii. 2-4; Rom. xii. 10-15; Jude 20, 21—he said the only prayer that does good is in the Holy Ghost. No wonder that the world mocks at prayer, if the Church is not praying in the Holy Ghost; when she does, there will be a Pentecost. If we pray in the Spirit, and the Spirit makes intercession for us and in us, the powers of evil must fall and Jesus must prevail. Referring to the troubles then occupying everyone's mind, he said—"Let us get together and pray for Johannesburg; it will do more good than all the fighting." There was a spirit of prayer in the meeting—the subject of the day was for Nations and their Rulers. The Saturday evening meeting was held in the hall of the Y.M.C.A.

The public reading of the Scriptures, if not a lost art, is often far less impressive and expository than it might be. On the first Sunday in the New Year the most interesting part of the cathedral service to me was the reading of the lessons by the Dean—such reading as reminded one of the days of Ezra, when "they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly; and they gave the sense, so that they understood the reading." A sermonette of eleven minutes by another of the clergy followed, from a large text—"He taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold." It was shown that for the fallen angels there is no redemption, and the difference between the sin of untempted Lucifer and that of Adam under temptation was dwelt upon; but the subject was too great to be dealt with in so short a time. We want another Latimer to restore preaching to its true place. Sermons about earthly things, and sermonettes about the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, are not calculated to convict the ungodly, nor to fill those who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

There are three clergymen in the neighbourhood of Capetown whose praise is in all the churches—Mr. Daintree, of Mowbray, and Mr. Hyam and his curate, Mr. Lichfield, of Wynberg. They were all, I believe, recommended by Principal Moule, under whom they had studied at Ridley Hall, Cambridge.

What will be the issue of the Johannesburg fiasco we wait to see. The conviction of some in the town who held aloof was, that it was a capitalists' attempt in their own interest. They have got Kimberley into their hands, and made a monopoly there; it is believed the same thing was intended at Johannesburg. Mr. Rhodes is a man of proved ability and grasp and force. He has had an ovation at Kimberley. He says he is not at the end, but at the beginning of his career, and that he will be a greater power than ever. Perhaps he will, but just now this does not seem the general opinion. As some wise man said, "It is not many a man who can bear to be a millionaire." The love of money acts like despotic power on the character of the man that possesses it.

Dr. Jameson, it is now thought, was duped by the conspirators, and his men were deceived through him. They were inexpressibly brave and enduring, but the raid was unjustifiable, whether from a moral, a political, or a tactical point of view. I express what I hear, and what appears to me to be near the truth. But whatever difference of opinion there may be on the larger subject, all are agreed in feeling that the lightest possible penalty should be inflicted on "brave Dr. Jim" and his men; and even the people of the Transvaal are probably all one with the rest of the country in this sentiment.

As to the Transvaal Government it has unquestionably been harsh, overbearing, unreasonable, and unjust to the Uitlanders (the foreigners) and to its own people; but the President and the people have acted well in the present case, and the issue may be not an aggravation but an alleviation of race antipathy. The demand for universal suffrage, which would at once put it into the power of the foreigners to outvote those in possession, is under the circumstances out of question. If England were to grant universal suffrage to India we should probably be voted out of the country speedily. President Krüger and his Government are not likely to commit political suicide.

The entanglements here and in Europe, and indeed all over the world, surely indicate that the end is drawing near (though that seems the last thought with the majority in these young countries). On this account, as on every other, the watchword of our translated brother Reginald Radcliffe, continued by Andrew Murray and many more, needs to be taken up by every Christian, "Pray, pray, pray."

The following items are from a Capetown paper, under the head of "Y.M.C.A. Notes":—

Preparations are being made for the publication, in pamphlet form, of the journal of the recent conference in Johannesburg, and it may be expected to make its appearance during the current month. This should make very instructive reading, and doubtless those interested will find many hints which will assist them to keep the association deserving of the high encomiums showered upon it as "the premier branch in South Africa." It should also prove a valuable index for young men proceeding up-country.

Letters have been received heralding the arrival of Mr. Charles Yatman, of New York, who is on a tour of the world, and will conduct special services in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Long-street. Mr. Yatman is well known in America as a most successful evangelist, and correspondents from various quarters he has visited combine in highly praising him.

The Hawaiian Star, just to hand from Honolulu, reports that "Mr. Yatman has won his way into the hearts of everyone. Honolulu has not seen such a day for many a year." In a long article it eulogises his power over all classes, including natives and Portuguese, and gives résumés of various of his addresses which promise interesting times when he arrives.

The Association News for December, in an article headed "Young Men in South Africa," contains the following by the Rev. D. Burford Hooke, secretary of the Colonial Missionary Society, who had just returned from an official visit to the leading towns of South Africa:—"I should like to caution young men especially against going out without being provided with such letters of introduction as will ensure their being received into a circle of Christian friends. There are not many branches of the Y.M.C.A. in South Africa, probably not more than half a dozen. I only came across three—Capetown, Durban, and Johannesburg. Young men cannot do better than make straight for these. The Association at Capetown is one of the best in any part of the world."

The Peruvian Mission.

DEAR SIR,—We have closed the second year of the Peruvian Mission. Rather than magnify the persecution and opposition, we will thank God for the grace that has sustained us in the hour of danger and need. The seed has been sown by visiting, personal dealing, and Gospel meetings, and the Word of God has been placed in the hands of many.

The work has been maintained in Lima, and another branch has been attempted in Cuzco. Our two brethren, Messrs. Peters and Jarrett, were pioneers to that ancient capital, a veritable stronghold of Romanism. In the interior, the Dept. of Junin has been visited and some itinerant work accomplished in the immediate surroundings of Lima. Many know of the illegal expulsion of Messrs. Peters and Jarrett from Cuzco through priestly influence. This event has aroused interest and sympathy, and may yet be overruled by God for the furtherance of the Gospel. The work there may be resumed at any time, but the position is a perilous one, and we crave the prayers and sympathy of British Christians.

One's soul is stirred by the awful spiritual famine there is here, through the lack of the Bible. The people are steeped in superstition, ignorance, and spiritual darkness; but even in their superstition and darkness, they willingly listen to the Gospel until poisoned by the priests.

We are in this distant field without a home committee or secretary to sustain and create interest. A small paper, The Land of the Incas, is published once a quarter. In the past it has been issued from a foreign press, but a friend in London has now kindly undertaken to publish it. Friends desirous of a copy may have it by applying to Mrs. A. Wise, 200, Burrage-road, Plumstead, London. Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, of the East London Institute, Bow, London, E., will forward any remittances which may be sent. At present we are in communication with several consecrated workers who are desirous of entering the field in fellowship with this work.

Yours for the Evangelization of Peru,

A. R. STARK.

Children's Ministry.

II.—THEIR MINISTRY IN LIFE.

By REV. R. LEITCH, M.A.

GOD has many "ministers" besides those who bear that distinctive name. He has many such in nature. The babbling brook, the deep blue sea, the starry firmament, the many-tinted flowers of the fields, and the birds of the air, all speak to men's hearts about the glory and majesty, the power and the bounty of the great Creator. It is, however, of the Ministry of Little Children that I wish on this occasion to write.

How poor, how dismal, how uninviting would our world appear if there were no children in it! Children are the poetry of human life; and how dull social life would be if children's merry laughter were never heard, if childhood's lovely face were never seen, and if childhood's winsome ways were all unknown. Children are like the buds of Spring, telling us about a coming summer, and a coming autumn, laden with their rich and golden treasures. They are emblems of hope, as well as sources of joy. They relieve the weariness and anxiety of human life. Unconsciously, in many instances, yet most powerfully, they influence those of riper years, and tend to keep the heart young and hopeful and contented.

In his "Marmion," Sir Walter Scott describes the charm that youth has the power of exerting on sympathetic hearts:—

And much I miss those sportive boys,
Companions of my mountain joys,
Just at an age 'twixt boy and youth,
When thought is speech, and speech is truth.

How many a father, returning home from the cares and toils of the day's business, has had his heart cheered and strengthened by the prattle of the children in the nursery! It has stilled the tumult of his anxious, fevered heart, and made him feel as if he himself were a child once more.

The birth of a dear child has often been the means of knitting the hearts of the parents more closely and more tenderly together. Alluding to the birth of their first-born, one has finely said:—

How his coming knit our two hearts
Into one, that now nothing parts;
How our love leapt into new being,
Deeper, finer, than all seeing,
As before the Giver we knelt,
Brokenly uttering what we felt.

God speaks to us through his children. He taught Eli by young Samuel. He used the little boy to instruct the aged man, the priest. He revealed Himself concerning Eli by this innocent child. And has not God, in like manner, often spoken since Eli's days to those of riper years through the lips of children? He has manifested Himself through a child's prayer, through a child's questions, through a child's piety, and through a child's example. He has taken infantile lips and filled them with strange and startling and weighty messages from Himself. Have not a little child's words often been God speaking through the child, warning, rebuking, or comforting?

Childhood teaches us many lessons in many ways. The traits of children are most instructive. How many in mature years have longed to get back again the sweetness, the innocence, the faith, the simplicity, the teachableness, and the joys of early life! How many have yearned, but yearned, alas, in vain, for—

Life's gay morn when sprightly youth
With vital ardour glows.

A child looks at persons and things very much as they are in themselves. A child, in this respect, is a little philosopher. A man is to him only a man, and a woman is to him only a woman. His vision is not distorted by the many unfavourable influences that guide and control the vision of full-grown men. Faith is natural to the child. He looks at the bright side of things. If sorrow overtakes him, he does not allow it to gnaw his little heart like a vulture.

The tear, down childhood's cheek that flows,
Is like the dewdrop on the rose;
When next the summer breeze comes by
And waves the bush, the flower is dry.

The child is not ashamed to confess his weakness and his ignorance; neither does he let the mysteries of human life paralyse his energies, or weaken his faith, or daunt his fortitude, or cloud his brow.

Children appeal to the highest and best instincts of our nature; and as one has well observed, "No ministry affects human hearts so touchingly or universally as a child's."

Well is it for those who, when they come to encounter the stern realities of life, and to battle with the world and all its vices and trials, are able, by the power of Divine grace, to preserve the guilelessness, the winsomeness and unselfishness of childhood's days! Happily they who can say with the poet—

Thou, God, wert my childhood's love,
My boyhood's pure delight;
A presence felt the livelong day,
A welcome fear at night.
I could not sleep, unless thy hand
Were underneath my head,
That I might kiss it, if I lay
Wakeful upon my bed.
And quite alone I never felt—
I knew that Thou wert near—
A silence tingling in the room,
A strangely pleasant fear.
With age Thou grewest more divine
More glorious than before.
I feared Thee with a deeper fear
Because I loved Thee more.

Rest for the Aged.

A MOST interesting endeavour to soothe the declining years of aged poor in Scotland has been in progress for some time past. A Home of Rest at Prospect Bank, Portobello, has done excellent service for the past five years. In the latest report of the institution the following account is given of the origin and objects of the Home:—

"Some years ago, a lady, while on a visit to a country poorhouse, was deeply touched at the sad and distressed condition of its aged inmates. On ascertaining the cause of this sadness, she resolved that, should her life be spared, she would endeavour to establish a Home for a few such, and solicit public sympathy on their behalf. This resolution led to the inauguration of the present institution on February 14, 1891. The objects were (1) to provide a comfortable Home for aged and deserving poor, whether single or married, who have no alternative but going to the workhouse. (2) To express sympathy with them in their old age, and to help them, as far as possible, to make it bright and happy. (3) To keep before them the Gospel of the grace of God, and the hope of eternal life set forth therein to all believers."

In a communication to us the hon. secretary of the Home, Mrs. Pearson, 80, Thirlestane-road, Edinburgh, describes very pathetically the condition of aged couples when compelled by circumstances to apply for parochial relief. At the workhouse doors they are separated, and the tender association and companionship of a long married life are abruptly severed. Need we wonder that the greatest reluctance is felt by these aged couples at going into "the house." It was to meet this state of the Scottish poor law that the Home of Rest at Portobello was opened, and it has provided a channel of blessing and comfort to many poor aged friends. Many more would have gladly availed themselves of it if there had been room.

There is now, we regret to say, a considerable risk of the Home being broken up. The house at Portobello is about to be disposed of by the owners, and £1150 is asked for it. The present funds of the Home will not permit of this expenditure, and the promoters make an earnest appeal for the help of Christian friends in the endeavour to raise the amount, and so secure the Home in perpetuity for its blessed mission of ministering comfort and solace to aged poor in central Scotland.

THE EVANGELIST.

How a Drunkard was Saved.

"WHAT'S up? What's up?" exclaimed a group of people, as they observed crowds running up a back street in one of our large towns. The reply was that a drunken man had attempted to murder his wife.

On making inquiry we found that K—— had gone out of his mind through drink, and had rushed at his wife to kill her, under the delusion that she had put poison into his food. He was seized, however, by the police before he could accomplish his wicked purpose, and was sent to the county asylum, where he seemed to be gradually sinking into hopeless idiocy. But the Lord, who had compassion on Nebuchadnezzar, and restored him to his kingdom from the lowest state of insanity, had also determined that K—— should experience a total deliverance from drink and its blighting consequences, and should become an earnest worker in Christ's cause.

The following are his own words, in relating the story to me some years afterwards:—

"One Sunday morning, while sitting vacantly in chapel (in connection with the asylum in which I was confined), the minister's voice attracted my attention, and his words roused me up from my morbid broodings, as he said, 'Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live.'

"These were the only words I heard out of the whole service, and they took possession of my entire soul. I thought to myself, 'Can these words be true? Can God so love sinners that He wishes them to live, and not to perish? Then He does not wish my death, but would rather that I should repent and live.' I felt drawn to Him who first loved me, and, filled with these thoughts, I was quite happy, and went about the grounds whistling for very joy.

"Next day the doctor noticed the improvement that had taken place, and turned it to good account. He called my attention to one of the walls, stated that they intended to make it look better, and asked me to help. For an hour I worked hard, rubbing the wall with a heavy stone, until the perspiration ran down my face and back, all the time feeling happy and cheerful. Still the delusion that my wife had mixed poison with my food remained, and I felt bitter against her. I thought I would forgive her, but I would not again live with her. I would go up and down the country working for a living, and would tell others what God had done for my soul.

"By degrees my delusion passed away, and I plainly saw that drink had deranged my mind, and I vowed never to touch alcoholic drink again in any shape or form. Now, by the blessing of God, I am in my right mind. I am in comfortable circumstances, and am taking my wife to the sea-side, instead of trying to injure her. Yea, what is better than all, I know that my Saviour loves me; and my great desire is to save others from drink, and bring them to Him whom I have found so precious."

I enjoyed the friendship of K—— for many years until his death, and always found him leading a consistent course, careful to give no offence to the enemies of religion, and active both in the Sunday-school and in the church. With rough lads he had great influence. He told them what he had been, and what grace had done for him, and with loving counsel he exhorted them to live for Christ.

Z.

THE GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST.

There is no man that sinneth not.
There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not.

By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.

God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly.

Jesus said:—I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

Repent ye, and believe the Gospel.

Countess Schimmelmänn.

THE announcement that the Danish Countess, of whose trying experiences and devoted faithfulness so many have heard, was to speak at the House of Rest last Friday afternoon, attracted many, and crowded the room to the door. Nor were those who came disappointed, for as the Countess told, in good fluent English, strongly marked by a foreign accent, of her conversion, persecution, and simple reliance on God, every heart seemed strangely touched.

After reminding her hearers that God is the same now as in the days of the Patriarchs, the Countess spoke of her early life, as a professing Christian craving after something real, but knowing nothing save the formal observances of the Lutheran Church and the daily round of Court etiquette and pageant. For years she was unsatisfied and longing. At length God used a sentence in a novel to reach her heart and reveal where true satisfaction might be found. The novelist made one of his characters say, "The love of Christ is the strongest feeling which can move the heart of a human being." This came to her as a new revelation. She had never known such love. She must have it or die. From that moment the desire after the love of Christ became the consuming passion of her soul.

To attain it, she was ready for everything: she would give up all, she would bear all. But not thus comes the love of God, and she had to learn that it is not by works lest any should boast. Her experience at this period, with no one to guide her, seems to have been stern and real, doubtless fitting and preparing her for the work of the coming years. At last God revealed, not her love to Him, but his love to her. As this entered her soul, she found her views of things around changing. No more had the world, with all its pomp and parade, its etiquette and forms, attraction for her. She had found at length the One who alone can satisfy.

Since then she has known persecution, slander, loss of friends, cruel treatment, deprivation of liberty, but God has been with her and that has sufficed. Although heiress to great estates, she had at one time to walk alone with an old nurse from her ancestral castle to the railway station with but a few pounds in her pocket, an exile from home. Friends came forward offering aid, provided she would return to Court and worldly life—but she could not; and again she had to face cruel persecution. In the midst of it all God spoke to her, gave her the rest of his love, and that made up for all. Never had she imagined that any human heart could have borne the happiness which thus flooded and filled her soul.

About this time, God used a dream to direct her thoughts towards winning souls for Him, and especially in the direction of seeking after the lost. Henceforth she had but one thing to live for—to be blessed to others, to bring them to the joy she had tasted. In this sense she said to her persecutors, "For every tear you make me weep, for every sigh you make me heave, I will seek to win one soul." God has honoured her to do more than this.

Next came an account of the horror expressed when she, a Court lady—in a land where women were never supposed to speak in public—began to enter on Gospel service. At first she found openings among prisoners and the poor; but ere long was led to visit Rugen, an island on the northern coast of Pomerania. There she discovered that the poor fishermen were living in a half-wild condition, caring for little else than drinking and gambling. Finding how things stood, she resolved to make her home among them, sleeping in a miserable tavern and putting up with every possible inconvenience and deprivation in order to reach them. While winning her way, she certainly had most startling experiences, but once she had proved her mettle and shown them she really sought their well-being, her influence became great. The work has spread over thirty villages, and the whole character of the population has been changed.

In somewhat similar fashion she has gained in recent years entrance among the Socialists of Berlin, Hamburg, and other cities. No matter how determined the opposition, and savage the threats uttered, her calm unflinching faith in God, whose message she has been sent to speak and means to speak, seems to gain the day. Thus she has declared the Gospel of Divine grace in many socialistic halls and to vast audiences of Socialists.

In her address the Countess made no reference to her present visit to this land; but from Miss Mason we learned that on board the yacht now lying in the Commercial Docks she has a number of poor boys in training, that she has been led out in rescue and similar work in Berlin, and that, while she says nothing of money in her utterances—leaving it all with her Father—she is praying that 500 friends may be led to offer £1 per annum each to provide support for the work she has in hand. Her own small income, cruelly crippled by unjust means, will not meet the necessities of the work springing up around her. Apart, however, from any such consideration, no one can hear Countess Schimmelmänn without the persuasion that her whole soul is fired by the love of God, that her faith is singularly child-like and simple, and that her knowledge of the Scripture is close and practical. All will rejoice in the great things to which God has called her from the glories and gaieties of Court life.

The Union Tabernacle.

IN the heart of the populous working-class district stretching along the Wandsworth-road, an enterprising home mission work is actively carried on by Rev. D. M. Cameron and his helpers, who find the centre of their operations in the Union Tabernacle. A local paper points out that not only is the district densely crowded, by a class who largely ignore the claims of God, but there are at least three public-houses to every one church or chapel. The work has been going on for over seventeen years. Not content with preaching to those who are willing to come, these earnest helpers go out to seek those who are careless and heedless. The streets are systematically visited; the poor are sought out, and many have been persuaded to give attention to higher things. The pastor says:—"God has been graciously pleased to bring many to a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. The building in which we hold our meetings is situated right in the centre of an exceedingly poor and populous district, the inhabitants consisting chiefly of the artisan and labouring classes, who are engaged on the railways, gas-works, and other factories which abound in the neighbourhood. The work is considerably helped by the people who attend the services, but they are not equal to do all. Besides the meetings for preaching the Gospel, the Sunday-school, mothers' meeting, and band of hope, etc., are in full operation."

During the winter many suffer from want of work, and there is consequently considerable distress. To meet this need special efforts have been organised, and in this way many have been cheered and comforted, while a hearing has been gained for the message of mercy.

The Tabernacle itself has lately been in great need of renovation and extension, and for some time efforts have been made to raise funds. These have been so successful that the work has been put in hand, and on Sunday next the Tabernacle (which has been closed for a time) will be reopened, while on Monday Mr. James E. Mathieson will lay a commemoration stone in connection with the new portico and other much-needed additions. Mr. Cameron, whose labours as an evangelist during the past thirty-five years have been much blessed, will thus put, as it were, the corona on the labour to which he has given the best part of his life. The sympathies and good wishes of many will be with him. His address is "Thurlow," 515, Wandsworth-road, S.W.

From Tongoa, New Hebrides

IN a recent letter Rev. Oscar Michelsen reports a visit of Rev. Dr. Paton to the beautiful little island of Tongoa. The Rob Roy had other missionaries on board, and several of them addressed meetings of the natives, their words being interpreted by Mr. Michelsen. Returning from the annual conference and synod at Aneityum, Mr. Michelsen visited his friend Rev. Peter Milne, who for many years has been working on the island of Nguna. Here Mr. Michelsen spent the first year of his missionary life, 1878-9; he was now greeted with much heartiness by those who remembered his early labours and rejoiced in his subsequent work on Tongoa.

An interesting item in the letter is an account of the baptism of new converts. Mr. Michelsen writes: "The teachers handed in lists of names of persons who had been attending my class, and whom they considered fit for baptism. These were again examined by me, each individually. It is astonishing what satisfactory answers were given in some cases where the teacher, who saw their daily life, did not believe there was a change of heart. On the other hand, there were very many who in their lives showed what one must take as the fruit of the Spirit, whilst they gave only stupid answers. The examination was, therefore, a very anxious time. Some of the candidates gave

INTERESTING ANSWERS.

I asked an old woman what she thought of Christ, my words being capable also of being understood as 'How do you think about Christ?' She said in reply, 'I think of Him always.' Another old woman, when asked how she knew that she was saved, said, 'The good water is flowing freely, and why should not I wash?'

"Perhaps the most interesting candidate was old Manangoroi. He is one of the two survivors of the nine men who were waiting in the bush to kill us the day we fled from our old station in 1881. (See account and illustration in my book.) When I asked him about his sins, he said, 'They were both great and many,' and among them he mentioned murder. I asked him how many he had killed. He said 'dua-lima' (dua=two, lima=hand, i.e., ten). That does not mean that the number was exactly ten; it might have been more. It was the full first ten, but probably not twenty. The counting of the people is rather vague when it exceeds the ten fingers. It was very interesting to find that most of the candidates had a distinct recollection of the time of their conversion, and in very many cases it was due to personal dealing either by myself or the teachers."

"No day in the history of this Mission can be compared with the day when I baptized

SEVENTY-TWO MEN AND WOMEN.

A fortnight afterwards we had communion, when 189 of us (185 natives) partook. I need hardly say what such an event was to me. The service was conducted at the very spot where the heathen images stood when I came to the island, and within fifteen or twenty yards from the spot where Malakaleo lifted his club to strike me down in 1879. This communion did not include all our church members, as there are many who could not come over from their own islands. At the close of the service we had a silver and gold collection. The plate was sent round to the church members, who contributed £11 18s. 3d., and to give adherents an opportunity to give something to the cause of Christ, if they felt so disposed, a plate was left at the door, and on it was found £1 5s. 9d., making a total of £13 4s."

Mr. Michelsen has begun to provide for orphan children. What with the care of such and the children's school, Mrs. Michelsen's strength is overtaxed. A trained Christian teacher is an urgent necessity. In consequence of drought, the head mission station has been removed from Lumbukuti to Selemanga, on the opposite side of the island. The people of the latter village are putting up a school-room adjoining the church. Mr. Michelsen adds: "My Friday afternoon Bible class continues to be the centre of heat on the island. The attendance is about 200, but I have had it as high as 240. As an indication of the people's appreciation of the Word, I can mention that only the other day I remitted £40 in cash for books sold, mostly for Scripture portions."

* CANNIBALS WON FOR CHRIST. (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)

The Central London Mission.

THIS aggressive and go-ahead Mission had its anniversary on Friday last. The meetings were held in the Holborn Town Hall, and awakened much interest among the members and friends of the Mission. At noon a sermon was preached by Rev. J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham, the young successor of Dr. Dale. Some notes of this practical and striking utterance will be found on another page.

After luncheon, Mr. Hazell, M.P., took the chair, at the speechifying, and earnest words were spoken by Revs. W. L. Watkinson, T. G. Selby, and R. W. Allan. The CHAIRMAN spoke in high terms of the work. He remembered the time when the church in St. John's-square had diminished in its congregation to about 100 people, but since then new methods had been adopted with conspicuous success. It was the fault of the churches if they did not adapt themselves to the times. He was convinced that the working-classes had no objection to the presentation of Christianity as such, but they did object to conventional methods. In London they had to cope with the difficulty created by the separation of the various classes in this great city. The rich went in one direction, the middle-class in another, the well-to-do working-class elsewhere, and the poorest of the poor to other districts. Anything which tended to bring Londoners together and make them feel their common sympathies was worthy of commendation. He was glad that the mission carried out the principle that Christ came to save not only in the future, but here and now, and to make life nobler, sweeter, and purer.

The afternoon meeting was devoted, as usual, to the work of the sisters. The interest of the large assemblage was fully held by Mrs. Wakerley and other sisters, who told of their work among the people in Central London.

At the evening hour there was another goodly gathering for the final and more public exposition of the work of the Mission. The president was Mr. G. WARREN, of Luton. In an informal report of the year's work, Rev. J. E. WAKERLEY said it had been one of great blessing. The work had been extended by the holding of Sunday-afternoon services at Holborn Town Hall. That effort has been a channel of great spiritual good. There has been a large proportion of working-men at these meetings, many of them "non church-goers." Scarcely a Sunday passes without direct evidence of the saving power of the truth. The class-meetings, said Mr. Wakerley, were equal to any he had ever seen or known in connection with Methodism. The congregations at St. John's-square had been larger than ever during recent months, and the gifts of the people have been proof of the reality of their religious life. The Sunday-schools are in a flourishing condition. The speaker said he could tell some thrilling incidents of the conversion of those who had been drawn to the chapel by the brass band, and who stayed and gave themselves to God. Much work is done of a social and temperance as well as a spiritual sort during the week. The work of the sisters is influencing the life of the people of God in their homes. The branch work in Camden Town is also laying hold of the people there. Dr. Howard Downes, of Hornsey, continues his weekly gratuitous service for the medical mission work, and the assistant at Camden Town, Mr. Startup, does the dispensing. In conclusion, Mr. Wakerley made an earnest appeal for financial help for the expanding work of the Mission. The congregation, though poor, has raised £1000 during the past year, but the annual cost of the mission is £1800.

The addresses that followed were in keeping with the stirring and joyous character of the occasion. The speakers were the Chairman, Rev. C. H. Kelly, Rev. F. Luke Wiseman, and Rev. W. D. Valters, the Secretary of the London Mission.

Sailors' Rest, Dunkerque.—Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Mackenzie, in their new report, trace the experiences of the past three years, and give letters showing how greatly God is blessing the work. The need being felt for larger premises, a house has been secured near the dock gates, well adapted for the purpose. This involves increased expenditure, and about £100 to defray cost of fitting up coffee-bar and mission-room. Details are given of the visits paid to ships, hospitals, etc., the tracts distributed, and the meetings held. The address is, Mr. D. S. Mackenzie, Sailors' Rest, Dunkerque.

Mrs. Baeyertz in Hull.

[BY A CORRESPONDENT.]

LAST week Mrs. Baeyertz concluded a fortnight's mission at Prospect-street Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. J. Mackay, pastor). Tidings of her marked success in Scotland during the past two or three years had preceded her visit, so that there were great expectations and much prayer for blessing.

From the very beginning the attendances were very large. At the afternoon Bible-readings the attendance steadily rose from under 300 to over 600. These Bible-readings for Christians have been a very prominent feature in Mrs. Baeyertz's work. The addresses were singularly tender, faithful, and full of Holy Ghost power. The Word of God has been made more real than ever before to very many, and Christians have been led to a higher level of spiritual life.

At the evangelistic services in the evening the large church was crammed full in every available corner, and towards the close of the mission many could not get in. On Sunday evening every foot of standing room was packed, and the door shut long before the time for beginning the service; then the large lecture-hall, with gallery, was filled with an overflow meeting, which was addressed by the pastor; and even then hundreds turned away disappointed. The Gospel addresses were singularly clear, terse, and Scriptural. Mrs. Baeyertz preaches the old Evangelical Gospel, as one who believes it with her whole being, and who knows its power in her own life, and undoubtedly she "preached the Gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven."

Every service produced manifest results. There were large after-meetings, in which she spoke to all together from God's Word, every inquirer having Bibles put into their hands, so as to get their own eyes fixed on God's own Word, as text after text was referred to; thereafter workers spoke to individual inquirers, whose names and addresses were taken. During the fortnight a large number of names were handed in, and these are now being visited. The closing day of the mission was to have been very special; three services were arranged. Unfortunately Mrs. Baeyertz took ill early in the morning of that day, and could not be present. Rev. J. J. Mackay, the pastor, took her place, addressing a large gathering at noon, a crammed one at three, and speaking in two churches at night. Prospect-street Church was packed in every corner where standing ground could be had, and an overflow of over 1000 nearly filling Albion Congregational Church. Rev. A. Allan assisted in the evening. Mrs. Baeyertz was sufficiently recovered to travel to St. Leonards-on-Sea two days later, where she is now recruiting.

It has been a time of great blessing to Hull; "showers of blessing" have fallen. The Christians have been very markedly revived and led to a deeper and fuller life of faith, and all over the town many have been awakened and converted. No mission of recent years has stirred up so deep and widespread an interest in the town as this has.

Dependence.

THE sea-swayed mosses clinging to the rock,

The little pool left by the ebbing sea,
The dying echo of the thunder's shock,

The leaflet swinging on its parent tree.

Each by some tie invisible is bound,

The weaker still depending on the strong;

The parted waters to the deep profound,

And faintest echoes to some voice belong.

So have I felt myself a very part

Of elemental worlds I cannot see.

A swinging leaf, my pendant, quivering heart

Grows on the tree of old Eternity.

A clinging shred, I stay my tide-swept will,

And anchor it on ageless rocks of might.

A tiny, land-locked pool, I feel the thrill

Of wide, unfathomed waters out of sight.

A human fragment, I am not alone

In this vast universe, so deep and broad;

But I belong to worlds beyond the sun,

And I, an atom, still am joined to God.

The Brothers Weaver.

A STRANGER walking down the Mile End-road, and wending his way into the Great Assembly Hall any evening during the past month, might well ask the question, "What is it that brings these crowds of people together nightly?" During the month of January the whole of the other meetings were suspended, so that an uninterrupted mission might be held, and the New Year commenced with evangelistic meetings every night. The Weaver Brothers, who were so greatly blessed a year ago, took the entire services from Sunday morning till Saturday night.

From the very beginning there were signs of blessing, and as the time wore on it increased. These two young evangelists have become great favourites with those attending the hall, and so earnest have the workers been that outsiders have been induced to come and hear them; many who do not usually go to any place of worship have for the first time come to the Great Assembly Hall, and through the preaching and singing of the Brothers Weaver been brought to the Lord. The inquiry-room has been used after every meeting they have held, and on Sunday nights the hall has been filled to its utmost capacity, some nights hundreds having to go away unable to find room. During the month, hundreds were dealt with about their souls' welfare, and the inquiry cards show that persons from far and near came forward inquiring the way of salvation.

Some extremely interesting cases came under the notice of the Weavers, and while the new-born souls were rejoicing in their first love of the dear Saviour, the workers of the mission have praised God for such a glorious month of soul-saving to begin the year 1896 with.

E. H. K.

For the past week the Brothers Weaver have been conducting a Gospel mission at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Queen's Park, Kilburn-road, N.W. The meetings have grown each night in numbers, interest, and power. The mission continues till February 23.

Glasgow Christian Workers' Union.

THE seventeenth annual social meeting was recently held in St. Andrew's Halls. The large hall was completely filled. Mr. A. B. Munro, president, occupied the chair. After tea the chairman explained the object of the Union, which embraces Christian workers from many of the Evangelical Churches, missions, and undenominational meetings throughout the city. A monthly conference is held regularly in St. Andrew's Halls. This conference is so largely attended that they have been obliged to remove on four occasions during the last few years, to find accommodation for the people. No other hall in the city could accommodate them.

The object of the monthly conference is to stimulate Christian workers to greater zeal in evangelistic work. Perhaps no city in the world has a larger number of evangelistic workers than Glasgow. Often they carry on work under adverse circumstances, and with much discouragement. The monthly conference brightens and encourages them; meeting with like-minded workers in one centre at regular intervals is a great help. Hearty singing and earnest addresses make the conference attractive. Generally two speakers of tried capacity give short addresses on a subject previously announced.

The social meeting was afterwards addressed by Rev. Jas. Smith, Mr. Logan, Mr. Gerrard, Mr. Armstrong, and others.

A "Penny" Missionary.—On Friday last the members of the Missionary Pence Association had a hearty gathering in the lecture-hall of the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate-street, to bid God-speed to a young friend going out to Africa as the first representative of the Association in the foreign field. Mr. John Jackson made an interesting statement respecting the objects and operations of the M.P.A. The outgoing missionary is Mr. G. J. Wilkerson, who has passed through a period of training in the South London Missionary Training Institute. He is proceeding to Matabeleland under the direction of the London Missionary Society. Rev. G. Cousins and others gave addresses.

Mr. W. R. Lane.

CHRIST CHURCH, WESTMINSTER BRIDGE ROAD.

THIS evangelist recently conducted a very successful mission in the church. In the course of six days many names were handed in of those who were ready to be conversed with. There is every reason to believe that a large number have received Christ. Girls from Miss Heath's Home, Lads from the Southwark Lads' Home, and several husbands and wives, were amongst the inquirers. Mr. Lane is wonderfully popular with our working men, and his clear, scriptural, earnest addresses attracted large audiences every evening. F. B. MEYER.

CHELMSFORD.

The London-road Congregational Church, Chelmsford (Rev. T. McDougall Mundle, pastor), has been for the last week the centre of a mission by Mr. W. R. Lane. The building accommodates about 1200 persons, and was several times filled to overflowing, especially last Sunday evening. A special service for men only on Sunday afternoon was attended by 600 or 700, many of whom were evidently not accustomed to attending any place of worship. Bible readings on the afternoons were an important and much appreciated feature of the proceedings, and were largely attended. Mr. Lane's practical common-sense presentations of Scripture truth being very helpful to many Christians of all denominations.

A considerable number of persons were enabled to confess their acceptance of the truth, as it is Jesus, and many who were already believers have derived much instruction and stimulus in the Christian life from the ministrations of our friend. It is confidently expected that much lasting good will result. A. J. T.

Mr. C. Inglis at Tunbridge Wells.

THE hearts of the Lord's people are filled with gratitude for all they have seen in the meetings held here by Mr. Charles Inglis under the auspices of the Bible Mission. The meetings were held the first week in the Baptist Tabernacle, and the second week in one of the suburbs. From the first the Spirit of God was felt to be working in a most gracious manner, and as soon as the opportunity was given numbers passed into the inquiry-room to be taught in the way of the Lord more perfectly.

The second Sunday was a very memorable day. The new building, in which Mr. John McAuliffe carries on so successful a work, was crowded to overflowing, while Mr. Inglis was preaching on the "The Strait Gate and the Closed Door" many were deeply stirred, and we believe that not a few names were enrolled in the Lamb's Book of Life as the result of that and subsequent services.

The unity among Christians has been very marked. The afternoon Bible-readings were well attended and owned of God. C.

Tylorstown Colliery Explosion.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to thank your readers for their prayers and practical sympathy in our efforts to minister comfort to the sufferers caused by this explosion.

Though in point of numbers not so serious as many in the past, yet there are circumstances connected with some of the cases that make them exceptionally distressing, and now that the crowd of visitors are gone, funerals past, the collieries working, and the excitement subsided, the poor bereaved ones are feeling their position more keenly, and their sorrow is more poignant. I shall, as in similar disasters, continue to visit the homes for some time, and distribute any money entrusted to me amongst the most needy cases.—Yours in Christ's service. THOS. M. WINTLE.

Pontymoile, Pontypool, South Wales.

The Church Temperance Society of New York, after careful investigation of their successful use in England, is to establish a system of temperance bar-rooms, a large temperance liquor-store, lunch-cottages near car-stables, cab-stands, and in similar places, push-carts to carry coffee and other refreshments to coachmen waiting by their horses in the cold, as well as enlarged and improved night-lunch wagons. Library and lecture-rooms will be added to the bar-rooms. Bishop Fallows, a trustee of the United Society of Christian Endeavour, has set the same enterprise on foot in Chicago.

Missions at Taunton.

A WAVE of blessing seems to be passing over West Somerset. The centre of interest is the capital of the county, but the blessing is by no means limited to Taunton. Bridgwater, Wellington, and the neighbouring towns and villages are all awaking to the Gospel's joyful sound.

In December of last year Mr. Geo. Clarke visited the district. During the mission there was visible a beautiful unity of effort. In addition to lay workers there were about twenty clergymen and ministers praying, speaking, and working in the inquiry room. The result was that numbers professed to have found blessing through the meeting.

A month before the mission Rev. F. B. Meyer held a Prayer Union conference in the town, which was attended by Christians of all denominations. Since the mission Rev. J. Manton Smith has conducted services for ten consecutive evenings. These services were crowded each night. This is the third time Mr. Smith has visited Taunton, and each time his hold upon the people has seemed to grow. L. P.

Temperance Notes.

FRIENDS in Birmingham and Liverpool will provide the cost of a cottage in Lady Henry Somerset's Inebriate Colony.

The Bristol Temperance Society, one of the oldest teetotal organisations, has been celebrating its sixtieth anniversary.

Nearly 400 pledges were taken at Mr. Tennyson Smith's Gospel Temperance Mission at Falmouth; and on Sunday week, at Morriston, South Wales, 114 pledges were taken.

A symposium on "The Drink Problem" has been appearing in the Belfast News Letter. In the majority of instances total abstinence is regarded as the only means of stemming the growing evil.

A new temperance paper will shortly appear, the necessary arrangements being now nearly completed. It will be of a most aggressive type, and will maintain a thoroughly uncompromising attitude towards the liquor traffic.

Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., presiding over the annual meeting of the London Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance, said they would never cease to demand power for the people to protect themselves against the liquor traffic.

The first of a series of meetings for young people, organised by the National Temperance League, has been held in Sion College. The aim of the promoters is to bridge over the gulf between the Band of Hope and the senior temperance organisations.

At the Aston Police-court application was made for the transfer of a licence to a noted pugilist. The chief constable opposed the application because of the following the pugilist would have, and the magistrates, regarding the objection as fatal, refused the licence.

Many eyes are watching with deepest interest the Industrial Farm Home Colony for Inebriate Women, which is gradually approaching completion, in connection with the British Women's Temperance Association, and under the immediate supervision of Lady Henry Somerset. The originator and secretary of the work is Dr. Sarah J. Anderson Brown.

The representatives of seven town councils in Scotland had a conference last week with the Secretary for Scotland, in Edinburgh, on the subject of the extension of the powers of the Public Houses Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887, to the burghs now excluded from it. The deputation urged that 10 o'clock at night should be the closing hour for public-houses all over Scotland. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, in reply, said he thought that the deputation, coming as it did with so strong a case, afforded very strong prima facie evidence indeed that it was the deliberate wish of the communities which it represented that an alteration should be made.

Mr. James Whyte, secretary of the U.K.A., has published a letter on drink and the death rate, showing that abstainers have a great advantage in the matter of longevity. The Times, commenting thereupon, admits that "Mr. Whyte's statistics, if they are accurate and complete, tell strongly in favour of abstinence from alcohol. We admit that as a body teetotallers enjoy probably a higher average of health and have a better expectation of life than an equal number of their neighbours who use alcohol, including among the latter both moderate and excessive drinkers. This, in all probability, may be attributed not a little to the fact that the teetotallers as a class are persons of strong will, which always makes for health and longevity, and frequently of a native physical energy not requiring artificial stimulants."

International S.S. Lessons.

FEBRUARY 23.

FAITH ENCOURAGED.—Luke viii. 43-55.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Verse 48.

EXPLANATORY.—"Ruler" (41)—one of the laymen who had charge of the synagogue. Possibly he had been one of the deputation which waited upon Jesus on behalf of the Roman centurion. "The border of his garment" (44)—not the lower hem of his garment, which it would have been impossible to touch in such a crowd, but "one of the tassels or tufts of scarlet woollen cord attached to the four corners of the outer robe, and intended to remind the Israelites of their law." "Bewailed" (52)—the word means, to beat their breasts for grief. The professional mourners used the most extravagant modes of expressing their grief (see Mark v. 38).

The lessons gather around the two miracles, and are intended, as the title suggests, to encourage faith.

I. The first miracle (43-48) took place on the way from the house of Matthew (Matt. ix. 18) to that of Jairus. To the ruler it was an unwelcome interruption, for his child was at the point of death (42). It is well to see in this afflicted woman (1) An illustration of our own condition. Sin is a disease like that from which this woman suffered. It rendered her ceremonially unclean (Lev. xv. 25), as sin unfits us for the presence of God. It was incurable by any efforts of her own (43), as sin cannot be cleansed by ceremonialism, penance, good works, good resolutions; nor can it be forgotten by indifference or worldly pleasure. It must be cured, or we can never enter where God dwells (Rev. xxi. 27).

(2) An example of simple faith. Not that her faith was perfect. It seems to have been mixed with superstition. She would steal the cure without the knowledge of Jesus. Yet her faith was strong. She recognised in Jesus such fulness of life and power that a mere touch would do for her what all the physicians had failed to do. And so she acted her faith. Picture her pressing through the throng risking their displeasure, putting forth her hand, and obtaining immediately what she desired. Imitate her. The throng that keeps men from getting near to Jesus is the ever-increasing occupations of life—its duties, cares, pleasures. Press through them all, and get into contact with Him who can heal.

(3) An illustration of public confession. It was not good for her, nor for the people, nor for Him, that she should go away undiscovered. Jesus knew the difference between the pressure of the crowd and the touch of faith (45, 46). Besides making this woman a witness before the crowd of the power of Jesus (47), her confession was a blessing to herself. It corrected her mistake concerning the readiness of Jesus to heal; it made the healing, not a kind of magical effect from touching the garment, but a result of faith in Him (48). Imitate her confession. The attempt to be secret disciples is vain (Matt. x. 32).

II. In the second miracle (49-55) our Lord seems to aim particularly at strengthening the faith of Jairus. He limited Jesus, first, as to method. He deems contact with his daughter necessary. And, next, as to time. He believes that "while there's life there's hope"; but when life is gone, of what use is it to "trouble the Master" further (49)? The incident corrects these mistakes in three ways:—

(1) By trial. The interruption and delay are necessary for Jairus. The case must become absolutely hopeless; and yet he must learn that Jesus never loses a case He undertakes. If, after committing our difficulty to Jesus it gets worse instead of better, it is only in order that we may trust Him for a greater blessing.

(2) By a promise (50). Though spoken to this man it is a message for all. Unbelief produces fear, and "fear hath torment"; but faith is the antidote for fear. "Believe only." The danger is, not that Christ's power will fail, but that the ruler's faith will fail. Receive the message. In our Lord all fulness dwells. We never exceed in our expectation what He is able to do. Whether the need is in yourself, or in others, "Believe only."

(3) By the miracle (51-55).—Picture them entering the chamber of death. Upon the bed the child lies, only twelve years old, yet dead! Death claims all sorts of victims. The companions of Jesus (51) were the three favoured disciples, and the parents. The professional mourners were put forth. They are not needed in the chamber of death when Jesus is there. In his presence death becomes sleep (52), not for this child alone, but for the bodies of all his people (1 Cor. xv. 20). Why fear the cemetery if it is but the sleeping place of God's children until the bright Resurrection morning? Though mocked for the word (53), yet the work which followed proved his word correct. What power is that of Jesus! Even Death releases its victim at his command. Unbelief towards such a Saviour is without excuse.

The Y.M.C.A.

ATone of the Cape Town weekly fellowship meetings, Mr. R. C. Morgan, of London, editor of THE CHRISTIAN, was present, and gave an address.

The report of the Exmouth Association shows a steady increase in the membership, and much blessing on the evangelistic and other operations. The annual meetings, held on Wednesday week, were addressed by Rev. S. C. Porter, Mr. W. H. Roberts, and Mr. Seagram.

A social evening was spent on Wednesday at the Cairns Memorial House, Bournemouth, with the object of bidding farewell and making a presentation to Mr. W. J. Meredith, who for eight and a-half years has held the post of secretary to the Bournemouth Association. There was a good attendance, Rev. George Wainwright presiding.

Under the auspices of the Walsall Y.M.C.A. Foreign Missionary Auxiliary, a series of missionary meetings have just been conducted by Mr. S. A. McCracken. Ten large meetings were held from Saturday to Tuesday, and much interest in the "Regions Beyond" awakened. The limelight exhibitions, representing Dr. Guinness's famous hand-painted pictures, vividly assisted the mind in realising the claims of heathendom.

The Employment Bureau at Cape Town is in full swing, and the general secretary, Mr. Will G. Sprigg, has his hands full in registering those in need of work. The present crisis on the Rand has made itself felt quickly, a large number who landed at Cape Town with the intention of going up-country being now obliged to stay in Cape Town, which, added to the number of refugees from Johannesburg, threatens a serious state of affairs unless steps be immediately taken to cope with the difficulty.

A recent visit to the Association of the City of Mexico has directed attention to the brave struggle that has been made to sustain a Protestant religious work for young men in this centre of Roman Catholicism. The membership now numbers 180, and eighty of this number are Spanish-speaking young men, of intelligence and good business standing, who, through the Association, have had the only opportunity of which they would avail themselves of coming into contact with the Protestant faith.

The Coldstream branch of the Y.M.C.A. have commenced, on Sabbath evenings, a course of evangelistic meetings to be conducted in the Y.C.M.A. Hall by the ministers of the town, in the following order: Revs. J. L. Elder, A. M. Caldwell, Rutherford, A. Nisbet, and P. Mearns. The success of the meetings during the first week of the year has encouraged the young men to arrange for a longer series of meetings. The members visit the houses in the lower parts of the town, distributing tracts and small books, to encourage attendance.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, of Notting Hill Presbyterian Church, has become an active worker at Exeter Hall. For some time past, he has been addressing a meeting of men every Thursday evening, with a success which is shown by rapidly increasing audiences. His subject last week was "Formation of Character"—a theme which gave him scope for a variety of moods. At one moment he was discussing a biological problem, and the next he was using idioms familiar to the unlearned portion of his audience. Throughout his address Mr. Macgregor was listened to with the closest attention.

The monthly meeting of the National Executive of Y.M.C.A.'s was held at Exeter Hall on Friday afternoon, under the presidency of Mr. M. H. Hodder. At the conclusion farewell was taken of Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Clark, who are proceeding to India. Mr. Clark was for eight years honorary secretary of the Bombay City Association. He has been in this country on extended furlough, during which his marriage has taken place; now, accompanied by Mrs. Clark, he is returning to his Indian appointment, and will resume his hearty and most valuable co-operation in the work of the Bombay Y.M.C.A. Mr. Henry Conder, ex-president of the Bombay work, was amongst those present at the farewell gathering.

The public religious life at Yale centres in its Y.M.C.A., which is the largest and the leading among the many college societies. Dwight Hall, the Association building, is one of the handsomest on the campus. Its purpose is primarily to furnish a home and centre for the religious life of the whole university. It forms, with its attractive reading-rooms and library, a common meeting-place for the students. Here its general secretary has a permanent office, where his fellows can meet him for any service he may be able to render them. An employment bureau, for the benefit of the multitude of Yale men who depend on employment to meet their expenses, is sustained. The membership is now more than a thousand, and it is the largest of the 525 College Y.M.C. Associations in the world.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE Greyfriars Institute, Reading, met on Thursday for the New Year's tea and social. Mrs. Tottenham, of Wimbledon, gave the address.

The Windsor and Eton branch reports steady progress in membership and in attendance at the classes. A series of special services by Rev. W. H. Stone were much blessed.

Mrs. E. Crossley presided at the annual gathering of the Halifax branch, when about 140 attended. Several addresses were given, including one on Work in Inland China, by Mr. Marcus Wood.

The formal opening of a new restaurant and boarding-house at No. 1, Bank-street, Dundee, took place in presence of an influential gathering. In the evening a crowded meeting was held, when Miss Reynolds again gave an address, and a number joined the Y.W.C.A. in response to an appeal by Miss M. N. Jessiman.

At the annual meeting of the Aberdeen branch, Mr. Gray C. Fraser, who presided, made special reference to the arrival of Miss Lewis as senior lady superintendent. She had commenced the work under very favourable auspices, and there was every indication that the work would prosper under her care. Revs. Martin Lewis, T. B. Kilpatrick, and others gave addresses.

In order to raise a sufficient sum towards the fund for extending the premises of the Plymouth Y.W.C.A., on behalf of which a sale of work was opened on the 29th ult., Alderman W. Law has generously offered the sum of £50, provided that £500 were raised within a reasonable time, or £100, if £1000 could be collected. It is sincerely hoped that the necessary sum will be raised. Miss Pitt (hon. treasurer), 1, Queen's-gate, Plymouth, will be happy to receive donations.

A Y.W.C.A. Conference was held on the 30th Jan. at Dunfermline. Miss Hay, president of the Scotch Division, took the chair at the forenoon meeting. Miss Douglas, Edinburgh, spoke on "Y.W.C.A. Work"; Miss Guinness, London, on "Prayer"; Miss Galloway, on "Bible Study"; Miss Brand, on "Practical Matters"; and Miss Connell, on "Service of Others." The Countess of Moray occupied the chair at the afternoon meeting. Miss Reynolds spoke on "Y.W.C.A.'s Abroad." A public meeting was held in the evening.

The annual tea of the Hampstead branch was held on Thursday, 30th ult., by the kindness of Mr. Gibbard Hughes, at the Children's Hall, Denning Road. The room was well filled with the bright faces of old and new members, many of whom came from a great distance. There was, as usual, an attractive programme of games, singing, violin and other instrumental music and recitations. Miss Minchin gave an interesting account of the society's work in Hampstead and in London, and Rev. J. A. Bevan concluded with an address which came home with power to many hearts.

On Friday evening, Jan. 31, the annual meeting of the Tulse Hill and West Norwood Branch was held at the New Institute, 191, Tulse Hill, Mrs. Tottenham presiding over a very full meeting. The report was a very encouraging one, seventy new members having joined during the past twelve months. Miss Ardill spoke on the work of the Association. Mrs. Tottenham took as her message, "Behold, I come quickly," urging all to be ready for that coming, washed, yielded, "all glorious within," and "loving all the day." Rev. J. L. Stanley closed the meeting with a very helpful address on "The Grace of God and the Peace of God."

Miss Reynolds, sec. of the Y.W.C.A. World's Committee, delivered an address on the 31st ult., in the Gartshore Hall, Edinburgh. The Earl of Moray presided. She spoke of the Y.W.C.A. as a training school for the churches. Forty-one years ago the first association was started, and to-day they had 5000 associations, with a total membership of nearly half a million, speaking in almost every language. In France, 130 associations had been started, in many cases the direct result of the M'All Mission. Throughout the British Isles there were 1340 associations, in the United States 360, in Sweden thirty-six, while in Australia over forty branches were now in full operation.

The particular attention of all workers and members of the Y.W.C.A. is called to the Week of United Prayer which has been arranged for the 16th to the 23rd inst. Mrs. Penn-Lewis, in a letter addressed to the members, asks what hinders effectual prayer, the answer being (1) Iniquity in the heart (Psa. lvi. 18), (2) Idols in the heart (Ezek. xiv. 3), and (3) Doubt in the heart (Mark xi. 23). Sin, idols, and unbelief are the causes of unanswered prayer. The conditions of effectual prayer are all included in a God-possessed life, necessitating a life of obedience (1 John iii. 22), a life permeated with his word (John xv. 7), and a life of prayer in the Holy Ghost (Jude xx.). The conditions are fulfilled in us by our receiving the fulness of the Spirit (see John xiv. 13; Phil. ii. 13). This gives the needed power in prayer, unites us together, and, eliminating self from our petitions, brings down a rich pentecostal blessing on our labours, and gives renewed strength for future work. Special meetings are arranged at nearly all Institutes.

Christian Endeavour.

LONDON'S fifteen or sixteen local Unions of Christian Endeavour have been federated into a London Council of Christian Endeavour, with Rev. F. B. Meyer as president.

During a county convention at Dover, Okla. T., thirty persons expressed their purpose to lead Christian lives. A revival service followed the convention, and many others were converted.

The Turkish sword evidently has few terrors for Endeavourers. During the height of the excitement concerning the Armenian atrocities, a junior C.E. Society was organised at Mersine.

Not content with doing remarkable evangelistic work among the heathen of their own town and neighbourhood, the Endeavourers of Nellore, India, propose adding a Foreign Missionary Committee to their working forces.

A public reading-room is supported by the C.E.S. of Honesdale, Penn. Visits to the number of 8010 were made to the reading-room last year. The Society has observed one month as self-denial month, in behalf of this work.

The missionary spirit that is abroad in Christian Endeavour was manifested at a service lately held at St. Thomas, Ont. These three questions were asked at the consecration meeting:—"1. How many would be willing, if they knew it to be the Lord's will, to go to a foreign mission field? 2. How many would like to go? 3. How many expect to go?" Notice had been given four weeks in advance that these questions would be asked. Of the eighty active members, thirty-five answered affirmatively to the first, twenty to the second, and nine to the third.

Three prize banners will be awarded at the Washington Convention to three Christian Endeavour local Unions. The first banner will go to the Union making the best showing in the way of definite and practical Christian citizenship work. The second will be awarded to the local Union having the largest number of individual members who give not less than one-tenth of their income to God. The third, or fellowship, banner will be secured by the Union organising the largest number of new Christian Endeavour societies. Local Unions should send detailed reports of their work to Secretary Baer, Boston, U.S.A., before June 15th.

Hants Village Mission.

THE Hampshire Village Colportage and Evangelistic Mission, in its seventh report, tells of happy personal work in scattered places over the county. Some most interesting incidents are given, showing the ignorance of the truth, and the way in which God has blessed this wayside ministry. The Gospel van and Bible cars have been actively in use in Hants, Sussex, and Surrey, sowing the seed of the Word, and stemming the tide of impure literature. It is stated that "Visiting in out-of-the-way places, we frequently meet with people who have never received a truly spiritual visitor in their lives. During this year we discovered an old man and woman, who had been living on a small farm five years, and had never once been so visited. During this time the wife had tried to get to the church, several miles away. On returning, she said, she had to sit on a bank, thinking she must stay there until her old man fetched her. To see this poor old couple drink in the Word of Life, as though parched for the want of it, and to feel the grip of their handshake, was in itself a reward for the exertion it had cost to reach them. A young woman, on our asking her where she went to on the Lord's Day, replied, 'Go to, in this heathen place?' She seldom went anywhere, because of the miserable provision provided at the only two places within her reach, and because it would be four miles each way, and dreadful roads, to hear the Gospel."

We regret to observe that this good work suffers for lack of funds, and there is a danger of its relinquishment if help be not forthcoming. The superintendent is Mr. J. Hasell Charlton, Mission Depot, Fareham, Hants.

Cape Colony.—We observed the Week of Prayer here last week, and trust that blessing in rich measure may be vouchsafed by the Master on his cause throughout all the earth. Ten people here have lately professed conversion to God. We hope to see many more brought to the Saviour's feet during this year. Many thanks for THE CHRISTIAN, which comes to hand weekly. We pass it on to others to read.

Scottish Notes.

M. R. DAVID HUNTER, of Sea Tower, Ayr, ship-owner, died on Monday week after a short illness, aged sixty-four years. Deceased, who was a native of Ayr, was well known in shipping circles all over Scotland. Of a retiring disposition, he took little part in public affairs apart from charitable and religious movements, of which he was a warm supporter.

Rev. Alexander Smellie has intimated his resignation to the Session of the Stranraer Original Secession congregation, of which he has been fourteen years pastor, in order to fulfil a literary engagement in connection with the Sunday School Union, London.

A farewell missionary meeting in connection with the departure of sixteen missionaries to Manchuria and Old Calabar was held last week in the Synod Hall, Castle Terrace, Edinburgh. Short addresses were given by several of the missionaries about to depart for the foreign field. The valedictory address was delivered by Rev. J. B. Hastings, who, in speaking to the missionaries, bade them farewell in the name of the Church as well as of the great audience. The following are the names of the missionaries:—Dr. A. M. Westwater, Rev. James Stobie, Rev. J. Miller Graham, Rev. Dr. J. M. Grieve, Dr. D. D. Muir, Dr. Katherine K. Paton, Dr. Mary C. Horner, and Misses E. C. Jones and M. S. Davidson, who are about to leave for Manchuria; Messrs. W. T. Weir (missionary teacher), C. Ovens (missionary carpenter), P. M. Shiels (missionary teacher), T. G. Campbell (missionary carpenter), and Misses Isa Budge, Elizabeth Liddell, and M. A. C. Murray, who will soon leave for Old Calabar. The news of the death of the venerable missionary, Rev. W. Anderson, of Calabar, adds interest to the departure of these new workers.

Irish Notes.

UNDER the auspices of the Belfast Presbytery a series of evangelistic meetings is being held in about fifty Presbyterian churches in Belfast and neighbourhood, and thus a vigorous effort is being made to reach the unsaved in the churches as well as the lapsed masses.

The Belfast City Mission is doing a really noble work in connection with the Presbyterian Church. The Mission employs now twenty-four agents, who during the last year paid 57,000 visits, besides 500 visits to hospitals and workhouses. They also conduct twenty-eight Sunday-schools, in which there are 6000 children and 500 teachers, hold very many open-air and evangelistic missions, and conduct several Bible classes.

Barcelona Protestant Cottage Hospital.

THE value of the Barcelona Cottage Hospital becomes more and more evident as time goes on. Necessity first led to its opening on a very small scale, and as Gospel work takes root the institution is increasingly valued. "The congregations are composed of the poor and working classes; and many members, in case of illness, have no means whatever of securing the attendance they require, nor could anything be expected but bitter persecution if any of them were to enter the Roman Catholic hospitals of the city. During the year we have had fifty-eight entries, including some re-admissions. Of these, thirty-three were cured, nine were alleviated, four were discharged with little or no improvement, nine who were received in a hopeless condition died, and three remained in the hospital on Dec. 31. We began the year with a small balance in hand for current expenses, and we close it in similar circumstances. Our trust, however, is in the living God, who evidently guided us at the first to this work, and has continued to bless it year by year."

Reports and information may be obtained from Miss A. von Mielecka, Ridgemoor, Englefield Green, Surrey.

Irish Distressed Ladies' Fund.—The Earl of Erne draws attention to the numerous distressing appeals that the committee are receiving from Ireland, showing what an amount of suffering among the unfortunate ladies continues to exist, notwithstanding the efforts made to cope with it. Large numbers of ladies have been, and are being, relieved, and arrangements are being made to provide work for those able to help themselves. But the calls upon the committee are large, amounting to £250 a month, and the funds they have at their disposal are totally inadequate. A depot for the sale of the work of the "Irish Distressed Ladies" has been opened at 17, North Audley-street, W., and the offices of the charity have been removed to the same address.

Evangelistic Notes.

Rayleigh, Essex.—A mission has been held in the Wesleyan Chapel here by Mr. and Mrs. Alexander, of Dalston. God has vouchsafed much blessing on the labours of his servants.

Darlington.—A series of special services has been held at the Y.M.C.A. rooms by Messrs. Henry Armstrong, C. J. Dymond, and W. M. Hudson, and great interest is being manifested.

Tring, Herts.—Eight days' special evangelistic services have been held in Western Hall, from February 2 to 9, by Mr. B. H. Angel of Wembley, attended with much blessing. Quite a number of children and young people have confessed Christ as their Saviour.

Moulton, Northampton.—A nine days' mission has been held in the Carey Baptist Chapel, conducted by Miss Haddon, of Clipstone. The services have been well attended, and there have been good results in quickened spiritual life and fresh decisions for Christ. The mission concluded with a tea, to which about 120 sat down. F. C. W.

The Midland Bible Carriage has been working in Humberstone Gate, Leicester, for the last four months. Many have come out on the Lord's side, as night after night the Gospel has been told out. The evangelist, Mr. C. Taylor, has received a summons to appear before the magistrate this week for preaching the Gospel from the Bible Carriage.

Dublin.—The mission held by Mr. William Thomson, of Glasgow, in the Christian Union Buildings, Dublin, has borne blessed fruit. During this short mission, under three weeks, a large number of persons of all ages, and connected with nearly all the churches of the city, and many connected with no church, were personally dealt with.

The Barracks, Newcastle.—An eight days' mission has been held in the garrison schoolroom. Good attendances were secured. The Gospel was spoken and sung by various friends, Col. H. T. S. Yates lending effective aid. Several soldiers yielded to Christ, while some women also professed conversion. At the closing testimony meeting evidence appeared of genuine result.

Weston-super-Mare.—A fifteen days' mission has been held in Christ Church Mission-room, by Mr. J. G. Stanger, of the Evangelisation Society. The addresses have been most solemn and searching both to Christians and to the unsaved. The Holy Spirit has been striving with many hearts and some have found peace in believing. We do indeed thank God for his servant's visit. C. N.

Ireland.—Evangelistic meetings of a very successful character have been held in Larne, by Mr. S. G. Montgomery. The two Presbyterian congregations in the town heartily united, and there were several professed conversions. Similar meetings have been held in Deerpark Methodist Church, by Rev. G. W. Rea, of Longford; in Tempo, by Mrs. Brown-Anderson, of America; and in Agnes-street Methodist Church, Belfast, by Rev. J. H. Moran, of Lurgan.

Glasgow.—Mr. David Rea, of Ireland, began meetings in Garscube Hall early in January. The interest increased nightly, week night meetings being well attended, and Sunday evenings crowded. Prayer meetings are held three times daily. One outcome of the work has been the taking of the Olympia, a place well known as the New City-road show ground, now covered in, and capable of holding thousands. Thousands have heard the Gospel here on Sunday evening.

Ridgeway, Ontario.—At the invitation of all the pastors, Rev. E. P. Hammond has held nearly two weeks' meetings in this place. The buildings have not been large enough to hold the crowds that have assembled. A large number of young and old profess conversion. The meetings resemble in power those conducted by Mr. Hammond in Ontario seventeen years ago, when audiences of from three to five thousands in the drill-sheds of London, Brantford, and Toronto assembled night after night to listen to the earnest preaching of the Gospel. F. I.

American Colleges.—Mr. S. M. Sayford is doing a remarkable work amongst American students. During the last few years he has visited more than 200 colleges, and God has greatly owned his labours amongst all classes of young men—the Christian professors, the careless, the godless and sinful, the sceptical and infidel. Last month he was at Boston working in ten colleges, this month he is in Andover and Vermont. The characteristics of his preaching are fearless denunciation of the vices of students, and the setting forth of the absolute claims of the Lord Jesus for full surrender.

Camberwell.—Mr. Charles Edwards, of Winchester, has delivered in the Baptist Chapel, Charles-street, Camberwell New-road, a series of instructive lectures, illustrated by large pictures, by which he makes the old, old story of the blessed Gospel stand out in clearness and power. The crowds increased nightly. Among those who received God is one who up to last week was a thorough infidel and despiser of God. The evangelist has a wonderful power over young people. He is willing to help any chapels, churches, or missions with his illustrated pictorial addresses; any requests should be sent to him at the Soldiers' Home, Winchester.

JOHN WAITE, Pastor.

The Christian Instruction Society is holding special Evangelistic missions in many of the London churches. Services have been conducted in Sutherland Chapel, Walworth-road, by Mr. W. P. Crombie, Evangelist, from Canada, assisted by Rev. R. Mackay, and the pastor of the Church, Rev. G. W. Keesey. Missions have also been carried on at the Pilgrim Fathers' church, and at Millwall. Last week special services were held at Coverdale Chapel, Limehouse, while this week a mission is going on at Burdett-road Congregational Church. Within the next week or two missions are to be held at Bedford Chapel, Camden Town, Barnsbury, Arthur Street Baptist Chapel, and Forest Gate. Applications from other churches may be sent to Rev. R. Mackay, the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, E.C.

Gipsy Smith.—Mr. Joseph Dawson, of Boston University, writes that Mr. Smith arrived in New York on January 14. On the evening of the same day he began a series of services in Boston. Ere long signs of a great awakening were seen. Hundreds have been converted to God. The revival is felt throughout the city and suburbs. Many come from curiosity that they may see and hear a "gipsy" preach. The meetings are devoid of sensationalism. Gipsy Smith has no theatrical tricks that he uses to attract the people. A pathetic incident occurred one night when two men from England, who had heard Gipsy Smith preach at home, but resisted the appeal, knelt side by side, and were converted to God. When the meeting began, about 1,000 persons were present. Last Sunday, both morning and evening, 3000 people packed the church. The services are held in the "People's Temple," the largest Methodist church in Boston. The signs are that hundreds more will be converted before the meetings close. "Gipsy Smith" believes that hundreds of God's people in England are praying for him.

Personalia.

Professor Henry Drummond, we regret to know, makes slow progress towards recovery. He suffers considerable pain from the rheumatic affection that has laid him aside.

Rev. Dr. Maclaren completed on Tuesday his 70th year, having been born on February 11, 1826. He is now the senior Nonconformist minister in Manchester, having held the pastorate of Union Chapel, Oxford-road, since 1858.

Rev. D. C. Boyd is now general secretary and treasurer of the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society. His address is 11, Albion-street, Dowanhill, Glasgow. Mr. Boyd's predecessor, Rev. J. Fordyce, has left Cambridge for 8, Walpole-terrace, Brighton.

Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, who preached on Sunday week at West Croydon Baptist Chapel, was on the preceding Saturday afternoon baptized by Dr. James A. Spurgeon. In the course of an address, he explained to the friends present his reasons for taking the step.

Rev. G. C. Knapp, of Bitlis, Turkey-in-Asia, has been singled out for persecution by the Sultan and his agents. An attempt has been made to arrest him on a charge of sedition and murder, based on an accusation signed under coercion by certain Armenian prisoners who are still in gaol. Mr. Terrell, the American Minister at Constantinople, insists that in the event of the Turkish authorities maintaining the accusation, Mr. Knapp shall be conveyed to the capital for trial before him. Mr. Knapp, who is seventy-two years of age, is one of the most highly-respected of the American missionaries in Turkey. In our issue of June 13, 1893, we gave a portrait of him and a sketch of his work. He has laboured in Armenia for full forty years, doing a great deal to advance education, as well as diffuse the Gospel. From Bitlis as a centre there is a network of stations going into the surrounding country.

South London Police-court Mission.—A long-felt want in connection with our Police-court Mission in South London has been a Shelter Home for Boys. Through the munificence of an anonymous donor, who has sent us £350, we have been able to take a suitable house at 134, Camberwell-road, S.E., which we hope to open in February; but before we can get to work the house must be furnished, and a stock of clothing obtained. If we have to purchase all this, a considerable hole will be made in our funds. Magistrates often ask our missionaries to take charge of lads rather than commit them to prison; the missionaries are constantly in great straits as to what to do with them.

Obituary.

MR. HENRY TOYE, LEWISHAM.

VERY early in the morning, on the first day of the week," Mr. Henry Toye entered into the palace of the King to hear from his Master's blessed lips "Well done, good and faithful servant." This aged servant of Christ was well known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN as the founder of the Home for the Fatherless in Lewisham, a work which he carried on in simple dependence upon God for the supply of the children's need. Our readers will pray that God may indeed be a Father to those who are thus left doubly fatherless. Mr. Toye was 74 years old; the interment will take place to-morrow (Friday) in Lewisham Cemetery at 2 p.m.—F. H. D.

REV. W. ANDERSON, OLD CALABAR.

The death is reported by the African mail steamer at Liverpool of the venerable African missionary, Rev. William Anderson, aged eighty-four. In our issue of November 28 we gave a portrait and sketch of the man and his pioneer work. He laboured at Old Calabar for nearly fifty years, and was known to the natives as "Daddy Anderson." The United Presbyterian body some time since superannuated him, but in September last he returned to his work, as he said, to end his days in Old Calabar, and be buried by the side of his wife, who pre-deceased him. Soon after arriving out, he preached to large congregations, but in December he was stricken with fever, which terminated fatally.

"Where is Mount Sinai?"

At a meeting, last week, of the members of the Victoria Institute, Professor E. Hull, LL.D., F.R.S., the leader of the last surveying expedition to Arabia Petraea, read a paper in which he described the work of the Survey and the errors to which currency had lately been given in certain works on Eastern sites. In beginning, Professor Hull replied to the question put by Professor Sayce in a recently published pamphlet, by showing that the position of Mount Sinai (the Mount of the Law) is really that assigned to it by tradition, and is the Jebel Musà situated in the centre of the Sinaitic Peninsula. This view he proved to be the true one, showing (1) that the position was in accordance with the account in Exodus of the journeys of the Israelites from the Red Sea (Gulf of Suez) to Sinai; (2) also with that from Sinai to Ezion Geber (Akabah) and Kadesh Barnea; (3) by a consideration of the physical features of Jebel Musà itself as regards camping ground, water supply, and pasture for the flocks and herds of the Israelites.

Professor Hull also considered the case of alternative sites proposed by some authors, such as Jebel Serbâl, &c., but showed that none of them accorded with the account in Exodus and Numbers to the extent of Jebel Musà. In the views here indicated the author claimed to have the support of Dean Stanley, Professor Palmer, Dr. Robinson, and the officers of the Ordnance Survey of Sinai, and they were also the result of a personal survey of the region. He supported his contention by describing the features of the surrounding district, and the physical characteristics of the mountain itself, all parts of which had been carefully surveyed under his superintendence, or personally examined. Sir Charles Wilson, K.C.B., F.R.S., and several members took part in a discussion, in which the immense value of survey work such as that carried out by Professor Hull was commented on.

London Cabmen's Mission.—Mr. Dupe's latest report shows that the work goes on quietly, and with tokens of blessing. The Gospel services at the Mission Hall, the visiting of the men on the banks, the Gospel temperance meetings, and the work among the children have all been well sustained with much encouragement. Unhappily, a deficit of £27 is shown on the year, raising the debt on the mission to £500. Thus there is great need for help. The superintendent is Mr. John Dupe, 165, Hemingford-road, Barnsbury.

A Lodging-house Tea.—The workers of the Holborn and Gray's Inn-road Lodging-house Mission entertained a large company of men and women from the houses to tea at John-street Chapel on Monday week. Mr. W. C. Parkinson, L.C.C., who presided, dwelt on the necessity of fighting the craving for strong drink. During the evening earnest addresses were also given by Messrs. J. Groom, White, S. Evans, J. Eidmans, Austin, and Fielder. Through the kindness of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the workers were able to distribute a large number of copies of the Gospels. The work, which has now been carried on for a number of years, has again and again received evidences of God's blessing, but the workers are handicapped by the want of pecuniary support.—Address the secretary, Lodging-house Mission, John-street Chapel, Bedford-row, W.C.

THE BOOK WORLD.

MR. RADCLIFFE'S LIFE.

MANY of our readers, we feel sure, will be eager to welcome and read the memoir of this loved evangelist, written and compiled by his wife, which is now issued under the title of Recollections of Reginald Radcliffe. (4s. 6d. and 6s. Morgan & Scott.) It is a loving and faithful tribute to the memory of one of the most devoted servants of God and his Church that this generation has seen. Mrs. Radcliffe has aimed at presenting the facts of her husband's remarkable life, rather than at constructing any mere literary monument to him. The facts, whether embodied in the author's own delightful recollections, or in the contributions made by other hands, describe a life whose single and constant purpose was to proclaim the love of God to men in Jesus Christ, and to impress on all fellow-believers the privilege of heralding the same glorious message. In pursuit of this all-absorbing object, Mr. Radcliffe traversed at various times almost all parts of his native land, a great portion of the European continent, and, in one of his later years, he visited America. In most of these journeys Mrs. Radcliffe accompanied him, so that she is able to speak of them from personal cognizance, and to recall from copious diaries many deeply interesting incidents and experiences. Though poor physical health never permitted him to visit distant heathen lands, in heart and spirit at any rate Mr. Radcliffe went out to the whole round world, and almost his expiring breath was given to framing a faltering but fervid appeal to all Christians to share in its evangelisation. Through his frail human tabernacle there seemed to thrill and vibrate the zeal of a dozen ordinary saints; while the simplicity of his faith and the fervid artlessness of his prayers were truly phenomenal. It was a marvel to many, how he sustained to the very close of life all the freshness and ardour of youth. The great secret of all was his clear apprehension and tenacious hold of the unseen and eternal, and his implicit trust in the promises of the Heavenly Father.

It seems to us that a bright and steady light disappeared from the horizon of human endeavour when our much-loved brother was translated to the higher service. We earnestly trust that this simple record of his lifework will help to perpetuate and to extend its marvellous influence. It may be that in the purpose and providence of God, some young man, through the reading of it, will be baptized for the dead by the Spirit of vision and of power, and will thus be prepared for taking up a part of the burden which our brother has been called upon to relinquish.

The important address on National Crises and Missions, by Dr. George Smith, of Edinburgh, which lately appeared in our columns, has been reprinted as a neat booklet. Copies can be had from the Student Volunteer Missionary Union, 93, Aldersgate-street, E.C.

The Mission World, or "The Missions of the World," is an excellent monthly edited by Rev. Gavin Carlyle. The January issue continues a description of the great societies, and an account of work in Tierra del Fuego, by Mr. Robert Young. (3d. monthly. (C. Hornsby, 12, St. Bride-street, E.C.)

For the Garden. Two useful and seasonable works are before us: The Encyclopædia of Gardening, by T. W. Sanders (Collingridge), is a handy and comprehensive dictionary of cultivated plants, with directions for treatment. Special Manures for Garden Crops, by A. B. Griffiths (2s. Collingridge), gives minute directions in a popular form as to the cultivation of flowers.

The proceedings of the recent Conference of Friends in Manchester has been published in book form, and can be had from Messrs. Headley Brothers, 14, Bishopsgate-street, E.C. Nearly 400 pages of beautifully printed and highly stimulating reading-matter for sixpence (nett) will be admitted to be a marvel of production, even in these days of competitive cheapness. All students of contemporary religious thought and movement ought to possess this volume.

Daily Light Birthday Book (2s. 6d.) is the title of a little volume, beautifully printed and strongly bound, issued by Bagster & Sons. The devotional pages, in the very words of Scripture, are alternated with plain ruled pages on which may be written the names of friends and acquaintances. Broken Bread for Daily Use is a companion volume, giving thoughts and comments on the headline texts of "Daily Light," by Rev. Evan H. Hopkins. It is calculated to prove helpful to many.

The Faithful Dead, by A. Lay Churchman, has for its secondary title the question, "Shall we Pray for Them?" It is a thoughtful examination of a subject which has much exercised some minds, and the result is a demonstration that the doctrine of an intermediate place of purification, and prayers for the dead, is without Scriptural authority. The teachings of Dean Luckock and Canon MacColl are subjected to pointed criticism, and the teaching of the Book of Common Prayer is reviewed in a manner which will greatly interest Evangelical members of the Church of England. (2s. 6d. Nisbet.)

On Sermon Preparation: Recollections and Suggestions. Rev. A. R. Buckland writes an introduction to this volume, in which eleven well-known preachers explain their methods of sermon preparation. The authors include the Bishop of Ripon, Deans Lefroy and Farrar, Archdeacon Sinclair, Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Rev. Dr. Moule, and Rev. F. J. Chavasse. Rev. W. Hay Aitken deals especially with the mission sermon: Rev. A. J. Harrison with the evidential sermon; and Canon Tristram and Rev. H. Sutton with the missionary deputation sermon. The articles originally appeared in The Record; they are sure to prove of service to many in this more permanent form. (3s. 6d. Seeley & Co.)

Eden Lost and Won: Studies of the Early History and Final Destiny of Man, as taught in Nature and Revelation. By Sir J. William Dawson, LL.D., F.R.S. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton). Some thoughtful papers, which originally appeared in The Expositor, are collected, with additions and emendations, in this attractive volume. The themes are fascinating to thinking minds, and they are treated with reverence and wisdom. The Book of Genesis and its narratives of Early Man and Eden, and the Antediluvians and the Deluge, are examined in the first part, which also contains chapters on the Personality of Moses, and the Dispersion of Abraham, and the Exodus. The second part deals with Man before the Fall, the Fall and its Results, and the Restoration. Natural knowledge and spiritual intelligence combine to make the author a powerful champion of Christian truth, as opposed to agnostic philosophy and destructive criticism; and we trust his pages, so luminous and helpful in their bearing upon creation and redemption, history and prophecy, will have many readers.

Mrs. A. Bennett, of Broughton Giffard, Melksham, Wilts, has written and published some earnest Gospel leaflets. Copies may be had from her, 3d. dozen, post free.

Requests for Prayer.—On behalf of Miss Milner, author of "Lessons to an Adult Bible-class on the Life of Christ," who is passing through serious illness with much suffering.—For special services being held in Tipton by Mr. James Eyres, of Liverpool.—For blessing on Dr. Pierson's meetings at Colchester on Feb. 13 and 14, and at Oxford from Feb. 18 to 20.

Missionary Breakfast at Oxford.—On Saturday morning Canon Christopher, rector of St. Aldate's, Oxford, gave his annual missionary breakfast. About 250 graduate and undergraduate members of the university and others assembled at the Clarendon Hotel. The meeting was addressed by Mr. G. L. Pilkington, C.M.S. missionary in Uganda for four and a half years, who gave an interesting account of his work there. Sir H. Acland said that the study of physical science had within the last half-century become an essential part of the University of Oxford, and he asked himself whether the time would not surely come when their able, thoughtful Oxford undergraduates who studied in the department of human knowledge would not qualify themselves especially to go as highly-accomplished medical officers to assist missionary work throughout the world.

British and Foreign Sailors' Society.—The South London branch of this Society is doing good work, notwithstanding many difficulties. During the past quarter 1550 sailors of all nationalities have visited the reading-room, 3206 tracts, and 1143 magazines, besides Gospels and Bibles in various languages. Much blessing has been experienced in the services held at the Rest, and several have decided for Christ. Ships and hospitals have been visited. On December 2 a poor Zulu boy, nineteen years of age, was brought to the Rest. He had arrived in England ten days previously; but almost as soon as he received his money he was robbed in a lodging-house of it all. He was turned into the street after he was robbed, and when found he was wandering about (unable to speak a word of English). Homeless and hungry, he was admitted into the Rest, and provided with food and clothing, and may be seen there now. The missionary has arranged for a ship to take him back to his native land. While in the Rest he has decided for Christ, and wishes to return to Zululand to tell the story of Christ's love to his own brethren. The Countess Schimmelmänn, a few days since, conducted a service in the Rest.

The Bible League.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

Rev. John Tuckwell, hon. sec. of the Bible League, has commenced his onerous duties with every indication of blessing in the work. A successful meeting was held at Wellington-street Chapel, Luton (Rev. G. D. Hooper, pastor), on 22nd ult., when Mr. Tuckwell delivered a lecture entitled "The Bible Right: Confirmed by Babylonian Archaeology." Following the course of modern discovery from its commencement, the lecturer was enabled by means of splendid lime-light views to bring clearly and forcibly before his audience the important part the ancient Babylonian cities and monuments and their inscriptions have played in testifying to the full inspiration of Holy Scripture. Not only have these relics of past ages been the means under God of identifying many hitherto obscure Biblical personages and localities with great historical events, but they have afforded confirmatory evidence of great force concerning the direct creation of man by God, the Fall, the Deluge, and other declarations of the Word of God. The discoveries in the ruined mounds of Babylonia, Mr. Tuckwell pointed out, proved beyond doubt that man in the earliest twilight of his history possessed an intelligence, a knowledge, and a faith in the spirit world which placed him far above all other creatures. An earnest Evangelical tone pervaded the lecture, and the need for prayerful and steadfast adherence to the Bible as the inspired and infallible Word of God was impressively set forth.

A similar opportunity was afforded Mr. Tuckwell of lecturing before a large audience at the Shoreditch Tabernacle on 30th ult. Rev. Wm. Cuff specially invited the members of Council to be present, and Mr. W. H. Seagram (president of the Bible League) occupied the chair. Col. Morton, of Mildmay, opened the meeting with prayer. The audience repeatedly manifested their deep interest in the lecture, and a profitable and soul-refreshing time was spent.

Meetings were held at Bedford on the 6th inst., under arrangements kindly undertaken by Col. Corry Smith, when addresses were delivered by Revs. Wm. Cuff, W. Fuller Gooch, and John Tuckwell.

Doncaster, Shepherd's Bush, Bournemouth, Aldershot, Fordingbridge, Salisbury, Dover, etc., will (D.V.) be shortly visited. The prayerful interest of God's people is earnestly requested.

Appeals.

DR. BARNARD, in his "Personal Notes" in the February issue of Night and Day, makes a strong appeal for the poor "who suffer from chronic starvation." He finds that distress is widespread and intense in certain East End quarters. He gives two or three very sad cases, showing how terribly some families are at present suffering; and for such as these he makes an earnest plea. The familiar address is 18, Stepney-causeway, E.

HOWARD-STREET GOSPEL MISSION, WANDSWORTH-ROAD, S.W.—The soup kitchen was opened in November, since which several thousand children and adults have been supplied with nourishing food. Although the weather is not so severe, there are large numbers of the labouring class out of work, and the poor children are the sufferers.—J. SOAMES.

King's Daughters in Japan.—Three weeks ago we had a very interesting gathering, at Aoyama, of the King's Daughters Society, or rather representatives from the different circles. From 180 to 150 must have been present—such intelligent, interesting faces—mostly school girls, though there were a few older women among them, and all are pledged to do some work for Christ. The week before was the women's prayer meeting, when the largest church in Tsukje was filled. It was conducted entirely by women, and almost so by Japanese women, just two foreigners who have the language taking part. M. A. GUNDRY.

AMONG THE CHURCHES.

Church of England.

A UNITED mission is being held in Exeter, for which prayer is desired.

Bishop Kestell-Cornish, of Madagascar, will resign next Michaelmas.

Rev. Henry John Shaw, vicar of All Saints, Brightside, Sheffield, has been appointed rector of Earl Stonham.

Rev. F. Roberts, curate of St. Mary Magdalene, Holloway, has been appointed vicar of St. John's, Southall.

Rev. H. A. James, D.D., Head Master of Rugby, will be the preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral on Sunday, Feb. 16.

The Bishop of Derby has arranged a general Church Mission in all the parishes in that town from Nov. 7 to Nov. 17.

Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, Canon Christopher's curate at Oxford, has, we hear, been appointed to Portman Chapel.

Rev. T. Selby Henrey, whose work as curate of St. Botolph's, Aldersgate-street, is so well known to many, has been appointed vicar of St. George's, Old Brentford.

At the Committee of Correspondence of the Church Missionary Society last week, Miss Lillias Sara Digby, Miss Mary Harmer, M.D., and Miss Helen Adey were accepted for missionary service.

The Church Missionary Society is approaching its centenary, and a private conference has been held to discuss arrangements for celebrating the occasion. It is probable that a sub-committee will be appointed to take the matter in hand, but there is plenty of time, for the centenary year is not until 1899.

The College of Women Workers, Blackheath-hill, known as the Grey Ladies, states in its third report that a third house, with nineteen rooms, has been added to the two previous in occupation, and the three are now full. Two ladies have left, one to take up work in the diocese of London, the other owing to ill-health. The numbers have, however, increased to thirty-two.

Congregational.

Rev. J. E. Hodge has entered on the pastorate at Bedford.

The L.M.S. has accepted Mr. A. J. Macfarlane for mission work.

Rev. W. Garrett Horder, of College Chapel, Bradford, has intimated his acceptance of the call to Ealing.

Rev. T. G. Crippen, of Milverton, has been appointed librarian of the Memorial Hall in Farringdon-street.

Mrs. Hurdall, we learn, still continues in a semi-conscious state, and does not realise the death of her husband. She is able to take nourishment freely, but does not seem to regain strength.

One hundred and fifty Chinese converts were baptized during the last twelve months by Rev. Hopkin Rees, a Welsh missionary of the London Missionary Society, who is located at Tientsin, North China.

The report of the Wickhambrook Chapel shows that, under the pastoral care of Rev. A. Butcher, earnest work is being done and real progress is being made. It is cheering to note that missionary interest is well sustained.

Rev. A. Welsh writes from Emgwall, Dohne, Cape Colony: A good work is going on among the "reds" on the farms in this district. Several have lately professed conversion to God. A number of the people of this church have been evangelising. Our temperance work continues to prosper.

Rev. Leonard J. Thacker, temporary assistant to Rev. Colmer B. Symes, of Leytonstone, has been accepted by the directors of the Colonial Missionary Society for service in South Africa. Mr. Thacker has been appointed to the charge of the church at Philipton, with the branches in the Kat River Settlement, Cape Colony, one of the oldest mission settlements in South Africa.

The annual meeting of Kensington Chapel has been characterised by great heartiness, and the reports presented were full of encouragement. The membership of the church has now risen to over 500, a very substantial increase having accrued from the mission recently conducted by Dr. Horton. The report of the mission at Olaf-street, Latimer-road, was of a most interesting and hopeful character. The Sunday-school has doubled its numbers, and all the various activities are well sustained. Mr. Silvester Horne referred with gratitude to the harmony and unity of the congregation. He spoke of the need for a strong body of Free Churchmen in that neighbourhood, at a time when all kinds of influences were at work, which were, in fact, hostile to religious liberty and Christian truth.

Calls.—Rev. D. C. Hart, to Penmaenmawr; Rev. W. Jones, of Dowlais, to St. Paul's, Swansea.

Resignation.—Rev. John Davies, of Tarheron, Glam.

Rev. W. Dickens (late of Herne Bay) and Mrs. Dickens sailed last week for Egypt to enter upon missionary work in connection with the North Africa Mission.

The church under the care of Pastor F. E. Marsh at Sunderland reports 826 members, with seven mission stations, conducted by the Bethesda Evangelisation Society.

Highgate-road Chapel, that grand centre of evangelistic and mission work in north London, reports 678 members. Twelve members of the fellowship are now serving in the foreign field.

The Baptist churches in Wales and Monmouth report 102,366 members, an increase of 1457 on the preceding year. The chapels number 793, the ministers 491, the Sunday scholars 112,273.

As a result of cottage services held in the village of Wingfield by the Young People's Mission Band, of Back-street Chapel, Trowbridge, a church has been formed and it has been decided to erect a small chapel.

Principal Henderson, lecturing at Regent's Park College on "The Minister's Educational Duties," especially in "The Education of Young Disciples," maintained that the ordinary services, however admirable, did not suffice. Closer communion was desirable than that which now existed between pulpit and pew, and so was a more detailed discussion of doctrines, ecclesiastical usages, ethical obligations.

Calls.—Rev. Theo. Jones, of Flint, to Ynysbwl, Glam.; Rev. J. A. Jones, to Porthcawl.

Resignations.—Rev. R. Oliver, of Brixham; Rev. James Ault, of Monmouth.

Methodist.

Special services have been held at Bromyard.

A large and useful conference of local preachers has been held at the Central Hall, Birmingham.

The united Methodist Mission in Bristol has aroused great interest, and has resulted in much blessing.

Rev. Seth Dixon, superintendent of the Tenby Circuit, had an apoplectic fit on Saturday week. After being unconscious for some time he recovered somewhat.

Rev. F. Galpin, who has arrived in England from China in a very unsatisfactory condition of health, went to Ningpo in 1867, and, with some brief furloughs, has rendered valuable service.

Work and Workers states that Rev. Dennis Kemp has had several officers of the Ashanti expedition quartered upon him at the Mission House, Cape Coast Castle, the school-room being occupied by the men. Among the officers was Major Sinclair, brother of the Archbishop of London.

The second anniversary of the Primitive Methodist London Council has been held. Papers on "The Ministry of the Holy Spirit," on "The Present Position of Primitive Methodism in London," and on "The Mothers' Meeting," were read in the morning and afternoon. Dr. Guinness Rogers preached the annual sermon in the evening.

Nelson-street Chapel, Newcastle-on-Tyne, which has long been the historic centre of northern Primitive Methodism, has, like many other chapels, suffered severely by the migration of population from the centre of the city, and it was intended to sell it. During the last few months, however, there has been a remarkable improvement, so that it has been decided to make extensive alterations to fit it for a centre of mission work.

Presbyterian.

At Peel-road Chapel, Bootle, a good work is reported and steady growth.

The new church at Ilford was to be opened last night by Principal Dykes.

Trinity Church, Bootle, reports a membership of 600 and many tokens of progress.

St. Mark's, Greenwich, reports great activity in church work, and progress all round.

The report of Jesmond Church is of an encouraging character. The free pew system has proved a success.

Rev. Donald Matheson, of Putney, has asked leave of the Presbytery to sell the present church and build a new church on a fine site given by a sympathiser.

It is stated that the Home Mission Fund of the English Synod has closed the year with an expenditure of £700 in excess of the income. The income has increased, but it has not kept pace with the expenditure.

At the annual meeting of Trinity Church, Norwich, Rev. C. W. Claridge, a local vicar, took part, and in the course of a sympathetic address expressed his belief in that reunion of Christendom which was not bound by conventional limitations. Rev. Alex. Connell, of Regent's-square, congratulated the church upon its position, with a pastor (Rev. W. A. McAllan) whose ministry dated from 1866, a total absence of debt, and a membership well maintained.

The annual meeting of Trinity Church, Notting Hill, was held on 5th inst. Encouraging reports were given of blessing and progress during the past year—98 names had been added to the communion roll and an increase to income of £452, most marked advance being in amounts raised for foreign missions and Women's Missionary Association. Rev. James Mackenzie pleaded on behalf of the new church extension movement of the Presbytery, and Rev. J. R. Gillies followed with an address on "Christian Chivalry."

Calls.—Rev. D. Fyfe, of Glencairn, to Fairfield, Liverpool; Rev. Hugh Craig, to Little Sutton; Rev. D. Ferguson, of North Leith, to Invekeithing; Rev. J. Barr, of Wamphray, to Dennistown; Rev. T. Marshall, of Newmilns, to Motherwell; Rev. J. L. Munro, to Selkirk; Rev. A. Gibson, to Kinfans; Mr. T. Evans to Peel-road, Bootle.

Salvation Army.

New Rescue Homes have just been opened in Amsterdam and San Francisco.

Forty-three new centres of work in English villages have just been commenced.

The new Metropole for men opened in Edgware-road¹ three weeks ago is already crowded out.

General Booth's Indian meetings are reported as surpassing all his previous gatherings in that country.

Over fifty officers are engaged on social work in Holland, where there are now twenty-five men on the Farm Colony.

Commissioner Cadman has been given the direction of the work in both the City and Farm Colony sections of the Social Scheme operations.

Society of Friends.

Friends in many places are very heartily helping in "Free Church Councils," and in Birmingham have taken a most active part in the work. The need of union among lovers of the Bible and of liberty thus finds happy expression, and a barrier is raised against priestcraft and injustice.

At the Meeting for Sufferings on Friday last the education question, and that of peace, were earnestly considered, and it is satisfactory to know the heart of the Society is sound and strong thereon. Probably no representative body in the land is more up to date in its consideration of current matters, as they affect the public religiously, morally, or socially, and none could be more harmonious than that monthly meeting at Devonshire House for over 200 years.

Last week's Friend is full of interesting and, indeed, stirring news. The subject of the Manchester Conference, in November last, has engaged the attention of Friends and others far and wide, and there have been local conferences and discussions in York and in Birmingham, at which able papers were read, and considerable contributions made towards a real revival in the Society. The special adjourned quarterly meeting of London and Middlesex, on the 28th ult., deals with a cognate theme, and able papers there, too, indicated the growing earnestness of feeling, and, indeed, of dissatisfaction with present conditions in London. How to revive and strengthen congregational life, to extend the invitation and welcome to those around, to preach a more attractive, because clearer and more powerful Gospel, occupied the meeting. Some great move is needed and expected.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE Queen's letter of thanks to her people for their sympathy in her daughter's recent loss is full of the womanly charm that marks all Her Majesty's personal communications. In the midst of their sore bereavement, she and the Princess Beatrice have been cheered by the universal sympathy of the nation. The distance between palace and cottage has been erased in the presence of a loss common to both. No living sovereign, and few dead ones, have felt the sanctifying influence of sorrow as our Queen has done; and surely none has shown a greater power to profit by its lessons. The final sentence of the message emphasises the same fact in the case of her widowed daughter: "My beloved child is an example to all, in her courage, resignation, and submission to the will of God." An example of this lowly and gentle spirit in the one that stands at the centre of our national life has far-reaching influence. What wealth, power, and sovereignty cannot do is possible through the grace of God; and this within the reach of the poorest and meanest as well as of the highest.

Major Lugard, in dealing with the question of slavery in Zanzibar, affirms that slavery can easily be put down in that dependency if only tact and firmness are shown in dealing with the question. It is, however, startling to hear him express the following opinion:—

The Koran merely sanctions slavery, just as the early Christian code did [?]. It strongly condemns slave-raiding, and regards the emancipation of a slave as a most meritorious act. Hence the abolition of slavery is no violation of Koran law, any more than it is of the doctrines of St. Paul, who equally recognised its existence and gave it his tacit sanction.

Is this consistent with Philemon 15, 16, where Philemon is exhorted to receive Onesimus back "for ever, not now as a slave, but above a slave, a brother beloved"? If language means anything, this means that the runaway slave was to be manumitted and received back by his former master as an equal in Christ. And this amounts to a strong tacit condemnation of slavery from the Christian point of view.

The reviews for February teem with papers dealing, from various points of view, with the remarkable position of isolation and distrust in which England has suddenly found herself. It is startling to find so well-disposed a man as M. Francois de Pressensé, the foreign editor of Le Temps, while showing personal goodwill towards this country, speaking of the possibility under certain eventualities of a French invasion. Mr. Arnold Forster deprecates the idea of the interests of Russia and England being necessarily antagonistic, but allows the deep suspicion with which our policy is watched in the great empire of the Czar.

Two very bitter articles appear in The Fortnightly Review against Germany, who is accused of almost every crime and evil intention in her international policy, while in The Contemporary Review an "Ex-diplomat" accuses England of having forfeited the friendship of that country by her treatment of German claims in Angra Pequena ten and fifteen years ago. A spirit of concession is clearly called for from us in the future. We occupy too much of the earth's surface to be loved by our neighbours, even though, in our own judgment, we may be turning it to quite as good use as they would have done. Still, if we would conciliate them, we must show ourselves less unselfish as a nation.

Among the items of temperance legislation which the Government have declined to promote is one to prevent the sale of drink to young children for consumption at home, and there is none more important. The inducements by way of reward which many publicans offer constitute a great evil, and the whole system is a grave national danger. The drinking in public-houses by respectable young women is largely traceable to their familiarity as children with the bar-counter. Failing legislation, Christians of all ranks may do much to counteract the practice by pointing out its evil, and by circulating suitable literature, at mothers' meetings and religious gatherings of all kinds.

The "conversion" of Prince Boris of Bulgaria to the "Orthodox" Greek Church, as an act of national expediency, brings home the dangerous farce of making the religion of rulers a part of their politics. Here is an infant, who is incapable of distinguishing between the elementary differences of opposing Churches, who is being solemnly transferred from one communion to another, both of which, according to our deepest convictions, are almost equally wrong. In this significant act he has no lot or part except a passive one. The real actors in the transaction are opposing parties in the State, whose true object is to checkmate each other. No prominent event has ever happened that shows more conclusively the hopeless fallacy of combining the secular and the spiritual in unholy alliance. It is a reductio ad absurdum of the doctrine of sacramental efficacy. Conversions based on other than a spiritual change have no religious meaning. And whatever political meaning they can have must be detrimental to true religion.

We see propounded in a contemporary the startling theory, already suggested in some of the daily papers, that the Johannesburg raid was occasioned by a mistake in punctuation in the despatch sent by the Uitlanders to Dr. Jameson. Whether or not this was so will yet be determined. But the very possibility raises a feeling of uneasiness. There are times when conflicting forces in human affairs are so evenly balanced that, while the determining element may be of the very slightest importance in itself, yet the consequences may be disastrous and widespread, even as a mistimed laugh or the crack of a whip may loosen an avalanche that will bury villages in ruins. Such a possibility brings home in a startling manner the responsibilities of human action. In our personal lives it should make us circumspect in little things, to keep a watch on our lightest word and step, lest through foolishness or carelessness we bring disaster and ruin into other lives as well as our own.

The successful opening of new Roman Catholic centres is bringing to the front the unquestionable increase in the number of Romanists among the middle classes of our country. The way lies through the door of Ritualism. Silently and subtly that leaven works, unknown often even to the devout worshippers who give themselves over to the hands of Anglican priestcraft; and before they realise their position they find themselves drawn quietly over the inner threshold into what is termed the "more logical and stately fellowship" of the Church of Rome.

It seems to us the greatest danger lies in the oblivion of all danger on the part of most Protestant churches. It shook Europe to throw off the Papal tyranny and corruption at the Reformation. Unless we wake to our responsibilities, we shall lose the ground gained, and have to fight the battle over again. With every determination to be tolerant, it is no use blinking the fact that Protestantism and Romanism are absolutely incompatible with one another. Now that national funds are being openly demanded for the reconversion of the nation to the Romish Church, it is high time to consider how far that is to be allowed.

The efforts of Roman Catholicism to undo the work of missionaries are not an unmixed evil. If Romanists come into contact with the truth they may become disciples of it. It has not been the priest and his assistants who have always changed the faith of those to whom they have gone. One of the warmest preachers of the Gospel of the Son of God we ever heard had originally gone as a priest to India, where he was converted. The island of Arorae, in the Gilbert group in the South Seas, has a thousand inhabitants, whose spiritual welfare is cared for by Tipani and his wife. The Church of Rome, which has tried hard for a year to get a footing there, sent a native teacher; but, weary of his non-success, he has himself become one of Tipani's pupils. There will be converts in Madagascar, and who knows whether there may not return to France from that island a wave of saving influence? It would not be the first time that a conquered people had been made a blessing to their conquerors. God works on a broader scale than we can measure, and by agencies which we cannot manipulate.

Our Lord, in parting from his disciples, promised them the "Spirit of Truth" to help them in their work. He had already given them the truth, in his own life and teaching and sacrifice. But the truth was not enough to produce conversion. The old Socratic contention that if knowledge is but given to men, they will grow naturally virtuous, is utterly false. Men who know all that can be revealed to them of God's truth and love, yet live dissolute and evil lives, The great need is for a power whereby the truth is carried home to the heart and made effectual. Thus Jesus promised those who were the first preachers of his Gospel the Holy Ghost, whose work was not only to lead them further into all the truth, but to "convict the world in respect of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." Without this Spirit the most skilful presentation of the Gospel will fail; and for it all who minister in holy things need to pray and wait.

How is it that confessedly Christian men will sometimes meet to take counsel on the most important work, and talk about it for an hour or two without once touching upon the vital aspect of it? Say they confer on the work of preaching the Word of God, or on prayer and praise, and the conference closes, as we have known it do, without a reference to the Holy Spirit. Is it that they presuppose his agency, and therefore say nothing about it? How many on these occasions fail for lack of a little courage to call the attention of their brethren to the one thing that would change the aspect of every other thing? And how often do the arrangements almost choke free and happy speech where its exercise would bring life and reality?

What may be the cause or causes of the apathy of most Londoners to anything beyond their own business and family concerns may be a question that none can answer perfectly. The fact is there. How the apathy can be disturbed and removed is, however, a question which Christians are bound to answer. Social reformers, and politicians who might be supposed to handle questions that affect and interest the richest and the poorest, are impotent to touch it. Religious men and women hold the key of the situation. It is a revival of religion that is wanted to destroy the selfish indifference, and to wake up the dormant enthusiasm of the greatest city of the world. Once let the heart be moved aright on the most important theme, and it quickly responds on every other theme.

There is no patent method for procuring a revival. It comes now one way, now another. Yet one thing is certain—if each Christian dwelling in London were to seek a deeper work of grace in his own heart, if he were to confess his own sins and the sins of his fellow-citizens, if he were to receive the Spirit of Christ more largely, a revival would soon come to the Church, and the manifestation of it before the world and the ingathering of unbelievers would inevitably follow. Jesus the Saviour of men is ready to begin now. He is offering Himself as the answer of difficulties and the solution of our tremendous problems. If He changed the old pagan world into a world inconceivably better, so can He change the present state of things into something inconceivably higher and purer. He is the only hope of London—but He is a sufficient hope, one that will not put us to shame.

Perseverance in well-doing will be ensured, not so much by wise methods, however important these are, but by right and adequate motives. If we are prompted in our religious endeavours by considerations of policy, by the desire of earning men's gratitude, or by a passion for success, even of the best kind, we shall surely fail, and the fountain of enthusiasm will run dry in the hour of trial and suspense. Nothing but the great motive "for Christ's sake" will bear the strain that his people have to bear. When all the springs of effort are dry, that continues to rise up like a cool artesian well, unaffected by drought and frost. "Everyone that drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up to eternal life."

Fellowship with God is more than prayer and praise. It is silent and adoring meditation on his name; it is the loving recognition of his nearness to us, as when a child looks up into his father's face, and presses his father's hand; it is being still with Him, as when two friends walk in silence side by side; it is submission to Him, our hearts yielding to his influence, and our wills adopting every purpose of his love and wisdom concerning us; it is listening to Him, when He speaks in his Word or by his providence; it is rejoicing in Him because He is God. We have not always something to ask for; though we always have something to give thanks for; but apart from things altogether, there is the ever-blessed God.

The secret of a true life lies largely in learning the value of simple pleasures. We are prone, as we grow older, to form artificial tastes, and depend on acquired sources of gratification. That is the tendency of civilised life. Wise people avoid this peril, and feed their hearts on "simplicities." That man has mastered a great secret who can take as his own the words of the late J. R. Green, author of the finest of the shorter histories of England: "What seems fairer to me as life goes by is the love, and grace, and tenderness of it, not its wit, and cleverness, and grandeur, and knowledge, grand as knowledge is, but just the laughter of little children, and the friendship of friends, and the cosy talk of the fireside, and the sight of flowers, and the sound of music." These are common blessings, but they are healthful gifts of God, and blessed are they to whom they never grow stale.

It is often claimed for times of war that they strengthen courage, self-reliance, and endurance. However that may be, we see at present a development of some of the highest qualities of a nation by other means, by the determination of all our best men to keep the nation at peace. We are beginning to feel what a support are the great principles of truth and righteousness. We are turning to moral rather than material forces; reason and fair-mindedness are taking the place of the sword and the cannon. The difficulty with America is practically settled, in spite of certain troublesome men on both sides. The gravest of our dangers are those in Africa, but if we can still subdue pride and avoid panic, and get through without an appeal to arms, we shall come out of the experience a far stronger people than we have ever been before; we shall have reached a higher plane of national life.

It is said by Professor Schodde in the Homiletic Review that, on an average, nearly five hundred of the brightest college and seminary graduates of the United States may be found in Germany, eager to discover the secret of the success of its professors of Biblical and philosophical learning. Besides this, German books and periodicals, both in translations and in the original, "furnish America's thinking world with its most nourishing food." This is an important fact; for it is to be remembered that the German specialist is professedly guided merely by the spirit of scientific investigation. He is in danger of coming to his work in an antagonistic attitude rather than in a state of sympathy; he is "more critical than just." Especially is this the case if he is the disciple of some school of philosophy; the Bible has then to be interpreted accordingly. All this shows in a measure how difficult and yet how necessary it is to keep the Bible in its own simplicity, explaining itself, defending itself, and making its own impression on the souls of those who study it.

While German universities are so permeated with "liberal thought," it is a remarkable fact that the pulpit generally gives positive teaching, and the pew loves to have it so. Dr. Schodde testifies that, on the whole, the Protestant Church of Germany is Evangelical to its core. Twice within three years has there been an emphatic expression of opinion in favour of Evangelical as opposed to rationalistic teaching. The simple historic meaning of the Scriptures has been vindicated, and the old truths concerning the birth and death of our Saviour have been reasserted. We know Germany mainly by its conspicuous destructive critics, but there is another Germany which in faith and love walks quietly in the paths of truth and of obedient service.

"Fire and Sword in the Soudan," by Slatin Pasha, is a book which ought to hasten the downfall of Mohammedanism. Its pictures of life where Mohammedan fanaticism is supreme cannot but create a holy abhorrence of the cruelty, duplicity, lust, and greed of this false religion. There may be a good deal of these vices in every Government, but they are essentially a part of Islam. The condition of the land of the Mahdi corresponds with terrible minuteness to the condition of other Mohammedan lands. Slavery alone is a withering blight which destroys every fair thing, the fertility of the land and the happiness of the people. Slatin Pasha believes that seventy-five per cent. of the Soudanese have perished, and whole provinces, once populous, have become waste. Since Christianity is now touching this religion at so many points, we may hopefully pray that the influence of the false prophet may give place to the light of the Gospel.

Great calamities have their redeeming side, and the terrible fire which took place in Soho early on Sunday morning brought out the latent heroism that lies hidden in some of our policemen. Nine persons have lost their lives out of seventeen inmates of the tenement; and the survivors were saved by the bravery and presence of mind of the constables on duty, who plunged into the burning house, warning some and carrying others through the smoke and flames safely into the street. But for this prompt courage, all would inevitably have perished. We do not think often enough, probably, of these men who are the guardians of our peace by day and of our lives by night. Their stalwart figures are a part of the landscape, and that is all. It is only in such sudden crises that their sterling qualities are brought into relief, and the man peeps out through the uniform. Good spiritual work is being done among the policemen of London, whose temptations are many and great.—Let us remember them more often in our sympathies and prayers.

THE EVILS OF WORLDLY ALLIANCE.

BY PASTOR F. E. MARSH, SUNDERLAND.

WORLDLY association always works mischief to the child of God. We cannot touch pitch without being defiled, and, being defiled, we shall defile others. It is as a parasite to rob us of the joy of the Lord. As the ivy by clinging around the oak will suck away the life of the tree by living upon its sap, and will thus cause the branches to wither and die, and instead of the tree being a shelter and a pleasant sight, it becomes unsightly by its dead branches, so those who, like Peter in the judgment hall, mix with the world, lose their joy of the Lord. Instead of witnessing for Him, they deny Him, and thus further the enemy's designs instead of the purpose of the Lord.

It is as a fog to hide the presence of the Lord. As the sea-fret will obscure the harbour's entrance from the view of the mariner, who is making for port, so will worldliness hide the face of the Lord from our gaze. Compare, for illustration, the case of Abraham, who, all the while he was in Egypt, had no communication with, or revelation from, God.

It is a dampener to quench our zeal for the Lord. As the stoker will damp down the factory fire when he does not wish it to burn brightly, so the worldly spirit will prevent our burning well in holy zeal, as the Judaizing spirit in the Church at Galatia hindered them from running well in the faith.

It is as a leak in the hold to spoil the peace of the Lord. As a leak in a vessel will cause detriment to the cargo, so worldliness will damage the quiet of the soul. Lot found this out, when in Sodom "his righteous soul was vexed."

It is as a tarnish to dim the word of the Lord to us. In reality nothing can tarnish the pure gold of God's word; but as a piece of silver becomes discoloured when unused, so will our appreciation of his truth become dull and lose its brightness, if, through worldliness, we neglect to study it prayerfully. It was so in the days of Eli, when there was no open vision in Israel, because of the worldliness of those who were priests in Israel.

It is as a clod to hinder the power of the Lord. As when the pipe through which the water passes becomes clogged, so worldly companionship will hinder the inflow and the outflow of the power of the Spirit of God. This is seen in the Church at Corinth, when they allowed one who was living in sin to heaven them with his wickedness.

It is as a blight to mar the testimony of the Lord. When a blight settles upon the fruit tree, it mars the blossom and prevents it fructifying. In like manner when a believer walks in the counsel of the ungodly, their company will act as a retarding influence to his fellowship with the Lord, as may be seen in Solomon, whose strange wives estranged his heart from following the Lord.

The only remedy is to live in the presence of the Lord, to companion with Him and Him alone. When He is between us and the world we are kept from its contaminating influence. When one is charged with electricity, but has no non-conducting substance between him and the earth, a great deal of the electric power is lost; but when a plate of glass is put between him and the earth, then the power is resident in him, because he is separated from the earth, and if one touches him then the fire of the electricity comes out from him. In like manner if we are in touch with those who are of the earth earthy, then a great deal of our power is lost; but when Christ stands between us and the world, and the electric power of the Holy Spirit in his grace and godliness, in his love and liberty, in his truth and joy, are coursing through us, then there shall flash from us the power and life as men come in contact with us, yea, as they come in contact with us they shall come in contact with God.

Conditions of Sainthood.—2.

BY REV. SAMUEL PEARSON, M.A.,

Broughton Park Church, Manchester.

LAST week we saw there were Spiritual Conditions of Sainthood. I would further point out that there are

2.—CIRCUMSTANTIAL CONDITIONS OF SAINTHOOD.

The flesh is around the spirit and interwoven with it, and sainthood has to use this mass of nerve, muscle, and bone for its own purposes. To be a saint one needs to be healthy. A holy man is a spiritually healthy one. Sickly persons are often most beautiful characters, for they have been refined by submission to suffering. Further, it is often necessary that there should be a touch of asceticism in those who wish to keep under the body, and a cutting from the Jewish tree of "fasting" is not a bad graft for the due development of the Christian character. But the ideal is a sound body, able to enjoy with thankfulness all that is good in God's manifold gifts to his creature man. And many persons are sadly hindered from attaining sainthood by inattention to the first laws of health. An irritable temper often needs for its cure not prayer, so much as a sound and simple diet. Despondency, especially about the safety of one's soul, has sometimes a physical cause; and on the other hand apathy about spiritual things may arise from over eating, drinking, and sleeping.

So too the home and its surroundings have much to do with real purity of mind. The dirt of some houses, and the soft luxury of others are inimical to the work of the Holy Spirit. Here we have to be very careful against laying down general laws for all sorts and conditions of people. The right of private judgment must be exercised on a thousand points; for were it otherwise we should lose one of the best means of disciplining our characters. We need to avoid censoriousness about our neighbours; while most carefully scrutinising our own daily habits. For the sake of the young, home needs to be kept bright; with music, with fun and frolic, with interesting literature, and with well-planned amusements. But who does not see that in all these things there is danger? Yes! but we need to remember that in all these things there is a wholesome means of taking the strain off the spiritual for an interval, so that all the inmates of the home may return to prayer, faith, work, and love with renewed energy. It is certain that he will not be the greatest saint who is always thinking of sainthood.

The Sanctuary and its privileges are of vast and far reaching importance to us. An annual conference like that held at "Keswick" has both its advantages and its defects. It would be ungracious on our part to criticise it; but if it were all that its most devoted attendants affirm it to be, yet we should say that the sanctuary is better for the development of the spiritual life. Our own sanctuary may not bring us into contact with the picked speakers, and to the enjoyment of the long and leisurely hours of summer days in the mountains: it may mean a minister of very poor attainments, a people very mixed in character, a service rather dull in tone; but it is an opportunity of finding God which comes every week; its very deficiencies may be the discipline which we need. Sainthood is not "Lo, here! or lo, there!" It is a power born and sustained within us by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

3.—THERE ARE OPTIONAL CONDITIONS OF SAINTHOOD.

Opportunities are offered us of an exceptional character, which we may refuse or decline at our will. We dare not make a distinction in the nature of the will-surrender, which is necessary both at the beginning and during the continuance of the Christian course. All are commanded to give themselves up to Christ, to be pardoned through his death, and to be purified by his Holy Spirit. But there are differences of attainment in holiness; there are degrees of excellence; "one star differeth from another star in its glory." In this matter of types we are safe in asserting that no one is the perfect type, and we do well in matters both of practise and of doctrine to call no man master. "One is your Master."

But though we cannot all be amongst the leaders, the heroes, the witnesses (or martyrs) of the faith; yet occasionally there are calls to take the higher road rather than the lower one. Both roads seem the right ones; for they both lead to God, but one is more difficult than the other. What shall we do? Well! it depends upon what we want to be and to achieve for others. A little touch of the heroic is what perhaps we need to redeem us from mediocrity. And the call will not be wanting. It comes to the most uninteresting persons; it is a call to forget self for the good of others. See how the face of a man shines when he has given more than he intended to do, or more than he thinks he can afford. It was the overplus which cost him something that gave him the glow. Many a man has lost himself for the sake of a Sunday-school class, and has become so fascinated with his work that he could not give it up, for it has put within him the joy of holy sacrifice. And if we look carefully enough we shall find these "saints" in all the walks of life. They need looking for; they will not reveal their good deeds. When we find them, the world and the Church seem changed; the breeze of heaven is blowing about us, the fragrance of God's flowers is wafted to us from the garden of grace, and we know that "summer is nigh."

Orphans at Lewisham.—On Friday last the remains of the late Mr. Toye were laid to rest in Lewisham Cemetery. About a thousand gathered around the grave. The work at Lewisham-road will continue. Mr. Toye's son will seek to care for the little ones. Any reader who would like to help in this Christlike work, might communicate with Mr. Toye, Home for Fatherless Children, 64 to 76, Lewisham-road, Lewisham, S.E.

Mission Schools, Beyrout.—Our most pressing need at the present time is money to build the boys' school. The sum needed is £600, and I have got £253 towards that amount. We desire to begin to build in the spring; I have the freehold land to build on. Twenty boys are waiting to come in, and the teachers ready to teach them. It is very sad to see the boys we have been teaching sent to the Jesuit or Moslem school when too old to be taught with the girls. We are praying the Lord to move the hearts of his people to supply this need.

Songs in the Night.

By THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

WE always think of our Lord and Saviour as a divine teacher, preacher, and worker of wondrous miracles; we seldom or never think of Him as a singer. Yet there is every probability that on one occasion his voice joined in a service of sacred song; and He may have done this on other occasions. On that night when He had eaten the paschal supper with his disciples, and delivered his last loving discourse to them, "they sang a hymn"; and we may well suppose that the Master's voice blended with them. The hymn usually sung at the close of the passover supper was that majestic old Hebrew song of praise, beginning with the words, "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." Gethsemane, the betrayal, and the awful conflict in the garden were just before Him; yet our Master set us the sublime example of a "song in the night"—and that, too, the darkest night He had ever known on earth.

A few years afterward Paul and Silas are confined in a stifling dungeon at Philippi—their backs lacerated with the scourgings of their brutal persecutors. Instead of wails and groans, the two heroes break forth into such a triumphant burst of sacred song that their fellow-prisoners are awakened by the extraordinary duet! Paul must have been as familiar with the old Hebrew psalmody as our soldiers were with their war songs around the camp fires. It was a glorious triumph of spiritual exultation over bodily tortures, when, in the black gloom of that midnight,

Paul and Silas, in their prison,
Sang of Christ the Lord arisen.

In these experiences of our Lord and of his two apostles there were literal songs in the night; and they were the antetypes of thousands of Christian experiences in all subsequent times. It has always been the test of the deepest and the strongest faith that, like the nightingale, it could pour forth its sweetest melodies in the hours of darkness. This is a spiritual phenomenon, not to be explained by ordinary natural law. It is supernatural. The Bible tells us that "God our Maker giveth songs in the night." This happy phrase explains itself. It means that in times of sorest affliction our Heavenly Father gives to his faithful children cause for songs—both the matter to sing about and the spirit of grateful praise. While they are sitting under the shadow of severe trial, He can wrap them about with "the garment of praise," and fill their mouths with singing. While selfishness is fretting and unbelief is blaspheming, faith has a voice of its own—pitched to a high key of love and trust, and gratitude and holy joy. That old-time saint had caught this pitch when he sang: "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be on the vines, and the field shall yield no meat, yet I will rejoice in the Lord; I will joy in the God of my salvation." You cannot starve a man who is feeding on God's promises; and you cannot make any man or woman wretched who has a clean conscience, and the smile of God, and the love of Jesus shed abroad in the soul.

What a thrilling outbreak of triumphant faith was that which came from the brave old Thomas Halyburton of Scotland in the darkest hours of his bereavement! When a much loved son was taken away, he makes this record: "This day has been a day to be remembered. Oh, my soul, never forget what this day I reached. My soul had smiles that almost wasted nature. Oh, what a sweet day. About half-an-hour after the Sabbath, my child, after a sharp conflict, slept pleasantly in Jesus, to whom pleasantly he was so often given." His own fatal sickness was very protracted, and was attended with intense suffering. After a night of excruciating pain, he said to his wife, "Jesus came to me in the third watch of the night, walking upon the waters, and He said to me, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, and I have the keys of hell and of death.' He stilled the tempest in my soul, and lo! there was a great calm." A philosopher of the Hume and Huxley School would be likely to dismiss all this as a devout dream of an excited imagination. But Halyburton was a hard-headed professor of theology in a Scotch university—not a style of man easily carried away by the allusions of a distempered fancy. "Thou art beside thyself," said pagan Festus to the actually logical apostle who wrote what Coleridge pronounced to be the most profound production in existence.

No sceptic's sneers can explain such spiritual phenomena. When men of the calibre of St. Paul sing such "songs in the night" as he sent forth from Caesar's pretorian guardhouse, they cannot be explained on any theory of frigid psychology. While dark hours of calamity or bereavement bring to the ordinary man of the world distress and peevish complaints, they bring to a Christ-possessed soul tranquil submission, and often an uplift of triumphant joy. Such experiences are contrary to the ordinary course of nature. They can only be accounted for by that deeper and divine philosophy which makes God to be the direct personal comforter of his own people in their season of sore affliction. When they pass through valleys of the death-shadow it is his rod and his staff that support them. The path of trial may lead down into grim and gloomy gorges that no sunbeams of nature penetrate; but "Thou art with me" is the cheerful song that faith sings along the darksome road. As Maclaren beautifully says: "He who guides into the gorge will guide through the gorge; it is not a cul de sac shut in with precipices at the far end; but it opens out on shining table-lands where there is greener pasturage."

There are some of us old-fashioned Christians who still believe that a loving God creates dark nights as well as bright noondays; that He not only permits trouble, but sometimes sends troubles on his own children for their spiritual profit. As many as He loves, He sometimes corrects and chastens, and a truly filial faith recognises that all his dealings are perfectly right. "Happy is the man whom God correcteth; therefore despise not thou the chastenings of the Almighty." I have seen a farmer drive his ploughshare through a velvet greensward, and it looked like a harsh and cruel process; but the farmer's eye foresaw the springing blades of wheat, and that within a few months that torn soil would laugh with a golden harvest. Deep soul-ploughings bring rich fruits of the Spirit. I have often had occasion to tell my parishoners that there are bitter mercies as well as sweet mercies; but they are all mercies, whether given to us in honey or given in wormwood.

The day is God's and the night also. This is as true in the realm of grace as in the realm of nature. God orders the withdrawal of the sun at evening time, yet that very withdrawal reveals new glories in the midnight sky. Then, how the creation widens to our view! The stars that lay concealed behind the noontide rays rush out and fill the spangled canopy. So in the night seasons which often descend upon the Christian, fresh glories of the divine love are revealed, fresh power is given to our faith, fresh victories are won, and a new development is made of godly character. What sweet voices—like "the influences of the Pleiades"—are God's promises to our chastened hearts! What deep melodies of praise do the night-hours hear! The Lord commandeth his loving kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me.

I trust that these simple, honest words may come as a lamp into some sick chamber, or into some house of sorrow, or into some sorely-troubled hearts. Bethany had to become a dark town to two poor women before Jesus could flood it with joy. Before Gethsemane's midnight struggle Christ Himself chanted a hymn; and happy is the man or woman who can go into life's hard battle singing! The ear of God hears no sublimer music than a Christian's songs in the night.

Naples.—The progress of Naples Sailors' Rest may be understood by the fact that there is scarcely any appearance of disorder among seamen, either on board ship or ashore. Formerly this was not the case. H.M. Consuls have testified in their reports that "the remarkable change may be ascribed to the good influence of this and other Sailors' Rests." More than one thousand seamen above any preceding year attended the religious services in Naples Rest during 1895. Many are receiving spiritual blessing.

Mr. Moody in Philadelphia.

I CHANCED to go to New York in the same train as Mr. Moody. He spoke with great pleasure of the work in Philadelphia. As to the circumstances which led to his being in Philadelphia, he said:—

"Owing to illness in my family, and to domestic circumstances, I had made no engagements for December and January; but the health of my family so far improved that I found myself able to leave, and it occurred to me that I would give a few Bible readings in Philadelphia. Through a friend I inquired of Dr. Conwell what would be the price for the use of the Temple for two or three weeks, at such times as he was not using it. Dr. Conwell treated me like a prince. He replied, 'Mr. Moody cannot pay anything for the Temple. He shall have it just as long as he wants it, and at any time he wants. We will give up the field entirely to him, and it shall be a union service. I will keep out of the way, so that everything shall be in his hands.' He even protested against our paying a small sum for the daily expenses and care of the building."

"I intended at first to give only a few Bible readings, but the work grew on my hands. I never saw so great results produced from so short a series of meetings. There were many very marked instances of the work of God in answer to prayer. There was a father, living in New Jersey, whose son had caused him great anxiety. He and his family had just been praying for him, at family prayers, and as they rose from their knees, a telegram was received from the son telling them that he had been converted at the meetings. Everywhere I went people were ready and willing and anxious to talk. I went into the office of one business man who said, 'I want you to talk to my brother. I will bring him in and introduce him, and then I will go away and leave you together.' No sooner had he gone than the brother, without a word from me, asked, 'What shall I do to become a Christian?'"

Mr. Moody did not know at this time that his aged and honoured mother was in a very critical condition. She had been attacked with "grip," and Mr. Moody reached his home only in time to stand by her death-bed and to receive her last farewell and blessing.—Dr. Wayland in "The Examiner."

"My Neighbour."

Down South you tell a white man that the negro is his neighbour and his brother, and he has got through all dealings with you. You cannot preach to him any more. It is the same in California. It will not do to tell a white man in California that the Chinaman is his neighbour and brother, or he will get mad at you. I was going down a street in San Francisco when a white hoodlum rushed out and seized a Chinaman by the queue and pulled him over flat on the walk. I interfered on behalf of the Chinaman; the hoodlum was mad at me, said he didn't think so much of me as he did of the Chinaman; he drew a knife, and I came near losing my life, just because I didn't want to see the Chinaman abused.

We are no better than the Jews who despised the Samaritans. We are a mean lot, the whole of us. It is so easy to be a priest or a Levite. Tell a high-toned man that the reeling drunkard in the city streets is his neighbour, and he will be indignant at you. We do not get acquainted with ourselves. If we did we should come closer to the knowledge of who our neighbour is.—D. L. Moody.

Jesuit Policy.—A recent convert from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism, who was for years a prominent member of the Jesuit order—Count Paul von Hoenbroech, of Berlin—says in the Deutsche Revue:—"To rule at all times, to rule in all lands, to rule over all men, to rule under all circumstances, to rule in the State, to rule in the family, and again and again to rule—this is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, of the Vicegerent of Christ. The Roman Catholic Church knows neither kings nor princes, neither independent Governments nor Parliaments; she recognises only subjects; she claims for herself the right at all times to exercise her prerogatives even against law."—Rev. Donald Miller, in "A Voice from Italy."

King David and His Psalms.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANIA.

THE TWO ROYAL PSALMS.

PSALMS XX. AND XXI. form a pair, the latter being, as Maclaren says, a pendant to the former. Psalm xx. is the people's prayer for the king while he is sacrificing, and at the same time it is the king's own conviction of victory and of the granting of his prayer. Luther describes the psalm as "a shout of triumph before the victory, a shout of joy before the help." The psalm is to serve as a devout and holy war-cry.

In Psa. xxi. the people thank Jehovah for the gladness and rejoicing of their king. Based on his confidence in Jehovah (7), they assure him of certain and glorious victory in battle. What Psa. lx. was in the Edomite and Psa. lxxviii. in the Ammonite wars, such were these two beautiful psalms, with their wonderful originality and symmetry, in the approaching Philistine war.

PSALM XX.

For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

I.

1. Jehovah answer thee in the day of trouble,
The name of the God of Jacob set thee on high—
2. Send thee help from the sanctuary,
And support thee out of Zion.

II.

3. May He remember all thy meat offerings,
And accept as fat thy burnt sacrifice. Selah.
4. Grant thee thy heart's desire,
And fulfil all thy counsel.

Chorus—

5. May we exult in thy salvation,
And in the name of our God set up our banners.

ANTIPHON.

I.

Jehovah, fulfil all thy petitions.

6. Now I know that Jehovah saves his anointed.
He will answer him from his holy heaven
With the saving strength of his right hand.

II.

7. These boast in chariots, and these in horses,
And we—we boast in the name of Jehovah our God.

8. They—they are bowed down and fall,
And we—we are risen and stand upright.

Chorus—

9. Save, O Jehovah,
Let the King answer us when we call.

While the king is sacrificing in the sanctuary (2, 3) one person, on behalf of the people, sends up four wishes for him. At the mention of the burnt sacrifice, the fat of which had to be burnt (1 Sam. ii. 15), and of the meal offering, by which the burnt sacrifice was accompanied, the music chimes in with its Selah. The sacrifice is thus emphasised as the occasion and the chief cause. It is made in the day of trouble, the trouble named in Ps. lxvi. 14, and the day of calamity mentioned in Ps. xviii. 18. The allusion is Gen. xxxv. 3: "who answered me in the day of my distress?" Therefore, the prayer continues: "The name of the God of Jacob preserve thee." Jacob's day of trouble was that in which he awaited Esau, as now David and his people await the Philistines. The wish for the granting of the prayer in the day of trouble (1), for help from the sanctuary on Zion (2), and for remembrance of the sacrifice (3), culminates in the desire for the realisation of all the king's projects (4), evidently those which are set forth in detail in Psa. cxliv.

In verse 5 occurs the chorus of the people, as it does later on in v. 9, with a petition to be enabled to rejoice over "thy salvation," that is, the salvation of Jehovah ("thy" is also mentioned in Ps. xxi. 1 and 5), and to raise the standard in the approaching war in the name of Elohim.

Thereupon the king himself speaks, and petitions Jehovah to grant all the wishes addressed to Him. He declares his conviction that Jehovah will save his anointed (comp. Psa. cxliv. 10) by answering with the mighty works solicited of Him in Psa. cxliv. The people asked for help from the sanctuary on Zion (2), but David raises their expectation to the heavenly sanctuary (6), which in Psa. xviii. 9 and xxix. 9 is also said to be the place whence the help really proceedeth. In verse 7 he includes himself with his people: "We boast," in contradistinction to the Philistines, who in their praises boast in their horses and chariots, and against which the royal law warned the children of Israel (Deut. xvii. 16). David declares that Israel will boast in the name of their God in the same manner; and by their so doing will assuredly come the defeat of their enemies and victory for Israel.

Again the chorus joins in with an appeal to Jehovah for deliverance—to the heavenly King (see Psa. cxlv. 1) that He will hear their prayer.*

PSALM XXI.

For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

I.

1. Jehovah, in thy strength the king rejoices
And in thy salvation how greatly he exults!
2. Thou has given him his heart's desire,
And hast not withheld the request of his lips.
[Selah.]

II.

3. For Thou goest before him with blessings of good,
Thou settest a crown of fine gold on his head.
4. Life he asked from Thee; thou gavest it him,
Length of days for ever and ever.

III.

5. His glory is great in thy salvation,
Honour and majesty Thou layest upon him,
6. For Thou settest him to be blessings for ever,
Makest him glad with joy in thy presence.

Chorus—

7. Yea, the king trusts on Jehovah,
And through the mercy of the Most High he shall not be moved.

ANTIPHON.

I.

8. Thine hand shall find out all thy foes;
Thy right hand find out those that hate thee.
9. Thou shalt make them as a fiery furnace
At the time of thy presence.

II.

- Jehovah in his wrath shall swallow them up,
And the fire shall devour them.
10. Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth,
And their seed from among the sons of men.

III.

11. For they intended evil against thee,
They meditated mischief; they will achieve nothing.
12. For thou shalt make them turn their back,—
Make ready with thy bowstrings against their faces.

Chorus—

13. Be thou exalted, Jehovah, in thy strength;
We will sing and praise thy power.

From the words of the choruses we may conclude that the psalm sings the praises of Jehovah's mercy (8) and Jehovah's strength (13); or, in the words of verse 1, Jehovah's strength and salvation.

In the three first tetrastichs, the people thank Jehovah for their king, who rejoices in his strength and his salvation, rejoicings based on Jehovah's giving him his heart's desire and the request of his lips. This is confirmed by a triumphal Selah, "leading to the inference," says Delitzsch, "that it was the offering up of a well-known public prayer, which occasioned the psalm to be written." What other prayer could it be but that uttered in Psa. cxliv., of whose fulfilment David has expressed himself so confidently and joyously in Psalms xxxiii. and xx. This now becomes a link in the chain of blessings which Jehovah had already conferred on the king. As such may be named the Ammonite crown, the symbol of the great victory over Ammon, but above all the memorable hearing of David's prayer, which was granted on the king's supplication in 2 Sam. vii. 29.

* The English national hymn, "God save the king," has its origin in v. 9—"the king" being, in the Septuagint and the Vulgate, placed in the first line. But the Hebrew text must here decide the matter. As, however, David expressly observes (6) that God saveth his anointed, no objection can be raised to the words "Jehovah save the king" being connected in verse 9.

The common form of salutation which was used after this time, "May the king live for ever!" (1 Kings i. 31), was in this way made possible, and became a reality through the promise to David's seed.* The king's honour became great (1 Chron. xvii. 18), greatness and glory were heaped upon him, everlasting blessing was assigned to him (2 Sam. vii. 29), and joy abundant,—wholly and solely through the instrumentality of God's salvation.

This address of gratitude to Jehovah is interrupted in verse 7 by a direct assertion or exclamation on the part of the chorus, declaring that the king, because he trusteth in Jehovah, shall not be moved in the approaching most perilous battle.

Whereas the first three strophes are speeches to Jehovah, the last three, which compose the antiphon, being based on the speech to the king in verse 7, are not supplicating, as in Psalm xx. 1-4, but are confident and prophetic in form. His hand shall find out all enemies; directly he shows himself they shall be changed to a fiery oven (2 Sam. xii. 31), for the wrath of Jehovah shall consume them; those who before have been spared shall be destroyed from the earth (10), and that rightly, for they intended evil and deceit against the king. Those who are now the aggressors must ignominiously turn their backs, and take to flight (comp. the fulfilment, Psa. xviii. 40).

The chorus then invokes Jehovah to arise in his strength, He whose might, as revealed and proclaimed in verses 9-12, must be lauded and praised.†

If David, in Psa. cxliv., ventured one of his boldest petitions to God, and praised Him in advance for the fulfilment of it, he has in these two psalms made the whole of believing Israel a party to the matter, and has with fervour put into their mouths the prayer and intercession used during the sacrifice. They were, by this means, to be induced to fight with him, and to experience the strengthening power and perfect joy of prayer. They would thereby receive him as graciously pardoned by God, and fully rehabilitated as king.

Four Jewels.

"But we behold Him."—Heb. ii. 9 (R.V.)

FOUR radiant jewels, precious, peerless, grand,
Held by our Father's gracious loving hand
Before faith's eye; to sparkle in the night
Of every sorrow:—blessed, beauteous, bright.

"But."

Day hath its night, Life hath its hopes and fears,
Sky hath its clouds, Joy hath its smiles and tears;
So, desert there must be, that we may know,
The sweet oasis of his Love below.

"We."

Our Father taketh in his wide embrace
His children all; oft He alone can trace
The features of a child—He knows his own,
Tho' they may have to walk life's path unknown.

"Behold."

Look to the heaven bent over us above;
The heaven of all his firmament is Love.
Is there a sun, or star, that faith can see,
Like to the glory shining forth from Thee?

"HIM."

Oh, name of Love; love that knows no declining,
Bright star of morn, all other stars outshining;
Thou faithful One and True, forsaking never,
We praise Thee, Jesus, Lord, now, now, and ever.

S. TREVOR FRANCIS.

* The French saying, "Le roi ne meurt pas," became in this way a real truth in the case of the Davidic kingship.

† It deserves to be remembered that it was this twenty-first Psalm which was read in the service on January 18, 1871, when the Emperor William was proclaimed Emperor of Germany at Versailles. How could a more suitable psalm have been chosen, and the thought in choosing it is expressed in the prayer which was read: "O Lord, let the mighty judgments with which Thou hast visited this proud and powerful kingdom, which in these halls personally confront us, be to us a warning against all self-seeking and forgetfulness of God,—against all praise and boasting of our own might."

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, February 23.

LET THEM THAT LOVE HIM BE AS THE SUN WHEN HE GOETH FORTH IN HIS MIGHT."—Judges v. 31.

SO sang Deborah, and we may take up her strain, making it our prayer for all that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

We desire it for His sake.—It cannot be for his glory that his followers should be weak-kneed and decrepit, waning and flickering, backsliding and inconstant. Men will judge Him and them, and will count his light a vanishing luminary if He cannot maintain the glow and fire in those that follow Him. Besides, how great the anguish of his heart must be when those on whom He has expended pains and care, deceive and fail Him.

We desire it for their sakes.—Think of the beneficent ministry of the sun, awakening bird and blossom, painting the rich colours of natural beauty, ripening fruits, gladdening children and grandsires, carrying everywhere healing with his beams. If he were conscious of the good he imparts what blessedness would be his. Would he grudge the expenditure of his vitalising forces, when from millions of upturned lips he heard himself blessed? Such may the bliss of the Christian worker be, if, without diminution of light and heat, his life grows to the perfect day. Blessed are they who bless. If it is happy to receive, it is far happier to impart.

We desire it for the sake of others.—The world is sunless enough! Many are perishing for a bath of sunshine! Darkness broods chill and deathly. Let no clouds dim your pathway, or, if they do, transmute them to gold. Shine forth, ye righteous, in the kingdom of your Father, satellites of the greater central sun of righteousness!

MONDAY, February 24.

"AND THE LORD LOOKED UPON HIM AND SAID, GO IN THIS THY MIGHT, AND THOU SHALT SAVE ISRAEL. HAVE NOT I SENT THEE?"—Judges vi. 14.

The strength-giving power of a look from the eyes of Christ! Gideon was weak enough. He said, quite naturally, "My family is poor in Israel, and I am the least in my father's house." But from the moment of that look, accompanied by that summons, he arose in a strength that never afterwards faltered.

It was a look of expectation.—Gideon felt that the angel expected him to save Israel. It is a great matter to excite hope in a man. Tell him that you are anticipating some noble deed from him, and you may light a spark that will set his whole soul aglow. It is of immense importance to stir the timid and retiring with fresh conceptions of the possibilities of their lives.

It was a look of encouragement.—Those gentle, loving eyes said, as though they spoke, "I will be with thee; do not hesitate to look for Me in every hour of need." Such looks Christ still gives us across the battlefields of life.

It was a look of strength-giving might.—It carried help with it. On its beam new spiritual force sped from the speaker to the listener, from captain to cadet. So from the excellent glory one look from Jesus will bring reinforcement. As He looks on us He imparts to us, and says, Go in this, thy might.

TUESDAY, February 25.

"A CAKE OF BARLEY BREAD."—Judges vii. 13.

Like most dreams, incoherent and grotesque! Who ever heard of a cake of barley bread upsetting a tent! To the dreamer and his comrade, there was no sense in it. But how much it meant to the two Hebrews, who had crept up to the other side of the curtain, in the thick darkness, and were drinking in each word.

The dream was very humbling.—It brought Gideon back to the simplicity and helplessness of his own resources. In the gathering of these crowds of warriors, in the notoriety he had achieved, in the loyalty of the 300, there was much to inflate his pride. Therefore God brought him face to face with himself. He was only a cake of barley bread at the best. Before God can uplift, use, and anoint us, He must show us what we are, humbling and emptying us, bringing us into the dust of death. Before God can use thee to work a great deliverance, He must convince thee of being only a cake of barley bread. "Five barley loaves, and two small fishes."

It was full of hope.—A cake of barley bread might be a worthless thing, but if God were behind it it would upset a tent! So when the weakest life is placed at the disposal of the Almighty, and taken in hand by Him, it becomes mighty to the pulling down of strongholds.

It is full of teaching.—How much has to be learnt by us on these lines! We are too strong for God. We vaunt our might, we count our warriors, we magnify our generalship. This may not be! No flesh may glory in his presence! So God brings us down to the brook and tests us there, and reduces our force to 300 men, and ourselves to barley-cakes, and there gets the victory with his right hand, and his holy arm.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

"AS THOU ART, SO WERE THEY; EACH ONE RESEMBLED THE CHILDREN OF A KING."—Judges viii. 18.

It was a magnificent tribute to the royal bearing of this illustrious family. All the children had the stamp of kingliness on them, which had impressed even these barbaric princes. Would that a similar confession could be extorted from those who behold the members of the royal house of Jesus. But it is too much to say of the majority of those who profess the name of Jesus.

The children of a king! It is within the reach of any who aspire to it. By the second birth we become the children of God, joint-heirs with Christ, and the Spirit witnesses to our sonship, teaching us to cry, Abba Father. As children of the great King we should bear the sign of our high lineage in our bearing and walk.

Royalty of demeanour.—There is an aristocratic bearing in the scions of noble houses among men. The head is lifted high, the mien is proud, the manner distant and reserved. But in the family of God, meekness and lowliness, humility and contriteness are marks of family likeness. We walk as Jesus walked, of whom the Baptist said, "Behold the Lamb of God."

Royalty of dress.—The king is marked by the brilliant orders glittering on his breast. Purple and ermine become those who date their descent from a line of kings. But the emblem of our family is the cross, our colour is scarlet, our insignia is the towel and basin that speak of lowly service.

Royalty of occupation.—The earthly king does nothing servile. He is waited on with lowly obeisance. But they who are of the same family as Jesus are found performing the lowliest acts of service, in gaols, hospitals, and slums. In this they follow closely on the steps of Him, who went about doing good.

THURSDAY, February 27.

"THEIR HEARTS INCLINED TO FOLLOW ABIMELECH, FOR THEY SAID, HE IS OUR BROTHER."—Judges ix. 3.

Is not this the reason why God has set us in families? Had He so chosen, each of us might have been created alone as Adam was, and sent out with no special connection with others of our race. But instead we are closely connected. It is very rarely that a man is so utterly bereaved as to be destitute of some relative.

Between a man and his brother there is a special tie. It may be truly said, in the case of brothers, that a doorway has been made through the walls which ordinarily part men, which may be bricked up or filled with debris; but the wall there will always be thinner than anywhere else, and some day the doorway may be opened for the passage of the messenger of peace. Men are always more inclined to follow the man of whom they can say, "He is our brother."

Brotherhood, sisterhood, relationship of any kind, is therefore a very precious talent, and it becomes us solemnly to ask ourselves whether it has been put to use. Have you ever spoken or written to your brother or sister about Christ?

As soon as Andrew had found Jesus, he started off to find his own brother Simon; and Simon was glad to follow him because he was his brother. Had another tried, it is as likely as not that he would have repelled him. But what could he say to the man who had shared his childhood's sports, and had helped him haul in a net of fish many a time after a night of hard work?

This is the reason that Jesus has so strong a hold on human hearts. He is our brother, bone of our bone, not ashamed to call us brethren, and surely there is much in this to incline us to follow Him.

FRIDAY, February 28.

"HIS SOUL WAS GRIEVED FOR THE MISERY OF ISRAEL."—x. 16.

This is a very strong way of stating the pitifulness of God. It is applying to Him terms borrowed from our own experiences as men, and in no other way could we realise the tender love and compassion of our Heavenly Father. Israel's miseries were due to the sins with which their history was marked, but, nevertheless, God's love brooded over them, longing to deliver.

This is the explanation of God's first words to Adam. One of the versions substitutes for "Where art thou?" the words "Alas for thee!" as though God were treading the glades of Eden with a broken heart, grieved for the misery of his children.

This was the lament of God's Spirit throughout the Old Testament. "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Mine heart is turned within me, my compassions are kindled together." "O, Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself."

This led to the Incarnation and Passion of our Lord.—He looked, and there was no man; He wondered that there was none to help, therefore his own arm brought salvation.

This characterised our Lord's earthly life. When He beheld the city, and foresaw all the evil that could accrue to it, he could not hold back his tears. "His soul was grieved." In all likelihood, you, my reader, may be suffering keenly the result of your own mistakes and sins in earlier life. The troubles that hem you in, as the children of Ammon and the Philistines Israel, are the direct outcome of your having forsaken God. He could, and would, have saved you, but you made it impossible, because you withdrew yourself from his care. And now He grieves over you. If only you would forsake your sins and turn to Him, He would assuredly raise up a Jephthah for your help.

SATURDAY, February 29.

"AND JEPHTHAH SENT MESSENGERS UNTO THE KING OF THE CHILDREN OF AMMON."—xi. 12.

Jephthah's procedure was admirable in his quiet expostulation before resorting to force in the defence of home and country against the aggression of Amalek. It was quite clear that Ammon had no right to the lands of which Israel, at God's command, had dispossessed the Amorites. "Thou dost me wrong to war against me." But before repelling the invasion Jephthah did his best to show the unreasonableness of Ammon's pretext.

Thus our Lord expostulated with the servant that smote Him. "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou Me?"

It is in this way that we are to act still. "If thy brother sin against thee, go, show him his fault between thee and him alone: if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother."

In the Master's judgment the wrong-doer injured himself much more than anyone else; and therefore earnest words of expostulation were so desirable to stay him from his own destruction.

How admirable it would be if we would act in such a spirit of meek conciliation. Then our cause might fairly be submitted to the Judge of all (27); and we should be strong in after times to stand for the sacred rights of others.

There is no need to bribe God's help, as Jephthah did, by his rash promise. He will give gladly and freely out of his own heart of love the help and deliverance we need, if only our cause is rightly ordered before Him. When we are right with our fellow men we can confidently count on God's almighty helpfulness.

Elephants and Their Tusks.*

By Rev. DAVID DAVIES, Brighton.

I WANT to speak to my young friends about the elephant in the Bible. The nearest word I can find is "ivory," or, according to the marginal reading, which is, indeed, the literal translation, "elephants' teeth." So we get the elephant in by his tusk. It does not matter how we get him if we manage to drag him in somehow. Nor would the elephant much object to this, for he is a good-natured creature, and likes to please children. He is very big, and tremendously powerful, but, like most big people, he is genial and good-tempered, and would be very glad to know that anything said about him interested you. Therefore, in speaking to you about ivory, I will first of all speak about the one who produces ivory—the elephant. (See 1 Kings x.)

I have said that he is a big creature, not very good-looking, but yet one that attracts our attention at once, and one to whom children take very readily. You see that he is not an unkind creature like many are, for he does not take advantage of children. He remembers every act of kindness done to him. You have, no doubt, been in the Zoological Gardens and seen a little child at one corner of the crowd with a biscuit in his hand, and the elephant has looked very politely at the child. By way of giving a gentle hint perhaps, he often puts out his trunk toward the biscuit, and when he gets it he politely withdraws his trunk, and places the biscuit in his huge mouth. This is one way in which God has specially provided for the elephant. His neck is so very short that if he had to reach everything he had to eat he would probably starve; but the Lord has given him a good long trunk so that he can lay hold of things, and thus reach out for his food. Thus the smallest donations are gratefully received.

But he remembers an unkindness, too. I should not like to tell you all that I have seen an elephant do to a man, who was wicked and foolish enough to put tobacco into his trunk, except that he lifted him up by his garment, and held him up in mid-air for a time; and then, when all the conceit was knocked out of him, dropped him down. The elephant knows better than to take tobacco; and if a man will throw his tobacco into his trunk, he is sure to remember it, and teach him never to offer tobacco to an elephant in the future.

Then, again, elephants are very friendly to each other. They live together in companies, sometimes as many as fifty and even 100. A procession of elephants is a very imposing sight in such cases. Elephants pay every possible respect to age. The oldest elephant goes in front—he knows which way he ought to take better than the younger ones behind—and the second elephant in age brings up the rear. All this is done so that none of the younger ones shall wander or get into danger. What an example to us! How wise the younger ones must be to acknowledge that the older ones are wiser than themselves. The wisest lad is not the lad who thinks he is the wisest, but the one who says, "Well, father has lived longer in the world than I have; and he knows a good deal about its evils and dangers of which I am ignorant." The same thing applies to your mother and teacher.

Now, elephants are often killed for the sake of the ivory which their tusks supply. I have no doubt that the elephant when alive thinks a good deal of his two fine tusks. And that is one reason why the African elephants appear to be much more proud and aristocratic than the Indian elephants; the Indian elephants have very short tusks, but the African very fine ones. These tusks are very valuable. Thus in all ages the poor elephant has had a hard time of it. Even far back in distant ages ivory was greatly valued. In our text we find that it was brought in order to make a throne of ivory for Solomon.

Pliny tells us that in his day, in Ethiopia, the people made doorposts of the tusks of elephants. But that day has long since gone by. Ivory is far too precious for making ordinary doorposts. All kinds of things of exceptional value have been made of ivory and overlaid with gold, just as the throne of Solomon was. I can imagine an elephant feeling proud of the fact—if he knew it—that even after he had been killed his tusks would be used for such high purposes as these. There is nothing to compare with ivory for its fineness of texture, its cream-like colour, and its capacity for exquisite polish.

Now I wonder if when you look at the elephant next time, you will remember some of these things. What mischief the elephant would do if he made use of his power as recklessly as some men make use of their power. Sometimes an elephant is irritated, and then he rushes at trees and everything else, and lifts them up and hurls them aside with his mighty trunk; but as a rule he is a very gentle creature, desirous of doing harm to none. Have you not, at some time or other, been seated upon an elephant's back just for a treat with half-a-dozen other children? You have had no misgiving as to his being able to carry all of you. He can carry two thousand pounds weight; that is the load generally which can be put on an elephant's back; and often he has served men in that way by carrying the burdens of others.

Now, dear young friends, cannot we do something like that in our life? Our backs are not strong; but there is some one weaker than ourselves, whose burdens we can take for a little time, or at least share it. There are some in trouble, and the trouble crushes them down to the earth. Cannot we just put our shoulder under the burden and sufficiently lighten it, at least, to enable the troubled one to carry it? There is much that we can do if we only look out for the opportunity. There is nothing so noble in life as first to carry our own little burden of care, and then to be ready to share the burdens of those who need our help. If you go on through life in that unselfish spirit, counting it all joy to use your greater strength in helping those who are weaker than yourselves, you will live to a good purpose, and at last the Master Himself will say to you, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!"

Answers to these competitions are acknowledged in two lists:—

1. Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue. 2. Those received later, in the one following.

But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the competition appears.

ABOUT PRIZES.

On March 26 there will be special "Bible Searcher" Questions, for which prizes will be given. But only those boys and girls will be allowed to compete whose names have appeared in the lists as "correct" nine times during the twelve preceding weeks.

Those who have joined too late, or have been unsuccessful too many times, to make up nine "correct" weeks by that date, must wait till the next Prize Questions, of which I shall tell you in good time. But you see how important it is for you to send "correct" answers every week if possible, so that you may be able to compete for the prizes when they are offered.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 8).

Find five prayers in St. Luke's Gospel.

- (1) By a son to his father.
- (2) By lepers.
- (3) By a Pharisee.
- (4) By a Publican.
- (5) By a thief.

Learn each, and write it out from memory, giving also chapter and verse.

I must ask my young friends and their parents to excuse my referring to their answers again if their names do not appear in the lists. I have acceded to several such requests, and in every case have found that the answers had been inaccurate, and the names, therefore, properly left out. It involves considerable labour to search out particular papers, and my readers, young and old, must accept as final my decision as indicated by the lists.

I may also say, in answer to many inquiries, that it is not necessary that answers should be sent on postcards; but, let me add, it is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly.

UNCLE TOM.

A Japanese Boy's Composition.

A GENTLEMAN, whose brother teaches in a Government school in Japan, has sent the following genuine schoolboy's composition to a New York paper:—

"THE WHALE."

"The whale live in the sea and ocean of all the country. He is a large and strong in among all kinds of fish, and its length reach to ninety foot from seventy foot, and he has a large head. When swim in the up water he is so large as Island. When struck the water on angry he is so voice as ring great deal thunder. If he danced make the storm without winds, and also when blow the water almost lay down the fog on the weather. His the form is proper to live, for his frontlegs make Hire, and afterlegs is not, and the tails is a Hire that open on the up waters, and the mouth have no leaves, but have leaves that is a hard narrow beard as with horns. His bodys though is a fish, he is not a fish, but he is a creatures. His leaves is names whalesleaves. The men make the everything with it. Every years to seven or eighth month from four to five month, the whaler man catch on the sea or ocean. He may live on the sea of North seaway or five Islands, of Hirado on Higen country in Japan. Written by T. Hirakawa.

"P.S.—The tell of the whale is more, but I do not know fully to tell."

Little Snowflakes.

STILL and gentle all around,
Little snowflakes soft and light,
One by one spread o'er the ground,
Making it a fleecy white.

As we watch these little flakes,
Falling down so soft and light,
Who would think so few it takes
Thus to form this robe of white?

In this way are duties done,
Quietly, gently, every hour;
Smallest deeds, we early learn,
Give to life its greatest power.

Deep Sea Fishing.

IN the February issue of "Night and Day," under the heading "Personal Notes," Dr. Barnardo writes of two of his recent rescues:—

My net has to be cast on the right side of the ship. In it are enclosed a great multitude, representing widely different needs. Take, for example, dear Dixie. She is a sweet little maiden of only seven. Look at her face, as her big eyes glance out at you from this page, and tell me if you could guess the home from which she comes. Perhaps she is like some dear child in your own family circle, and you think of kind hands always about her, of gentle words always spoken in her ears, and of tender and refined home influences in her up-bringing, even although poverty may never have been far from the door at any time. Would that it had been so!

"DEAR DIXIE IS A SWEET LITTLE MAIDEN OF ONLY SEVEN."

But, alas! little Dixie's mother is a poor, degraded creature, whose life-story I dare not set forth in these pages. Dixie herself (only seven, remember!) lodged with her mother in one of the worst quarters of the metropolis. There she was constantly being familiarised with the most demoralising and repulsive aspects of the degraded life that was being lived around her. She had no father to look to; she went to no school; she was learning evil words from her earliest childhood. The whole atmosphere she breathed was laden with moral malaria inimical to virtue. Nothing short of a miracle could apparently save Dixie from being like any one of the fifteen or twenty girl-children living in the same court, who lolled in dirty rags about the alley, shouted out in coarse tones the hideous gossip that formed their only communications, and gradually ripened into premature womanhood, with no memory behind them of that freshness and innocence which constitute the charm of childhood. Religious and moral influences were out of the question. Quite recently five other degraded women, with Dixie's mother, slept in the small room with Dixie herself.

Dear Dixie! One cannot help loving her, as did the matron of the Quarantine House in which we first placed her. She was even then, however, gentle, innocent, child-like, unscathed by the fires through which she had passed. It seemed as though a miracle of grace had been exemplified, firstly in preserving her unspotted, and then in delivering her permanently, from the evils to come. Do you ask where dear Dixie is now? She is boarded out with a good Christian woman of the peasant class, the wife of an agricultural labourer in one of the home counties. The little one has already become a member of the family, and is beloved by them all. She attends the village school and the village church, and shouts with childish glee as she plays upon the village green with her companions. Best of all, she forgets—oh, thank God for that!—forgets all the dark scenes amidst which her earliest years were passed.

Not unseldom in my deep sea fishing my net closes round a big fish. How would any reader of these pages like to have the destiny of William O'Reilly on his hands? Look at the engraving of his photograph! I had almost termed him "Bill Sikes, Junior," for he has the family countenance and cast of features. Only a little longer continuance of his recent life on the streets would develop him into a fully fledged law-breaker. But, I think (and I have had some experience) that I have taken William O'Reilly in time, although only just in time. His history is all against him. His father is dead; the mother has not been heard of for three years. William has been something of an Ishmaelite in his time; his hand has been against every man's; but he would explain, if asked, that that was only because every man's hand was against him. For Bill Sikes, junior, is made as much by his conditions of daily life as by the hereditary tendencies in his blood.

Surround Bill by drastic prohibitions, deprive him of food and shelter, cast him upon the streets at say thirteen years of age, tell him that every policeman he meets voices the dread words, "Thou shalt not," let his comrades be denizens of the lodging-houses, let his wits be sharpened by a struggle for the coarsest livelihood, let him be taught, by the worst of companionships, that the only wrong is to be found out in your wrong-doing, and then, as certainly as by the operation of the law of gravity a body falls to the earth, so certainly will Bill Sikes, junior, blossom out into Bill Sikes, senior.

But let Bill Sikes, junior, be stopped as near the outset of his career as may be, taught that somebody cares for him, and that while there are many "shalt nots" staring the wrong-doer in the face, there are also as many encouragements to virtue and good-living. Let his reasonable animal wants be supplied; let him live in an atmosphere of decency and of industry; let hope be awakened in his bosom, and let him have as an incentive the anticipation of success and independence; above all, let practical religion, the warm blessed religion of Christ, be daily brought to bear on heart and life, and it is possible that as we watch Bill Sikes, junior, under such altered conditions, the characteristic expression of the family face will die out, new light will come into the eyes, a new hope diffuse itself in all his movements, and the future, when it becomes the present, will show us, not Bill Sikes, senior, but a veritable new creation, a useful member of society, and a God-fearing and upright man.

I would ask the prayers of all God's people for a blessing to rest upon our efforts to extend the Kingdom of God among the children of the slums.

Progress in Japan.

AS the year 1895 closes in Japan there are many things that give reason for encouragement and gratitude to God. It is not the same, however, now as some twelve or fifteen years ago. Then the forces that were not in favour of Christianity were more or less indifferent, and evidently regarded the few thousand converts as too trivial to make any considerable impression on the religious or political history of the country. For that reason but little was said or done to oppose its progress.

But now all available forces seem to be massed in opposition to vital Christianity. Not only are the Buddhists and other forms of heathendom arrayed in active conflict; one man who was once a prominent missionary is furnishing to the daily press elaborate articles for the purpose of undermining the very foundations of the Christian faith.

Yet there is evident progress, and God is with his people in their work. A missionary lady, who has been visiting the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals at Hiroshima, recently said that at any time she could find twenty men ready and eager to hear the Gospel. Some of the soldiers said to her that her coming among them, with words of cheer and comfort, was more helpful to them than the work of the physicians. Another lady missionary, who had been visiting one of the military hospitals in Northern Japan, writes that when she took some Gospels to the hospital for distribution there was a regular scramble to get one of the coveted books.

A missionary writing from Hiroshima says that there is increased attendance at the churches and a considerable religious awakening. Another missionary writing from Kobe says that there seems to be a general looking up in evangelistic work. Many who have been keeping their membership letters in their pockets are bringing them out and uniting with some church. Some lapsed Christians are coming back, and a few inquirers are reported from nearly every part of my field.

One thing that is especially hopeful is that the controlling political party has been associated with Christianity more than any other. Its head (Count Itagaki) invited Rev. Dr. Verbeck and others to visit the city where he resides and teach the people the doctrines of Christianity. As the result of such teachings large numbers of his followers became Christians, and two of his most intimate associates are prominent officers in the Presbyterian Church. One of them was the vice-president of the party and also of the last House of Representatives. He is a man who is widely known and has great influence. That influence will be sure to be exerted on the right side.

Thus, in one way and another, Japan is moving, and moving in the direction of more light and more in the path of Christian teachings.

Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D. PREACHER AND REFORMER.

ONE of the most important functions of the ancient prophet was to trumpet forth, with fearless voice, the testimony of God's Word against the wickedness of the great cities of his day. Notwithstanding two millenniums of Christian civilisation, the great cities of modern times are still the focus of all that is evil and opposed to righteousness. The office of public mentor seems largely to have faded into desuetude; or perhaps the mantle of the prophet is mostly to be found nowadays on the shoulders of the man who fills the editorial chair. But here and there we find an elect soul, who has been clearly chosen of God to testify against the crying sins and wrong-doings of his time. Such an one is the well-known American preacher whose portrait we give to-day. To Dr. Parkhurst, more than to any other individual, is due the recent awakening of a civic conscience among the lovers of purity, honesty, and righteousness in the great city of New York.

CHARLES H. PARKHURST is a son of the New England State of Massachusetts, and he is now close on fifty-three years of age. For the following facts relating to his worthy career as a preacher and reformer, we are indebted to a most interesting and comprehensive sketch which appeared, some months ago, in Our Day. At the age of twenty he entered Amherst College; graduating there in 1866, he spent the next two years as a teacher. After a six months' visit to Germany, he was appointed to a Greek and Latin professorship in a seminary at East Hampton, in his native State. While there he was advised by the president of his alma mater to enter on the vocation of a preacher. This resolve being taken, he revisited Germany, accompanied by his young wife; having among his professorial teachers the renowned Tholuck. Says the writer from whom we are quoting:—

Though intensely scholarly, Dr. Parkhurst never became a theologian in the customary sense of the word. The reality of God's operation in the human soul has ever been for him a more fascinating study than all the abstruse speculations of all the theologies.

His first pastorate was at Lenox, Mass., where for six years, we are told, he built up a flourishing church and distinguished himself for his practical philanthropy. In 1880 he was called to the church in Madison-square, New York City, where he has since ministered in spiritual things to a large congregation, composed mainly of "the common people," but also having in it some of the most representative citizens. His ministry in this central and populous location has been eminently fruitful in its influence on varied classes of society. Efforts specially for the uplifting of boys and girls in the poorer districts of the city have proved highly beneficent and successful. His preaching is marked by intense earnestness and practicality.

It is as a great civic reformer, however, that Dr. Parkhurst's name will be longest remembered by posterity. Into this line of service he was not drawn by any social or civic ambition, but by the stress of circumstances, and the desire to help young men and women in their struggles with the overwhelming temptations of a great and wicked city. America is said to be the land of freedom, but too often we fear that freedom has included the doubtful privilege of doing what seems desirable and profitable in one's eyes, whether or not it might be intrinsically good, and pure, and true. The social misrule in New York City, by that conglomeration of place-hunters, known as "Tammany," has long been a hissing and a bye-word. The wonder is that the best elements of society have been so long and so tamely acquiescent, under its intolerable crookedness. Towards the end of 1890, in view of the annual election, Dr. Parkhurst was moved to preach a scathing discourse, in which he exposed the glaring abuses of municipal administration. As a result of this sermon he was invited to join the board of direction of the Society for the Prevention of Crime; he was shortly after elected its president on the death of Dr. Howard Crosby. The time was ripe for strenuous, determined action, and with the hour there had come the man.

Space would altogether fail us to follow in detail the energetic steps taken by Dr. Parkhurst, in order to make effective his protest against the wrongs from which the City of New York was suffering. His objective point was to prove that between the caterers for shameless vice and the police officials, there was direct and systematic complicity when there should have been open and undying antagonism. His earlier indignant public utterances on this point landed him in the City Hall as a defendant before the Grand Jury. Having spoken mostly from report, and not from personal knowledge, he could not legally prove his charges, and the outcome was a rebuke from the authorities. This result did not daunt his courage, but drove him into the necessary though painful course of personal investigation of the city's vice and wickedness. He did not shrink from such a disagreeable ordeal of "traversing the avenues of our municipal hell," as he forcibly expressed it. Then he once more appeared before the Grand Jury, and was able to convince them that there was ample ground for arraigning at the bar of justice, not only the positive offenders, but their own officials and servants as aiders and abettors of the foulest crime.

Of course Dr. Parkhurst had to encounter the most determined opposition of all the evil brood whose unholy gains were endangered by his action. He suffered also in reputation, we regret to say, from the criticism of "a class of people who are too righteous not only definitely to rebuke evil, but even to contemplate its being done." Happily these virulent attacks awoke sympathy for the brave reformer throughout the city generally, and this sympathy was expressed in public assembly. It also took the practical shape of the formation of the City Vigilance League, whose subsequent work helped largely to the sweeping defeat of the Tammany ring in the city elections of 1894. Towards that result the investigations and exposures of the Lexow committee also materially contributed. The control of municipal matters passed from the base and perjured Tammany ring, into clean and honest hands, and in these hands the government of the city still remains.

It is true that a mixed and perhaps fickle constituency has in a later election reverted, in some degree, to the former conditions of rule, but, as we say, power is for the present in the hands of the reformers. The saying is ever true that eternal vigilance is the price of true freedom and righteous rule. All honour to Dr. Parkhurst and his fellow-workers for the noble service they have rendered to a great community; a service which we feel certain they will continue to give while life and strength are granted to them, and while the necessity remains. We would that every great centre of population, on both sides of the Atlantic, had in it such an one who loves God, hates evil, and fears not the face of man.

From Miss Annie Taylor.

WRITING on November 29 from Yatong (via Darjeeling), Miss Annie Taylor, of the Tibetan Pioneer Mission, says:—"The Tibetan chiefs want me to start a sort of cottage hospital. I will have to take time to pray and think about it, as my hands seem full already. The Lhasa lama chiefs, who are returning to Lhasa, sent me lately a present of a piece of Tibetan yellow woollen cloth with which to make a gown. Puntso arrived yesterday. I am so glad to have him with me again, as he is a great help. We are leaving the hut at Gnatong to take care of itself, or rather God will protect it for us.

"The attacks on me in the Indian papers have done good; so far as the Tibetans are concerned, they got to know about them before I did, and told me not to fear, for they said, 'This is our country, and we want you here.' The Lhasa chiefs paid me a long visit last Sunday, and some days before the Tibetan chief at Phari-zong came to the shop. I have taken over a hundred rupees for medicine and goods, the Tibetan chiefs being the principal purchasers. 'My help cometh from the Lord.'"

Writing later Miss Taylor says: "The house here is as comfortable as one can make it in these parts. We have no choice as pioneers; we can but take the huts or houses open to us, or tell our Master that He is expecting too much of us. It is the Lord's will that the Gospel should be preached in Tibet. The command is 'to every creature,' and 'in all the world.' Being 'content with such things as ye have' does not mean grumbling and growling at every little inconvenience. I am here for Jesus, and He is here with me. That makes the hut into a palace, and 'home, sweet home.' I expect that in the spring the way will open up further on into Tibet. I have a large supply of food—nine sheep and one goat. It costs nothing to keep them, and they are not always to be got. I have also two pigs, as well as some hens, also flour, potatoes, and other stores. In the early spring it is difficult to get goods, and then the rains set in.

"On Christmas morning I had a number of Chinese visitors, and in the evening over forty, principally Tibetans, came to tea. The tea was boiled with salt and soda, and then churned with butter; we had also bread and jam and currant cake. After tea there were about sixty in all at a Christmas tree and magic lantern exhibition. I told the Gospel story, and at the end we sang in Tibetan, 'Jesus loves me.'"

Miss Ferguson has recently sailed from England to join Miss Taylor in her work.

Letters from South Africa.—5.

BLACK AND WHITE.

SIXTY years ago, more or less, I was the possessor of a medal struck in connection with the Anti-Slavery Movement, having for its device a kneeling negro slave, holding up his chained hands; and for its legend, "Am I not a man and a brother?"

I come to South Africa, and find a large coloured population of all shades, from Kafir or Nubian blackness to the almost whiteness of the octoroon, and my instinct and education lead me to regard them as men and brethren. But while few would, in words, contravene this view, practically it is not endorsed, and I am told that when I have lived here some time I shall come to see things in the same light as the Afrikanders and the Colonists. Possibly so. But there are some circumstances in which conscience is a better guide than custom, and in which lookers-on see most of the situation.

There are three views of the relationship between coloured and white. (1) There can be no communion, either Christian or social. (2) There may be Christian but not social communion. (3) There should be both Christian and social communion.

The first was held, even by good Christian people, within the last 150 years. The second is that held by the most advanced Christians in lands where the coloured races, pure or mixed, abound in contiguity to the white man. The third is said to be a counsel of perfection, impracticable and transcendental, propounded by ultra-Evangelicals and Exeter Hall.

I venture to express the opinion that there is a radical unsoundness in making colour the basis of any such distinction. God and man are both opposed to it. "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." Moses married an Ethiopian (Cushite) woman, an aboriginal black, descended from the son of Ham the son of Noah, and Aaron and Miriam spoke against him. Presumably this was the first agitation of the colour question, and Aaron and Miriam were the first professors of the white persuasion. But God did not approve their protest, and Miriam became whiter than she desired, white with the awful and unnatural whiteness of leprosy; and after being shut out of the camp for seven days she was restored at the intercession of Moses, against whom she had rebelled.

The Queen of Sheba, another coloured lady, was hospitably entertained and magnificently treated by King Solomon.

To Simon of Cyrene, a man of colour, the Lord and Saviour was indebted for the bearing of his cross.

When Ethiopia, in the person of the eunuch, stretched out her hands to God, Philip was specially detached from the pentecostal work at Samaria, that he might join himself to the coloured inquirer, lead him into the light, baptize him on the confession of his faith, and send him on his way rejoicing, to open up Africa to the Gospel of the glory of the blessed God. "For God so loved the (white and coloured) world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Again and again in the last book of Scripture the inhabitants of the world—people, kindreds, tongues, nations—are spoken of, without reference to colour, as equally recipients of the everlasting Gospel; redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb that was slain; having come out of great tribulation, clothed in robes made white in the blood of the Lamb; standing before the throne and before the Lamb with palms in their hands. On the other hand, equally without distinction of colour, the dwellers upon earth are found opposing God's two faithful sack-clothed witnesses; and the waters where the harlot sitteth are peoples and multitudes and nations and tongues. Alike for good and evil men of all colours will be found among the sheep and the goats; they are travelling in company to heaven or to hell; names of each are written in the Lamb's book of life; each will be judged out of those things which are written in the books, according to their works. The sea will give up its white and coloured dead; death and Hades will deliver up the dead which are in them; and whosoever, whether white or coloured, is not found written in the book of life will be cast into the lake of fire.

If the curse is still unexhausted upon the seed of Ham, may not their and our common Creator say to Portuguese, and Dutch, and English, and American descendants of Japhet, "Upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke"? "I am very sore displeased with [the white people] that are at ease; for I was but a little displeased and they helped forward the affliction." "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord." "For thy violence against thy brother shame shall cover thee. Thou shouldst not have looked on the day of thy brother in the day that he became a stranger; neither shouldst thou have rejoiced in the day of their destruction; neither shouldst thou have spoken proudly in the day of their distress."

And man, as well as God, lifts up his voice against the unequal dealing of men with their fellows. Pope said:—

Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean with a span,
I must be measured by my soul,
The mind's the standard of the man.

And Burns:—

The rank is but the guinea stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that.
For a' that, and a' that,
A man's a man for a' that.

I met long ago with the following lines. I forget the singer, but the song abides:—

With no proud unchristian quail,
Canst thou shake the horny palm
Of the meanest in the land,
Freely as a jewelled hand?

Yes; whether the horny palm or the jewelled hand be black or white. I hope I may not live long enough in Africa or anywhere else to backslide from that Christian and Scriptural position. I shall not be in danger of doing so as long as I am kept mindful that the blood of the Lamb of God was shed to make each, like Himself, white as no fuller on earth can white them—white as the light in which the redeemed, whether here they were black or white, shall walk with Him for ever.

The subject is confessedly delicate, difficult, and complicated, and must be dealt with gently, courteously, candidly, and, above all, in the fear of God. This is why I have first appealed to Scripture—to the law and to the testimony.

The question was discussed in The Cape Times a few months ago, in consequence of an incident which occurred in a religious meeting of men only. Two well-dressed and well-conducted coloured brethren took their seats in the middle of the room, and were asked by the usher to remove to the lower end, where places were reserved for men of colour. This was strongly animadverted on in a letter to the Cape Times. It was replied that men coming out from home to the colony would not attend the meetings if they were to sit by men of colour. This is, I think, a mistake. It is not with the men fresh from home that the difficulty exists, but with South Africans, those born in Africa, and whose influence extends only too soon to colonists—those who come from home to settle in the Colony. And what is true of Africa is true of India and elsewhere, wherever coloured and white come into relation with each other.

The early settlers hated the native people, whom they robbed and spoiled. It is natural to hate those whom we oppress, to revenge on them the rebukes of our own conscience. That hatred refused to recognise the aborigines as human beings; they were shot down without compunction, and as for the women,

Toiling through the livelong day,
And at night the spoilers' prey, was too often their unhappy lot. The present prejudice is the result of this ancient iniquity and hatred, which has descended from father to son through successive generations.

But when I speak in this way I am told it is quite right theoretically, but practically any alteration of the present condition is impossible. In other words, it is impossible to harmonise practice with principle. That is the way every reform has been opposed at first—by Christian people not less than others. The foundation principle of the United States Government was that all men are equal, but the practice was slavery for the man of negro blood. Every reform has simply been the bringing of practice into conformity with principle. It was for this that Jesus died—slain in God's purpose from the foundation of the world. The counsel of peace was between them both—peace between principle and practice in the universe. What is heaven but this—all creatures living out in practice the eternal principle of their Creator, who is Love?

What is hell but the place
Where damned ones dwell,
Full in the sight of Paradise,
Beholding heaven and feeling hell?

Principle and practice in eternal harmony in the saved, but in everlasting discord in the lost. To deny the possibility of true principles being embodied in right practice is the worst kind of infidelity—it is the essence of Antichrist—it is to deny the Father and the Son—the love of God and the finished work of Christ.

We need not encumber our minds with the threefold division mentioned above. There is no difficulty which is not easily solved when we stand upon the solid principle of our common manhood. In kind, if not in degree, the very same problem permanently exists among white people. Lords and labourers do not unite in social fellowship, but if they are Christians they hold Christian fellowship. Sometimes a man, by force of character, or education, or holiness, rises into a recognition which the high born acknowledge, and this is true of coloured as well as white. I suppose if a man like Frederick Douglass or Khama were found in a white meeting, no usher would ask him to take a back seat. A chairman who understood his office would probably invite him to the platform.

Colour ostracism is neither godly nor humane. But there is no need to foster fellowship between black and white. A breath of old-time wisdom settles the whole question, "Birds of a feather flock together." That is the unalterable nature of things. There are affinities and repulsions which operate with the force of law.

Black spirits and white,
Blue spirits and grey,
Mingle, mingle, mingle,
You that mingle may, is more than a witches' song. There is spiritual law in the natural world: it is to our own hurt and vexation that we interfere with it.

I am far from advocating any attempt artificially and from the outside to alter the status of the coloured people. Like water, men find their own level. What seems to me wrong and indefensible is the animosity against colour as colour, which ostracises those who, in every respect, are worthy of equal recognition, even though the trace of colour may be only an eighth or a sixteenth, or less—the white man ostracising his own children.

R. C. MORGAN.

The Ministry of Little Children.

(Concluded.)

By REV. R. LEITCH, M.A.

IN DEATH.

CHILDREN die. Even those who have not partaken of "the similitude of Adam's transgression" nevertheless succumb to the stroke of the last enemy. Every graveyard in town or country teaches this. What mean those little round earthy mounds in God's acre? Do they not affectingly tell us of the cord that bound many a young life to this mortal body having been snapped asunder by the cold and powerful hand of death?

The death of a little child is a deep, unfathomable mystery. It seems to be the reversal of Nature. It seems to be the right, the becoming, the natural thing for the child to have to close the parents' eyes in death, and not for the parents to have to close those of the child; and yet, alas! parents often outlive their children! The bud is plucked, whilst the full-blown flower hangs feeble and withered on the stalk. The young perish, and the old live on. In the Book of Genesis we meet with these words: "Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees." Instead of Haran having to follow Terah to the tomb, Terah, on the other hand, had to follow Haran, the son. So has it often been in human history. "Weeping fathers build their children's tombs!"

But sad and painful though the death of a little child is, it is nevertheless fraught with many and most useful lessons. Useful it often is to parents; for now, if they are believing parents, they can better understand than ever before the great mystery of our holy faith; that God the Eternal Father gave up his Son to the death because of his love for us. In the time of bereavement, in the hour when the child is taken from them, they see deeper down into that wondrous abyss of Divine love which led God not to spare his own Son, but to "deliver Him up for us all." "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me," said the Son; and the Father virtually answered, "Not possible, my Son, if a sinful world is to be redeemed and saved."

If we only understood the whole of God's administration, we would see perhaps that even the early death of our offspring is not a calamity to be grieved over, but a mercy to be gratefully acknowledged; we would see that on God's part it was a giving of the "crown without the conflict"; that it was a delivering of them from the sins, and snares, and sorrows, and tears of a vain and ungodly world.

Heaven, I believe, is largely made up of little children. "Perhaps," writes the late Rev. Dr. Thomas Guthrie, of Edinburgh, "God does with his heavenly garden as we with our own. He may chiefly stock it from the nurseries and select for transplanting what is yet in its young and tender age—flowers before they have bloomed and trees ere they begin to bear."

Through the doorway of the decease of one of tender age the Saviour has often come to a parent's heart, and the blank that has thus been made He has been allowed to fill. As the shepherd, when he would lead the mother ewe to a certain place of warmth and of safety and of fertility, often takes up her tender, fragile lamb and carries it away, knowing that the ewe is sure to follow, so God, the heavenly Shepherd, may take to the regions of the blest a dear little child that, weaned from a transient and evil world, the hearts of parents may become still more centred upon Himself, and that they, too, may at last be found in that blissful world where there shall be "no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain."

When such a blow falls upon a household as the removal of a beloved child is felt to be, how comforting and how refreshing are the promises and doctrines of the Word of God felt to be! What can infidelity do in such a crisis? Has it any drop of comfort to pour into the sorrow-stricken heart? Has it any power to assuage the grief and to dry up the falling tear? How cold, how hollow, how unsatisfying, how comfortless, does unbelief at such a time appear, when the Angel of Death steals into our dwelling, and lays low those who are bound to us by the tenderest and closest of all human ties!

It may seem as if, when a little child dies, it has had no mission to fulfil; but such, we believe, is a great mistake. Not in vain has it been launched on the great sea of human life, even though its frail barge may have put into port before the voyage has been well begun.

For the parents the child may have had a mission. In this way God may have been aiming at making their own hearts more tender and more sympathetic, and more like the heart of Him who "was made perfect through suffering." One friend, writing to another friend who had been deprived of a sweet babe through death, used these words: "I can speak more feelingly, because I remember the dark days when we lost a dear child. That loss raised in my mind a commiseration for all mankind, and made me have a deeper love for my fellows, which has never left me." A common experience of suffering is a wonderful teacher. It is the widow that can speak most feelingly to the widow. It is the heart that has been smitten by the hand of bereavement that can feel most tenderly for another's woes. If God empties the heart of bereaved parents, it is that He may fill it with his own fullness. It is to let them see how strong are his consolations, and how real and true and faithful are his promises. If He remove one of the fairest of his creatures, it is that He may show us how much we can find in our Creator Himself. If He dry up the stream, it is to let us know how much there is in the fountain.

Let us never imagine that our children are our own. I know we fondly speak of them as such. But, after all, they are not ours, but God's, and the Giver must not be blamed when, for some wise and beneficent reason, He sees fit to recall the gift.

What'er we fondly call our own
Belongs to Heaven's great Lord
The blessings lent us for a day
Are soon to be restored.
'Tis God who lifts our comforts high,
Or sinks them to the grave.
He gives; and when He takes away
He takes but what He gave.

A Labour Doss Union.

A PROJECT has been set on foot by the Church Army for organising work on behalf of the numerous vagrants or "dossers" who perambulate our country districts. Trampdom, it is said, has largely increased in certain favourite parts during the last decade. In Germany a serious effort has been made to grapple with this social cancer; the result is that confirmed vagrancy has been reduced almost to a minimum, despite an increasing population and slackness of trade. The Church Army executive are seeking to model their plan on the German system of co-operation and industrial expedients.

Briefly, their efforts are to be expended in the following directions:—Lodging-houses at selected distances are invited to join a Labour Doss Union. Tramps genuinely in search of work will be received and catered for in these dosses at very reasonable rates; with appropriate labour tests of an industrial and remunerative kind. "Work orders" will be freely circulated among those likely to be applied to by tramps, and these will be a passport to due relief, on condition of the work being properly performed. Vagrants who cannot produce these orders, and the "recommendation cards" that will also be given, will be at a great disadvantage and will run the risk of being refused relief. It is hoped that "eventually no destitute person, whether an honest man or a rogue, will dare to travel in Great Britain without a card."

The system proposed, if heartily and judiciously taken up throughout the country, seems well calculated to meet the evils of vagrancy, and to minister relief where it is really deserved. Fuller particulars may be had from Rev. W. Carlile, the hon. secretary of the Church Army, 130, Edgware-road, London, W.

In the Heart of India.

IN the early part of March, 1893, your paper contained a brief report of a gathering of friends met to bid farewell to a worker returning to India. The Lord has been pleased to use that worker (myself) in the opening up of new ground, and a few lines concerning the work may be of interest to your readers.

Having had my attention and sympathies attracted to the hill country of the Central Provinces, after much inquiry and prayerful consideration I decided to set to work independently in the unoccupied Balaghat District of the C.P. One of the missionaries of the C.M.S. from the neighbouring district of Mandla had several times crossed the border and preached in the northern part of Balaghat, but the district had never had a resident worker, nor, so far as I have learned, did it contain among its 400,000 population a single Christian convert, native to the place.

The northern part of the district is where I have made my home, after spending over a year viewing the land and preaching over a wide area. Here are found, among the hills and jungles, scores of miles away from railway stations and towns, numbers of people of the aboriginal tribe of Gonds, with several of the lower Hindu castes. I here found little difficulty in getting into intimate relationship with the people, and during the past twelve months the foundation of the Church of Christ in Balaghat has been laid. We have now a little Christian community of some twenty souls, with numerous inquirers seeking admission to our ranks, while my heart rejoices in the evident sincerity of all the dear people, and the true piety of several.

So far, however, little seems to have resulted among the Gonds, whose conversion I had chiefly in view in selecting this field. While they are heartily despised by the higher Hindu castes, the Gonds are among themselves as tenacious of caste as the Brahmin. Although not a few have professed repentance and faith in Christ, none have yet found courage enough to confess Him openly or take any step involving breaking of caste. I have no doubt, however, that a break among the Gonds will come ere long, and when it does come I think it will be a considerable one. The C. M. S. have a number of Gond converts in Mandla, but there is so little communication between the two districts that the Gonds here seem rather sceptical when I assure them that there are Gond Christians in existence.

I am rejoicing, however, over the beginning of a good work among another aboriginal tribe, the Baigas, who are a yet more jungly people than the Gonds, subsisting largely on the raw produce of the jungle. Three adults of this tribe have been baptized—with one solitary exception the first of their people to turn to Christ—and two of these three are developing into zealous preachers of the Gospel.

So far I am alone here, having no helper, European or native. The field seems to me to be a most promising one, and I feel sure that the work that has been thus begun here might be repeated in half-a-dozen other centres of population in the district were the men forthcoming. The country is poor, and some measure of self-denial is called for in matters of eating and drinking, and so on; but to see these dear people emerging one by one from the darkness of idolatry into the light of God's love is an abundant recompense, and would cause any true-hearted servants of Christ to rejoice in rather than regret any inconveniences and sacrifices involved.

I have no means for the support of European workers, but should welcome anyone coming out at his own charges, and able to arrange for his maintenance in some other way. £50 a year is quite sufficient to ensure a fairly comfortable style of life for a single man, who could make the food of the country his staple diet. Any friends desiring it may obtain full information respecting the Lord's work here by writing either direct to myself or to my sister, Miss Lampard, 114, Clapton-common, London, N.E.

A Message from America.

I AM sure the following from our beloved friend and brother, Major Whittle, will be interesting to many besides myself. It reached me in Cape Town on January 18, and will not appear until over two months after it was written; but its matter will not be the less valuable on that account. I do not think the writer will object to my giving his friends and mine the benefit of it, and I hope its personal references will not seem self-obtrusive on my part.

LETTER FROM MAJOR WHITTLE.

For many years you have been on my prayer list, and your work upon THE CHRISTIAN has been a part of my spiritual food since 1874. I can truly say that "I thank God for your fellowship in the Gospel from the first day until now." By-the-by, in my judgment, THE CHRISTIAN was never more ably conducted than just now. It is bright, readable, and spiritual. The report of Andrew Murray's "Quiet Days in East London," has been made a special blessing to my soul, and I have no doubt that thousands have had the same experience. I rejoice that you have aided this dear man of God, who is being so used in our day to awaken the churches to spiritual life. I saw years ago the expression in one of his books, that the Son of God took upon Him, or became connected with, our "fallen nature," and regarded it as very unfortunate, and was prejudiced by it. But we must not, after his letter to you disclaiming all thought of what might be implied from the phrase, allow his testimony to truth to be weakened by any withdrawal of confidence. I bless God over and over again for what those addresses at Mile End have been to me. The reading of them has stirred me, and led me nearer (it seems to me) to the Lord Jesus Christ than I have ever been before. I have before me the words, "Separated unto the Holy Ghost," and God speaks by them to my soul.

You ask as to evidence of blessing in America, from the visit of these two dear brethren.* It abounds on every hand, in the deeper spirituality and desire for true humility, on the part of ministers, evangelists, and lay workers who were brought in contact with them. There has never been a time in my experience in Christian work in America, when there was so much teaching as now about the Holy Ghost, and so much direct prayer on the part of believers to know more of what it means to be "filled with the Spirit." The remarkable book of dear Dr. Gordon on "The Ministry of the Spirit," and the teaching of Rev. F. B. Meyer in his visits to this country, with the addresses of Messrs. Brookes, Chapman, Moody, Needham, Pierson, Simpson, Torrey and others on the same line have contributed to this result.

I think the prevailing interest on this line of more consecrated Christian living may be indicated by the fact that in nearly every place where I have laboured during the past year (Mercer, Penn.; Piqua, Ohio; Syracuse, N.Y.; Cincinnati, O.; Kalamazoo, Mich.) I have held a convention to consider the topic, "The need of the Holy Ghost for Christian life and service," and blessing has invariably followed. I think it likely that all our evangelists are more or less on the same line.

My experience (and the experience of fellow-workers is similar) is that communities as such are harder to move by our methods of Gospel work than formerly; that marked revivals, with large numbers of genuine conversions, are scarcer; and that there is no general or widespread awakening in the country at large. But on every hand there are blessed evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit calling out believers to holiness of life, and to consecration of heart to the Lord Jesus. The truth used for this purpose is on the line of dear

Mr. Murray's teaching, with the addition of the testimony of the Word to the return of our Lord Jesus, and of "our gathering together unto Him."

There is an increasing number in all of the churches who believe that we are in the last stage, and that an apostasy has set in, that is preparing the way for the speedy manifestation of Anti-Christ; and that the Spirit of God is working with holy energy and divine power to gather out Christ's people for the day-dawn that is at hand.

"Even so. Come quickly, Lord Jesus."

For the Sake of the Name.—3.

TWO other pictures I would have you look at, my reader, from this same factory, before we finish with it. This time we will go in at tea-time and take a glimpse into that room unobserved.

There is no talk or thought of service now. It is Christmas time, and to-night is a field night for the girls. They are going to have a rare good time. For weeks they have been collecting for to-day. Tinned lobsters and salmon, whisky, port, sherry, fruit, cakes, and other sweets, are being arranged by the two girls who are the M.C.'s for the occasion. At first sight every one seems to have entered into the fun, and to add their quota to the jokes and peals of laughter that resound through the room. But watching awhile, we detect a discordant note from a group in the centre, and hear some not very charitable remarks from the women who compose it.

"Well, you are a wet blanket, Liz! I'd be ashamed if I was you to spoil the fun like that. But there! that's you pious folks all over." "Just the same game you played on last Thursday." And so forth.

What is it all about? In the middle of the group stands a young girl, and she appears to be the focus of the raillery. A pale, delicate, quiet-looking girl, she is evidently having rather a mauvais quart d'heure. As she stands there facing the rest, one would hardly dream, if it were not for a few strong lines about the mouth, and for an inexpressible something in the eyes, that she would stand out very long against any of her mates. The present apple of discord is the wine, which in a few minutes will go the round of the room. "I won't help towards buying brandy and that stuff," we hear her say. "It isn't right. I'll give my share for something else, that you shan't say I backed out of it, but I won't join in this, and in buying spirits for us girls."

So she stands fire, and at last the others, knowing theirs is a hopeless job, leave her to her cranks and crazes.

"What was Lizzie's offence last Thursday that you flung at her?" we inquire afterwards from one of the girls.

"Oh, only this," is the reply we get; "we had a sweepstake, and she would not join; she never will in any of the bets. There's a clerk that comes in and takes what we put on a horse, and we won half-a-crown each the other day, all but 'Liz, who's got converted or something, and won't bet now—the mean thing." Poor Liz! We got a little talk with her afterwards, and she confesses how hard it is day after day not to give in for the sake of peace and quiet, how the taunts do hurt even now, and how some of the girls try to force the spirits into her mouth to make her break her pledge. But withal there is a triumphant ring in her voice as she adds, "I've got something better than they have, though, and Christ comes and helps me."

We do not say much, but before our mind there rises the vision of a great company who out of weakness are made strong, and among them is surely our friend Liz.

One other glimpse, and we will come away. This time we will pass into another of the women's rooms. Here the air is altogether calmer; the girls, we learn, have more difficult work, and they are more or less skilled workers. Perhaps that is partly the reason why they are quieter and more self-restrained in their manner; several, too, we learn, are Christians, and it is to a party of these and to some project they have in hand that we will turn our attention. One of their number has a written list in her hand, and is checking off various payments. One by one the girls about her have handed in their threepences, and, this over, the business of drawing lots commences. "It's your turn first, Sally," she remarks as a girl by her side draws from the hat a slip of paper marked one. "I'm number two," breaks in another; "And I'm third," "And I'm fourth," and so the chorus of voices goes on.

What are they doing? "Only a club she's holding" is the answer we obtain, and apparently it is just nothing more than one of those innumerable clubs which girls have such a keen relish for. A day or two later we are visiting in a tiny room a sick woman. Bare and wretched enough is her abode, and she herself incurably ill is a sad enough sight. But she brightens up as we ask her how she manages in her trouble, and says it is all right for the next ten weeks, thank God. Why? "Oh, there is the mite from the parish, and then there is the money from the girls." The secret is out, and by degrees we learn it all. Our friend who was holding the club had come to know the state of this home and the want of its occupant. She herself was poor enough in all conscience, but this sister was poorer still; and so, as the latter is clever with string work, she will make some string baskets for the girls, and she will get eight of them to join in a club and take them in that way. By paying threepence each for ten weeks, each girl will pay in altogether half-a-crown, and as eight of them have joined every week, she can forward to this woman two shillings a week for the next ten weeks. The girl who drew lot No. 1 will have her string basket the first, and the one who drew No. 8 will have her's last, but both will pay the same amount in the end, despite their turn.

It was a lovely thought of these girls, we think, as we say good-bye, and are out in the street again. The club-holder herself would not tell us of her scheme. She looked on it as a very ordinary sort of arrangement, but to us behind the ordinariness of the plan, behind its commonplace, we seem to see a faint endeavour, clumsy and poor it may be, but still an endeavour, to obey the command, "Love as I have loved you," and it has all been done for "the sake of the Name." The Walworth Crèche.

A WORD FROM THE NURSE.

WHAT could claim our pity more than a little half-starved, pinched-up, shivering baby? The father is lazy and the mother a drunkard. They had a good home once, and have brought all their troubles on themselves. The poor babe cannot help it. The Walworth Crèche is in its first winter, but it can record pitiful tales of misery and want. In the morning a mother will say, "Give him something to eat, nurse, he's had no breakfast; we've neither food nor fire." Twelve hours after the tale is, "I've bin all round, but there's no hands wanted anywhere. Take this 2d., it'll pay for baby; I got that for cleaning a step." Who could take the hardly-earned pittance—though the funds are low and the crèche coal cellar empty?

One's heart aches for the poor coster who brings his motherless bairns on his barrow; for the consumptive-looking man whose wife has left him with three; and for the weary woman bread-winner whose sleepy twins are the last called for, and who, as she bids you good night says, "I hope he's out; he knocked me down before I started this morning, and said he'd do for me to-night. It's not myself, nurse, I care about, it's these children." One wonders sometimes how the slum babies of Walworth fared before we opened. We are striving to do our best, not only for them, but for their mothers and fathers also. We can exercise sympathy, but sympathy in these cases must be practical. The hon. superintendent is Mrs. F. Kingborne, of Richmond-street Mission, and 18, Wilson-road, Camberwell.

Polytechnic Christian Mission.

THE "Poly" has become famous as a hive of young life and educational activity, but it is also a great centre of Christian efforts, springing from the zeal and devotion of young converts. These distinct operations formed some time ago the above union for mutual helpfulness, and of this the anniversary was held on Monday night in the large hall, which was crowded.

The feature of the evening was "five-minute reports" by secretaries of different societies, including Tract Band (100 workers), Christian Endeavour (seventy members), Sunday Services Helpers, Christmas Dinner Fund, Temperance Society, Dorcas Society, Holiday-by-Proxy Fund (sending poor people to the seaside), Bible classes, Lantern Mission, open-air workers, and the Princess Theatre services, each of these carrying on, in some definite direction, real and useful work.

As to the theatre services, the report showed that the season which closes on Sunday week began on October 22. The theatre has been crowded at each service, and more than once multitudes have had to be refused admission. These hosts have been mainly young men and women not in the habit of going to church or chapel. The dissolving views accompanying the preaching have proved of great service as setting the Gospel before the eye as well as the ear. Mr. Nix has preached each evening with great power and grip. As regards results much fruit has appeared. Some evenings as many as fifty, sixty, or 100 have made a profession. The scene at the close of the service is of a most interesting character. God is using these services to win many.

Mr. T. A. DENNY, who presided at the anniversary, spoke briefly. The address of the evening was, however, that by the honoured founder, Mr. QUINTIN HOGG, who said that from the first the principle of the "Poly" had been, not to limit itself to one line of work, but to touch the different sides of a young man's being. There were, already, various institutions dealing with the physical, intellectual, social, and religious; but none which touched all, and this has been the aim of the "Poly" from the start. The importance of the work is evidenced from the fact that here there is a greater constituency of young fellows than in any University, College, or School. What a tremendous responsibility! Those who do most have realised most fully how little after all they are doing. But let them remember that God uses the small things. Even this great work sprang from a meeting of two crossing-sweepers and a boy of eighteen. God has used it in a way that filled its founder with humble thankfulness. It has been to many as a new start in life. It has laid the foundation in tens of thousands of character and usefulness. But above all it has brought thousands of young people face to face with God's love and God's salvation. Coming home three weeks ago from the West Indies, one of the first letters he received was from a mother rejoicing over her boy, who came to the "Poly" for education, and found something of which he had never dreamt, even life in the Lord Jesus Christ. Results such as that were worth all the cost and toil expended on the Institution from the outset.

Lady Hope, Dr. Lunn, and Mr. Josiah Nix also gave brief addresses, rejoicing in the work going on, and in the consequent training of many young people in practical Christian service.

A Munificent Gift.—Mrs. Symonds, who recently handed over the gift of £20,000 to the Cumberland Infirmary, has made a further benefaction to the Church of England in the Penrith district. She has vested £2000 in 2½ per cent. Consols, and £750 in India 3½ per cents. The trustees are to spend the income from the capital in "providing suitable rooms in which to hold and carry on mission meetings, Bible classes, and religious services in connection or in conformity with the Church of England; lectures or other kindred objects in certain parishes in Cumberland and Westmoreland; in employing a Biblewoman or Biblewomen, nurse or nurses; and if the local trustees think fit any other suitable person or persons to spread a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures in the said parishes, and generally to carry out the objects aforesaid; in purchasing and distributing in the parishes aforesaid Bibles, Testaments, religious books, and tracts, and other Christian, religious, and instructive literature."

Dr. A. T. Pierson.

AS INTIMATED in previous issues, Dr. Pierson has been engaged since the Liverpool Students' Convention delivering addresses in different places throughout the country. The subjects dealt with include: "The Inspiration, Authority, and Sufficiency of Holy Scripture"; "The Holy Spirit: Person, Office, and Work"; "The Secrets of Spiritual Life and Victory over Sin"; "The Blessed Hope of the Lord's Coming"; "Christian Missions and Systematic Giving."

The first place visited was Southport, where deep and sustained interest was aroused. The same might be said of the subsequent meetings at Cardiff, Hereford, Brecon, Newport, Abergavenny, and other places in South Wales. Many friends in these places are now following Dr. Pierson with their prayers, as he proceeds on his mission.

Meetings were held in Cambridge Feb. 9-12. On the Sabbath Dr. Pierson preached impressively to two crowded congregations in the city. On the three following days addresses were given, afternoon and evening, in the Guildhall. Mr. C. T. Studd took part in the speaking, and great missionary interest was the outcome of the gatherings. Students from the University attended in large numbers. Two days' meetings at Colchester were held in the end of last week. Dr. Pierson is now holding a series of meetings in Oxford, and will spend a month in Ireland, commencing in Dublin on Sabbath next.

Christians in Mesopotamia.

A PATHETIC and powerful appeal for immediate succour has been addressed to us by the senior American missionary in Mesopotamia on behalf of the Christians of the old Syrian Church; the substance of it is as follows:—

Their chief city, Mardin, and their Patriarch's seat, "are still safe," having been energetically defended by them, with the help of all their Moslem fellow-citizens and of the Turkish authorities, against a determined attack by a horde of Kurds, who swept down upon them after their fights with Armenians to the north. The Kurds, baffled by the union of Moslem and Christian, and enraged at being beaten off, attacked the surrounding villages and killed those who resisted being plundered, and burned many villages.

It is not yet in Mesopotamia a question of religion as between Moslems and Christians, as it has become in Asia Minor, but the danger is imminent that "if allowed to continue it will soon become so, and spread to these regions also." Be it ours to rescue the survivors from perishing of winter cold (now very severe in the highlands) and of starvation. They deserve help as innocent Christians and law-abiding subjects. E. A. FINN, Hon. Sec.

Union in Evangelism.

AN encouraging attempt at union in Gospel work was fully successful last week at Birmingham. A general canvass had demonstrated that more than a hundred thousand people attended no place of worship. The city was divided into districts, each of which was carefully visited. The work was undertaken by the congregations and ministers of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, Wesleyan, and Primitive Methodist churches.

About twenty missionaries of various denominations were invited from a distance to combine with the local pastors and other workers. Besides some preparatory services on Sunday week, two services were held daily on the following Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday afternoon and evening in thirty different churches, which were mostly crowded. The sermons and addresses were purely evangelistic, aiming at conversion and holiness. At these after-services nearly two thousand persons held up their hands in confession and for prayer. The utmost harmony prevailed, and no one, from anything done and said, could suppose that those engaged were not all members of one church, as they evidently were zealous for one and the same object—the salvation of souls. Why may not such union be still wider, and be still more calculated to convince the unbeliever, and win wanderers to the fold? H.

United Mission in Sheffield.

THE well-known evangelist, Rev. John McNeill, has concluded a fifteen days' mission in Sheffield, February 2 to 16. From the beginning the meetings were crowded, and the interest was not only sustained but greatly increased. The Albert Hall, which will seat about 3000 persons, was packed night after night; while on Sundays, in addition to a large afternoon meeting, the Empire Palace was densely filled with some 4000 persons. About an equal number were unable to obtain admission.

A special feature of the mission was the midday talk to business men, held from 12.30 to 1.15. Straight from the office and the workshop nearly 1000 men assembled daily in the body of the Albert Hall, and followed with close attention the powerful words of the missionary. Many ladies availed themselves of the balcony, which was set apart on these occasions for their use. Mention must be made also of a deeply spiritual meeting for men only in the Montgomery Hall, when many surrendered themselves to Christ. Mr. McNeill preaches the old, old story, and, blessed by God's Spirit, his words come home with a freshness and power which rivets the attention of the hearers. In his hands the histories of David, Daniel, Ruth, Zacchæus, the miracles and parables of our Lord, are applied to the needs of the human soul by the great spiritual truths which underlie them.

The arrangements for the Mission were made by the Y.M.C.A. through Mr. Walter Jervis, the secretary; clergy and ministers of all denominations entered heartily also into the work. We believe that many persons will ever thank God for the visit to Sheffield of John McNeill, their lives testifying to the reality of their newly found faith. P.

The Atonement.

PREBENDARY REYNOLDS, in the course of his weekly Higher Science lecture at SS. Anne and Agnes, Gresham-street, on Wednesday, said:—

Christ's Atonement is the wonder-mark of the Gospel of the world's redemption. His life is the gold given for our salvation, the price of our admittance into heaven. On one side of the coin is, "He died for us willingly"; on the other, "God laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Christ is that Seed, which, buried in the earth as dead, sprang up again, grew higher than the stars, and now bears fruit in heaven.

There was no other than our blessed Saviour who could take away our sin, free us from every spot and wrinkle of defect, and lead us to life and habitations of glory; therefore God gave his Son to be made sin that He, taking away our sin, might give us righteousness. This wonderful love in dying for us quickens our love; we turn from sin, die to sin, live to righteousness.

Scripture is full of it. The sacrifices were symbols of it. The ceremonies were preparations for it. The commandments required it. Isaac foreshows the Son of the Father; the Paschal Lamb antitypes the Lamb of God. The devil wrought the apostasy, but God won us back by a greater deliverance than that from Egypt—even from the second death, giving happiness and life for ever. Creation is the miracle of nature. Redemption is the miracle of salvation.

Delagoa Bay.—The Portuguese Local Government have expelled the Protestant missionaries, all of whom are of Swiss nationality, from Delagoa Bay. The president of the Missions Society has protested against this action to the Federal Council.

Japanese in London.—I am informed by the Secretary of Japanese Embassy that seventy men-of-war's men from Japan are now in the East-End. It is of the greatest importance that steps should be taken to supply them with Gospels and Testaments. Mrs. Robertson, hon. secretary of the Society for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures, Chesils, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, will be glad to receive help for this object, or the portions may be obtained direct from the Bible Society. No doubt some of your readers will be glad to contribute.

International S.S. Lessons.

March 1.

JESUS THE MESSIAH.—Luke ix. 18-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Verse 35.

CESAREA PHILIPPI, where this conversation took place (see Matt.), was situated some thirty miles north of the Sea of Galilee, near one of the sources of the Jordan, and just under Mount Hermon. It was enlarged and beautified by Philip the Tetrarch, who named it after himself and his master, Tiberius Cæsar.

A new era was being reached in our Lord's ministry. Galilee, where his mighty works were done, had rejected Him. He was soon to commence his journey toward Jerusalem, there to be rejected and put to death (22, 51). The occasion calls for a clearer revelation of his Messiahship, and of his sufferings as the way to his glory. Our Lord's habit of making every crisis the occasion of special prayer (18) is an example to us.

The points of the lesson are two:—I. THE IMPORTANCE OF THINKING RIGHTLY OF JESUS (18-22). What is Jesus to us? There is no question upon which such important issues depend. "As a man thinketh in his heart" toward Jesus, "so is he." Your present relation to God, your eternal welfare, depend upon this.

A man who professes never to think of Christ at all, and to have formed no estimate of Him, says in effect that Christ is not worthy of a moment's serious thought. He thus ranks Himself with those who "despise and reject" the Son of God. If those who treat the Saviour thus would only say deliberately, "I utterly ignore and despise Jesus as beneath my notice," they might be startled out of their guilt. In these days of formality and thoughtlessness this is a sin into which many may drift.

The people were not so bad as this. Their estimate of Jesus was very complimentary (19). They saw in Him something so far beyond others that they could only compare Him to the Baptist risen from the dead, or the greatest of the Old Testament prophets returned to earth. It was good to go so far, but it was not far enough either to do honour to Him, or to bless themselves. What we want is not a great teacher, or a fearless prophet, but a divine Saviour, dying to atone for sin, and rising again from the grave. As such He claims to be received; only when we receive Him as such have we life through Him.

It seems strange that the people should not have gone farther. Their interest was so far aroused that they might have compared the facts of the life of Jesus with prophecy, and so have discovered his Messiahship. They had light enough to obtain more, if they had used aright what they had.

Peter's confession (20) is in striking contrast. The cause of Christ had never seemed at so low an ebb as just then. The enthusiasm which men had felt for him had changed to bitter opposition and rejection. It required confident faith and great courage to confess that one whose work seemed such a failure was the Messiah! Even Peter's faith failed when our Lord predicted a further humiliation and apparent failure awaiting Him at Jerusalem (22), and he received a well-merited rebuke (Matthew). But that rebuke must not make us overlook the splendid courage manifest in this confession. Imitate him in this. Identify yourself with Christ even when He seems to be in the minority. The future is with Him, and with those who confess Him before men. Press the inquiry—What do you "say" of Jesus?

II. RIGHT OPINIONS OF JESUS MUST LEAD TO RIGHT CONDUCT (23-27).—The profession that He is the Christ must lead to likeness to Him. Saying must be followed by doing.

And the feature that must characterise the true disciple is exactly that at which Peter stumbled. He could not see the reason for the cross either in Christ or in himself. Why not have the triumph without it? But God's way to life is through death—to glory is through suffering. And turning to us He says:—"You must accept my way, and like Me must die in order to live."

What a hard word that seems! Self-gratification is so natural to us. To do what we please seems necessary to our happiness. To deny self is to say of it, as Peter of Jesus, "I don't know the man." The cross is always the emblem of death. To take up the cross is to be willing to die to our own will and to accept God's, which is so much better than ours. Each one has "his cross"—the size and weight and character of it are peculiarly suited to himself. Any change would mean loss and difficulty. He must bear it "daily" (23). Continual dying is needful to continual living. The little things in which we may die to self are constantly meeting us. Shame (26) is one great hindrance. We are not willing to die to the good name of others, and to share reproach with Jesus. How can we hope to reign with Him if we do not suffer?

Highgate Road Chapel.

UNDER the leadership of Mr. James Stephens, M.A., Highgate-road Baptist Chapel has become generally recognised as an important centre of evangelistic and missionary activity. Not only do many valuable missions in poorer districts draw some of their best workers from this congregation, but the church itself carries on directly, in Kentish Town and other needy North London corners, thriving little missions. Nor is this all, for the missionary spirit is alive and active. Foreign missionaries are always welcome; missions are well supported, and many members have given themselves to service among the heathen. It is fully acknowledged that, under God, much of this is due to the spiritual and faithful Bible ministry of the beloved pastor.

At the nineteenth anniversary gathering about 400 members and other friends partook of tea. The public meeting, presided over by the pastor, was more largely attended than on any previous occasion. The church secretary reported that seventy-six had been added to the fellowship during 1895, of whom thirty-three had made a profession of faith for the first time. The present number of members was 679. There were 661 scholars in the Sunday-schools. The venerable treasurer, Mr. James Coxeter, presented a most satisfactory balance-sheet, which showed that about £680 had been contributed for foreign and continental missions during the year. The principle of giving adopted from the commencement of the pastorate of Mr. Stephens has been purely voluntary, all claims being met by free-will offerings in boxes placed at the doors of the chapel.

The chief event of the year has been the providing a new mission hall in Falkland-road, which was opened last month free of debt.

Pastor Thomas Spurgeon addressed the meeting in a telling, racy, helpful manner on "Holding on," "Holding fast," and "Holding forth," as enforced by the Word of God. Pastor G. D. Hooper also spoke most helpfully on the Worship, the Witness, and the Work of a Christian church. The meeting was a crowded one, and gave cause for much thankfulness and encouragement.

Leeds Wesleyan Mission.

THE anniversary of Oxford-place, one of the three centres of the Leeds Mission, was held last week. This large chapel, seating 2500, had in earlier days been a great centre of activity, but in recent years dwindled away owing to the movement of the city population. In these circumstances Rev. Samuel Chadwick undertook to work the chapel on "Forward" lines, and the result so far has been surprising. Mr. Chadwick has a special gift, undoubtedly, for handling these great North country populations. Every Sunday night the great chapel is well filled. A large proportion of the people are men, and chiefly of the non-church-going class. When the chapel was lately being cleaned, service was held for three Sunday nights in the Coliseum, which seats more than 4000. Each night it was crowded to the doors long before the time of service. The financial requirements are not excessive. There was a debt on the year of £68, and an old loan to the Chapel Committee. Altogether Mr. Chadwick asked for £200, and on anniversary night he got all he asked. The report tells of prayerful, plodding work. Many had professed conversion. Several new classes had been formed which were centres of great spiritual enthusiasm and life. The Bible-class, with 500 members, was a success.

Dr. R. F. Horton, who preached in the afternoon, spoke at the evening meeting with great force and fervour. Referring to Purcell's "Life of Cardinal Manning," he said that in spite of the antagonistic criticisms of Cardinal Vaughan, there were certain incontrovertible facts made known, which ought to make it impossible that they should be overwhelmed by the onrush and revival of Romanism at the present time. They were on the eve of a great conflict, and within the next thirty years the young men and women of to-day would be called on to decide as to whether the New Testament was to be read in the light of the Church of Christ or of St. Peter at Rome.

Requests for Prayer.—For Dr. Pierson's meetings this week at Oxford.—For special work among the young people in Doune Free Church.—For Gipsy Smith's meetings in America.—For an outpouring of the Spirit on a young women's meeting in Edinburgh.—For blessing on a ten days' mission, at Twodales Wesleyan Chapel, near Matlock, commencing Sunday, February 23rd, conducted by Miss Parker.—For a Mission to be held at St. Thomas, Lambeth, on March 9th to 15th, by Rev. W. R. Mowll.—Praise.—For answered prayer in the village of Whitellets, Ayrshire.

The C.M.S. in Africa.

THE Church Missionary Society has issued a statement regarding the missions in Africa. It is calculated that there are in Africa 1,000,000 Protestant native adherents, of whom over 100,000 are communicants, more than 1200 European missionaries, and some 1000 mission stations. It is further stated that during the seven years 1888-95 the number of converts and communicants in Uganda has practically doubled year by year. The number of adult baptisms in Uganda in 1894 was over 1000. Some of the heathen in that country say that baptism consists "in making an incision in the head and rubbing in a powerful medicine which kills the old heart, and then there comes in its place a new religious heart that does not lust for anything." During the great persecution of 1886 in Uganda the native Christians exhorted one another with the words, "Be willing to die rather than deny." More than 200 Protestants and Roman Catholics lost their lives because of their faith. The Christians of Uganda have sent twenty-one missionaries to foreign lands—i.e., to tribes outside Uganda. In the report of the late Sir Gerald Portal on Uganda, dated November 1, 1893, one of the factors of the question is said to be "the firm hold taken by Christianity on the country." In regard to West Africa it is pointed out that seventy-five years ago the darkest heathenism prevailed in Sierra Leone, whereas now there is a self-supporting native Church with its own missionary society. At Bonny, on the West Coast, a church, to build which the natives gave £2000, now stands close to the spot where formerly was a heathen temple, part of the walls of which consisted of human skulls. Two native clergymen were consecrated in June, 1893, as assistant bishops in Western Equatorial Africa.

The Gospel in Spain.

In the latest report of the Association for the Diffusion of the Gospel in Spain, Mr. Armstrong gives an account of work at Barcelona, Valladolid, and other places. He says:—

"The difficulties which impede the progress of the Gospel are ever increasing; the Romish priesthood, controlled by the Jesuits, and those controlled by orders from Rome, are once again more or less the governing power in this land, and the civil authorities bend to their influence. These are hard times for Spanish converts, especially in the villages. Contrary to the wish of the majority of the Spanish people, Spain has lost the God-given right of liberty for every man's conscience; at present there is a bare toleration, and which is ever becoming barer.

"To add to the poverty, misery, and sufferings of the people has come this Cuban war, the horrors of which are hidden by the military authorities. Alas! for the tens of thousands of young men, conscripts, forced to go to Cuba, a large proportion of whom will never return! Yellow fever and other diseases have already swept away thousands, utterly unprepared for eternity. Alas! for the desolate homes left behind in Spain, where are broken hearts, poverty, and starvation, since the bread-winners are gone! 'They have taken my three sons,' said a mourning mother, 'and the three are dead;' In a little Gospel meeting, chiefly of women, outside of Barcelona, I noticed a woman dressed in black, who was there for the first time. 'Are you a widow?' I asked. 'Yes, I am,' she replied; and then bursting into tears, she added: 'They have taken my son for Cuba. Oh, pray for him!'

"What will the end be for Spain? The cup of her national sins is rapidly filling up. So much for man's work. Let us turn to God's work. His work in Spain prospers. Let anyone who loves this people for God's sake, and has tact and common sense, enter the small towns, and especially the villages, and quietly tell of Jesus as the One who died for them, and bore their sins and sorrows and sicknesses, and is Himself the remedy for all, and some hearts will respond, because such a Gospel satisfies their felt needs."

Guernsey.—The members of the Moral Reform Union have petitioned Her Majesty's Privy Council against the recent decision of the Guernsey States of Deliberation to introduce what is practically the regulation of vice by a compulsory examination of women.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson says that Lord Salisbury "bowed the bishops out," but he cannot bow the temperance question out. Sir Wilfrid proposes that a Bill should be introduced during the coming Session simply providing that "it shall be made legal for the inhabitants to instruct the licensing justices in those instances where they object to having public-houses licensed, and for that instruction to be operative and imperative in the appointed area."

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Harlesden Association is arranging for meetings for the deepening of spiritual life on March 18, 19, and 20.

Tunbridge Wells annual meeting was very successful, and was attended by Lord Kinnaird, who delivered an address on the moral and spiritual training as an equipment for life.

At Eastbourne, twenty-two new members have been enrolled since the opening of the year, and the attendance at the Sunday afternoon Bible-class has risen to fifty-seven.

The annual meeting of the Penzance Association has been held during this week, and was attended by Sir George and Lady Williams, whose presence contributed greatly to both the interest and success of the proceedings.

At the annual meeting of the Plymouth Association, held on Thursday, Dr. Hingston, who presided, gave an address reviewing the progress of Y.M.C.A. work throughout the world. Mr. W. H. Roberts dealt specially with progress in the two western counties of England, that is in Devon and Cornwall, where great vigour is now being thrown into Y.M.C.A. work. Addresses followed by Sir George Williams, Mr. J. P. Goldsmith, and Rev. N. Vickers.

The annual International Social Reception was held on Thursday last at the Hackney Y.M.C.A., at the invitation of Mr. W. H. Seagram, who presided. Brief addresses were given by representatives of various nationalities, including Germany, United States, British Guiana, Africa, France, Switzerland, Holland, Persia, Palestine, Egypt, Poland, Wales, Scotland, and England. The local Y.M.C.A.'s were well represented.

An earnest effort is being made to resuscitate the Devizes Association, which has been in a difficult position. The Trowbridge Association is seeking to aid their brethren in the Wiltshire county town. At a "young men's social," held recently at Trowbridge, the attendance included thirty-four members, fourteen associates, and six outsiders. One of the latter has since joined and a second is expected. The Bible class and prayer meeting are engaging more interest.

Exmouth annual meeting, recently held in the public rooms, was well attended. The report recorded the most successful year's work since the Association was formed in 1889. The membership had increased, and all departments were vigorous and healthy. A series of men's meetings were afterwards held, addressed by Mr. Seagram, and many were led to decision for Christ. The attendance at the weekly Bible readings and devotional meetings has largely increased, and the blessing is spreading among the young men.

The February Association News is one of the brightest and most interesting numbers that we have seen. There are good portraits of the late Mons. A. André, of Paris, Mr. W. R. Lane, Mr. Howard Williams, and Lord Overton, with cuts of the new Association buildings at Kirkealdy and Newcastle. The literary matter is also excellent. The tone of thankful courage revealed in the leading article, "A New Era," will, we hope, be contagious through the Associations. The first instalment is given of a thoughtful and timely paper on "The Baptism of the Spirit."

A meeting has just been held in Tientsin (at which were present over 100 English-speaking Chinese students, from all parts of the Empire, pupils of the four great institutions of this place) to welcome Mr. D. W. Lyon, who has been sent to China as the representative of the American Y.M.C.A. executive, for the purpose of organising Y.M.C.A. work there. The remarkable success of the Association student movement in Japan, and the great promise afforded by the early stages of the same enterprise in India, attach particular significance to this commencement of Y.M.C.A. collegiate work in China. It is felt that, rightly directed, the results of this movement may be far-reaching and important.

Upwards of seventy representatives from the Clapham, Clapham Junction, Kennington, Southwark, Croydon, and other South London Associations, assembled for conference at the rooms of the Clapham Association on the 12th. inst. The reports of work presented from the different centres showed that much earnest and aggressive effort is being maintained both within and outside the Associations. Bible class work is carried on with great success at Clapham and at Clapham Junction, there being an average attendance of sixty young men at each class. Croydon, too, reported an excellent work in all departments. Southwark has a home for young men, which meets a felt need. Kennington is the centre of open-air effort, and of work among the poor at the Workhouse. A practical and useful discussion took place in regard to Association agencies, and the spirit and character of the meeting were such as to greatly encourage the workers.

The Y.W.C.A.

WORLD'S Y.W.C.A.

THE first annual meeting of the World's Y.W.C.A. Committee was held at the Morley Hall on Thursday, 13th inst., when visitors to the number of thirty or forty were present. Mrs. J. Herbert Tritton, the president, was in the chair. The treasurer, Miss Morley, presented a cash statement showing that England had contributed £300 and America £300 towards the initiation and carrying on of the work. Receipts had met expenditure, but soon the question of raising funds to continue the work which was opening would have to be considered. The reports which followed were unusually interesting. Miss Reynolds, general secretary, said that her report could only be considered a chapter of beginnings. Her visits to European cities had included Paris, Berlin, Copenhagen, and Stockholm. Much had been done in these places to encourage and strengthen the workers. Details were then given of work done in visiting the Cape, Tasmania, New Zealand, and Australia. The first Inter-colonial Conference at Sydney was expected to lead to important results. Miss Reynolds had travelled 38,434 miles. She urged that there is a great opportunity both in Europe and Asia for the World's Y.W.C.A. A report of the continental department was read by Mrs. Gardner James, and the Hon. Mrs. Waller read the report of the standing committee for other continents. Considering that the World's Y.W.C.A. is only sixteen months old, the record of work done is full of encouragement and promise. The meeting closed with prayer.

BRIEF NOTES.

The annual meeting of the Wigan branch was held on Wednesday, February 5. Mrs. Phillips presided. Miss J. Smith read the report, and a very satisfactory balance-sheet was presented by Miss Taylor.

A meeting, under the auspices of the Llanelly branch, was held at the Athenæum Hall, on the 4th inst., when Mr. W. Howell presided over a large audience. After a few remarks by the chairman, the Hon. Emily Kinnaird delivered a stirring address on the Y.W.C.A. Mrs. Jones, hon. sec., and Miss Taylor, an active worker in Llanelly, also spoke.

The annual meeting of the day-school teachers' branch of the Y.W.C.A. was held at Leeds on the 8th inst. Mrs. J. Hitch presided. The report showed that the members had increased from forty-seven to sixty-eight. The chairman spoke of the immense influence teachers possessed in the building up of children's characters and setting a good example.

An interesting and successful gathering of the Y.W.C.A.'s in and around Bristol was held in the Blind Asylum on Friday week. About 300 members sat down to tea, and the meeting which followed was conducted by Mrs. Neville Sherbrooke, president. Addresses were delivered by Miss Savill (on the motto of the Association) and by Revs. F. J. Horsefield and J. G. Mantle.

The first annual conversazione of the Girvan Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. was held on February 3, presided over by Dr. Valentine. Over 200 members attended. The chairman in his remarks drew attention to the valuable lessons to be deduced from the analogy between physical and spiritual life. Miss Todd gave some valuable hints gleaned from her work as travelling secretary of the Y.W.C.A. The institute has one member at Gibraltar—Miss Hannah.

The annual social meeting of the Bombay Y.W.C.A. was held on January 16. The hall was well filled with members and their lady friends. Through the indisposition of Mrs. Freeman, president, Mrs. Arnot, ex-president, took the chair. Mrs. Squire read the report, which showed increased activity in the various branches of the institution. Miss Freeman spoke of the site near the Town Hall as being suitable for the new home it is proposed to build for the Association. Miss Ramsay, the newly-elected secretary, gave an earnest address on Ex. xxxiii. 14. The Society's funds now amount to nearly Rs.15,000, towards which Lady Harris had generously given Rs.2060. The great and peculiar need is more workers; ladies who will give themselves wholly for the sake of the young women of India.

Cloudesley Institute having entered on its twenty-first year, a well-attended special meeting was held on the evening of Saturday, Feb. 8. The chair was taken by Mr. T. A. Denny, who has for many years evinced a warm interest in the place, and excellent addresses were given by Lady Hope, Revs. W. H. Barlow, J. A. Faithfull. A short statement was read by the hon. secretary, telling of continuous increase in numbers, and marked spiritual blessing on the Sunday and week-night Bible classes. The Christian members are zealous and steadfast helpers in every department of the work. S. T. P.

Irish Notes.

THE Assembly's Board of Missions has appointed a minister as an itinerant missionary for the province of Munster. For the present his sphere of labour is to be West Kerry.

Rev. W. B. Douglas, who had been for some time assistant to the late Rev. Dr. Moore, principal of the Irish Presbyterian College at Puerto Santa Maria, has been appointed Dr. Moore's successor as principal of that institution.

Rev. David Baron has paid a much-appreciated visit to Belfast in connection with his mission to the Jews. He addressed Willowfield and Albert-street Churches on the Sunday of his sojourn, and also gave a most interesting account of work amongst Israel in the hall of the Y.W.C.A. Mr. Baron called on a number of Jewish families during his brief stay in Belfast, and in almost every case had an attentive and willing hearing given him. Mr. Baron was to visit Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Tralee.

Scottish Notes.

THE annual meeting of the Scottish "Monthly Visitor" Tract Society (which originated through the efforts of David Naismith, sixty-three years ago) was lately held in the Queen-street Hall, Edinburgh, Sir James A. Russell presiding. The chairman expressed satisfaction at the evidently prudent management of the society, and emphasised the spiritual opportunities afforded by its plan of personal house-to-house distribution of The Visitor. The report showed an average monthly circulation of over 401,000, being a total for the year of 4,813,136. This year, Mr. John Hume, who has occupied the position of depositary for forty years, is succeeded by Mr. R. Henderson Smith (late Y.M.C.A. travelling secretary) as secretary. Interesting and stimulating addresses were delivered at the meeting by Revs. Geo. Wilson, Established Church, A. R. Henderson, Congregational Church, and R. J. Drummond, United Presbyterian.

The jubilee of the Students' Missionary Society of the United Presbyterian Church was celebrated on Tuesday week by a great missionary meeting in the Synod Hall, Edinburgh. Rev. Dr. Kinnear, Dalbeattie, said that during the past fifty years the Society had raised over £50,000 for missions. Dr. John Smith, Edinburgh, said their church had missions in every quarter of the globe, and their ordinary missionary and revenue income exceeded some £40,000. They had over £400,000 of invested funds. There were seventeen men in the hall ready to go out as missionaries whom the church could not send. Their church required more than anything else, the enthusiasm of a great example, the inspiration of great sacrifice, and it would rejoice the hearts of the church if that sacrifice came from the students. Dr. George Smith, Free Church Foreign Mission Society, said he would like to see the three Presbyterian Churches banding themselves together for work among the Mahomedans. He questioned if even the Scottish Church could have passed through such a persecution for eighteen centuries as the Armenian Church was now doing. Rev. Wardlaw Thompson, Secretary L.M.S., said the world was now broken up for a great forward mission work, and what was wanted was funds to enable the work to be carried on. Rev. Egerton R. Young spoke, and other addresses followed. A similar meeting was held in Glasgow.

Matamoros Gospel Hall, Malaga.

THE Matamoros Gospel Hall was opened on Sunday, Feb. 2, the day on which the Papal Nuncio invested the Bishop of Malaga with the pallium of Archbishop of Seville, and promulgated a Bull with indulgences.

The night was wet and stormy, so it needed goodwill and zeal for the poor of Malaga who love the Gospel to cross the swollen river to attend the opening; nevertheless, the hall, which holds 150 persons, was full. Pastor Vila, who directs the Spanish and Portuguese Aid Society's work in Malaga, took part in the service, as also did Señor E. Blanco, a young evangelist labouring at Granada, and others.

The Hall is free from debt, and it is hoped that those who have contributed to the building will help to support the work. Mr. W. Greene and I hold ourselves responsible for the right administration of the funds. The mother of Matamoros, who is feeble and tottering, has given of her substance to the raising of the Hall. She sat beside me at the meeting.

MARGARET BROWNE.

The date of the Crystal Palace Temperance Fête has been fixed for July 21.

Christian Endeavour.

THE National C.E. Council will open at Bristol on May 23.

Three denominations have Endeavour societies in every one of their churches in the district of Columbia.

The first convention of the United Societies of Wisbech and district shows that Endeavour is already strong in the Eastern counties.

Rev. W. Bainbridge, of Hull, head of the C.E. work of the Methodist New Connexion Union, is issuing a bright little eight-page Endeavour monthly.

Endeavourers in connection with the Crayford Baptist Chapel have a plan for sending suitable and useful books to missionaries in the foreign field. Details of the working of this capital idea may be had from the secretary, V. Blaker, Crayford, Kent.

Miss W. O. North states that at Tonbridge the Sunday-school Committee have taken up work which is proving to be helpful among the young people. Every other Sunday they arrange a class for Christian boys and girls and inquirers, which is held in one of the class-rooms for about half-an-hour after school in the afternoon, the object being to promote a useful Christian life among the young.

The Christian Endeavour Society in America is not satisfied to be anything less than a whole-hearted movement touching all sides of life. In Ohio and in other parts of the States, according to the Sunday at Home, a vow of citizenship has been adopted as follows: "Believing that my ballot is my testimony, and that as a Christian citizen I should make it witness for political righteousness, I record my vow that I will, whenever possible, attend the caucuses and primary, and demand the nomination of honest and capable men; that I will seek the divorce of national issues from municipal and State elections; that I will work for the extermination of the saloon; and will support for office for such men only as are in favour of righteous legislation and the impartial enforcement of the law."

The London Soldiers' Home.

THE anniversary of this Home, held on Friday week, was largely attended. Sir George H. Chubb, who presided, thanked all those who had assembled that day to celebrate the sixth anniversary of the Home, which was, he was glad to say, doing an excellent work, and meeting a felt need. As Methodists they recognised their duty to the State, and were doing their share in regard to civil, social, and religious work. Mr. Percy W. Pocock, as honorary treasurer, submitted particulars showing that subscriptions and donations amounting to £157 16s. 10d. had been received, which it was hoped to increase by another £40. Rev. R. W. Allen said that the Home was developing self-help, and announced that during the year sleeping accommodation had been provided for no less than 2400 men. Then came a most interesting speech from Major-General Lord Methuen, who spoke of the good which was being done by such a Home, as the best that could be done for the soldier, and bore testimony to its unsectarian character. Rev. Dr. Jenkins referred to the vast improvement he had observed in the morale of the Army since he first went to India, just fifty years ago. He was a man of peace, but he loved the British soldier. He urged that all who knew the work and success of that Home should spread the knowledge among their friends who were able to contribute to its support.

Bermondsey.—The good work carried on for eleven years in a small, ill-ventilated room in Weston-street, has had many difficulties to contend with. At length, however, a convenient little hall close by has been secured, to the great encouragement of the workers. This was opened last week, and much interest was awakened. It appeared that not a few present had been converted in the old room now abandoned. About £20 is needed to complete cost of fitting up, &c. The missionary is Mr. W. Narroway, 118, Weston-street, S.E.

Whitevale Shelter, Glasgow.—The much-needed additional rooms are now completed, and one of them, the quiet sick room, has already proved a great comfort. Quite a number hold a little prayer-meeting each day at the dinner-hour, and remain for prayer after the meeting on Sabbath afternoons. This interest in spiritual things is very cheering to the workers, and impresses the newcomers. Last week seven who had come during the fortnight remained for conversation, all of them women who had been led astray by strong drink. It is hard to prevent such from despairing of anything but a repetition of failure, yet we have faith to believe that their prayer for help reaches the heart of Him who is able to save to the uttermost.

Obituary.

DR. PETER BAYNE.

THIS veteran journalist, who was in his early days associated with Hugh Miller, has passed away at his residence in Upper Norwood. In addition to his life-long labours on the religious press, he published many books and essays, one of the best known being his "Life of Hugh Miller." A native of Ross-shire, he studied in Aberdeen for the ministry, but turned aside to literary work, in which he speedily made his mark.

MR. R. L. HAMILTON, J.P., BELFAST.

Sincere regret is felt in Belfast and the North of Ireland at the death of Mr. R. L. Hamilton, J.P., of Belfast, who has been called away after a few days illness, at the age of seventy. Deceased was a son of Captain Hamilton, of Shankill, co. Monaghan, and came to Belfast several years ago, and at once began to take an active interest in all kinds of Christian work. He established a Bible class for young men, which was largely attended, and through his influence mainly the large suite of rooms known as Clarence Place Hall, and which cost about £20,000, was built and paid for. Deceased was a leading member of the Church of Ireland, a thoroughly evangelical man, and a helper in almost every good work. For many years he was one of the most prominent figures in the religious business life of Belfast, and his loss is deplored by all creeds and classes.

DR. TALBOT W. CHAMBERS, NEW YORK.

By the death of Dr. Talbot W. Chambers, America loses one of her most influential theologians. One of the oldest and most highly respected Presbyterian ministers in New York, Dr. Chambers was known to many in Great Britain from his long connection with the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance, in which he took a very lively interest. As a writer he contributed frequently to several of the reviews and journals; he was a member of the Old Testament Revision Company of America, and published in 1885 a "Companion to the Revised Version of the Old Testament." He was sound in the faith, and abundant in labours. In 1892 he was appointed president of the General Presbyterian Alliance, and it would have fallen to him in that capacity to open the council at Glasgow next June and preside generally over the Alliance. Dr. Chambers was in his seventy-seventh year.

REV. J. G. MIALL.

One of the oldest Congregational ministers in the North, and the oldest ex-chairman of the Congregational Union, with the solitary exception of the venerable Dr. Stoughton, has passed away in Rev. James Goodeve Miall. Having reached the age of ninety, his recollections went back to the stirring events in the early part of this century, for at Poole he saw the Scots Greys embark for Belgium shortly before the battle of Waterloo. Trained at the Theological Academy, Hoxton, he was ordained at Framlingham, Suffolk, in 1826. Six years later he removed to St. Neots, and in 1837 to Bradford; the journey was taken at that time by post-chaise, and occupied three days. Mr. Miall's pastorate at Salem Chapel, Bradford, where he was succeeded by Rev. T. G. Horton (father of Rev. Dr. Horton), extended to nearly forty years. In 1861 he filled the chair of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Among the more substantial products of his pen were "Memorials of Christianity," and the "History of Congregationalism in Yorkshire."

M. ALFRED ANDRÉ, PARIS.

By the death of M. Alfred André, French Protestantism sustains a serious loss. A son of Mme. André-Walther, he was the head of a great banking house. He was brought up in the fear of God, and in politics and business, as well as religious life, sought to do the Divine will. He gave time and energy, as well as money, for the advancement of many varieties of Christian work, home and foreign; and occupied highly responsible positions in connection with the Reformed Church of France. The Young Men's Christian Association was very dear to his heart. He joined the Paris Association in 1861, and quite recently gave £12,000 to render its building free of debt. In December last he accepted the presidency of the National Council of the Y.M.C.A.'s of France.

M. André succumbed to an attack of influenza, at the age of sixty-eight. The Paris newspapers have told at length the story of his useful life, the religious journals being unanimous in deploring the great loss. M. Jean Bianquis, in the Protestant de Normandie, says: "M. André's activity is explained by his Evangelical faith. We have seen him in the home circle, presiding at family worship morning by morning, and in the presence of his servants strike up the Cantiques Populaires, several of which were from his own pen. M. André's homes in the city and in Switzerland were meeting places for Christians of all nations." In compliance with Mr. André's expressed wish, no eulogium was delivered over his tomb. He insisted that there should be nothing more than a Gospel appeal."

MR. CHAS. BUTTON, J.P.

With feelings of unfeigned sorrow (says The Hackney Gazette) we announce the death of Mr. Charles Button, the chairman of the Hackney Vestry, which occurred unexpectedly at his residence, 18, Gascoigne-road, South Hackney, last week. The deceased gentleman had been suffering from a cold for some few days, but no serious apprehensions were aroused. The patient passed quietly away in the presence of his wife and family. The sad news came as a great shock, and cast a gloom over the entire district of Hackney, where Mr. Button's name was a household word. By his kindness of heart, invariable courtesy, and unswerving integrity, he endeared himself to a wide circle of friends, and the great tact and ability he brought to bear upon his self-denying work in the public interest proved of inestimable value, and will be long remembered. For over twenty years Mr. Button was the official shorthand writer of the Probate and Divorce court. His public life in Hackney extended over a period of eighteen years. With conspicuous ability he discharged the duties of overseer and churchwarden, and about the commencement of last year was unanimously elected chairman of the new vestry. He took an active interest in religious and philanthropic work, being the hon. superintendent of the Homerton Evangelical Mission, in connection with which he held a very successful young men's Bible-class. The special religious services for the people at Morley Hall and elsewhere likewise claimed his generous support. It would be difficult to name any worthy cause to which Mr. Button did not give his encouragement and support, and while he will be sadly missed, his life will long remain an inspiration for good. At the sitting of the Probate and Divorce court following Mr. Button's death, Sir Francis Jeune and Mr. Justice Barnes referred in terms of deep regret to his death. The President said Mr. Button was a man of the highest possible integrity and the greatest industry, and had a sense of right and justice such as he had seldom met with. Sir F. Jeune was present at the funeral on Saturday afternoon, which was a public one and very largely attended.

Gregorian Armenians.—A Reuter telegram, dated Constantinople, February 15th, says: "From intelligence received here it appears that the Gregorian Armenians in the vilayet of Sivas are seriously considering the advisability of their conversion to Roman Catholicism in order to escape persecution and massacre. They argue that they see no prospect of Russian support, whereas the Catholic Armenians enjoy a certain amount of security in view of the fact that the Catholic institutions in Turkey are under the protection of France."

Mission to Lepers.—In a recent letter from India Mr. W. C. Bailey writes: "I have had the privilege of visiting the Home for Lepers in Mandalay, Upper Burma. In March, 1891, Rev. A. H. Bestall, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, gathered in the first four wretched lepers into that institution. Since then the work has gone on steadily, and there are now seventy-four inmates. Rev. W. R. Winston has been for a considerable time in charge. About forty lepers are professing Christians. I have also visited Rangoon, where I hope we have secured a site for an asylum at Insein, nine miles from Rangoon, where I trust ere long we shall have a Home for some of the unfortunate lepers, now rotting in the streets of Rangoon or lying on the steps of the great Pagoda. We shall need at least £300 to start a Home at Rangoon. Communications may be sent to me, at 17, Greenhill-place, Edinburgh."

The Sailors' "Welcome Home," Ratcliff Highway.—The report for last year says:—"The Home in Ratcliff-highway and the country branch in Epping Forest have been great blessings to many seamen of various nationalities, who have stayed with us at intervals, whilst looking out for employment. The coffee-room, which stands as a lighthouse to warn passing sailors of the dangerous rocks, as the public and other houses round about might be called, has done its quiet and effectual work. Our fo'c's'le, used for Gospel and Gospel temperance meetings, has been the scene of many interesting gatherings, amongst which are those in connection with the Christian Lifeboat Crew and the free suppers. At the monthly musters of the C.L.B.C. a text is given out on which those present generally speak, in addition to the accounts given of the work of the various branches in different parts of the world. The taking care of clothes, money, etc., the remitting of the same to friends, have been increasingly appreciated, and many are the letters of thanks received for these efforts." Communications should be addressed to Miss Child, Sailors' "Welcome Home," 173, St. George's-street, Ratcliff-highway, E.

Evangelistic Notes.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has closed a two weeks' mission at Geneva, N.Y. Deep interest was awakened, and many professed to receive blessing.

The Brothers Weaver are having many tokens of blessing on their work in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Queen's Park, Kilburn-lane, N.W. The mission closes on Thursday night.

Tralee, co. Kerry.—Mr. W. A. Boyd has held a mission in this town. From the first the Spirit was manifestly working, and at the close a large number of names were handed in as professing to trust the Saviour.

Ireland.—Evangelistic meetings have been held Magheragall Methodist Church, near Lisburn, by Rev. P. Martin and Mr. E. J. Johnson; similar meetings have been held in Sligo by Rev. John Good, and in Shinrone by Rev. W. T. Cairns.

Poplar.—Mrs. J. B. Horton and Miss Parker have concluded a ten days' mission at Poplar and Bromley Tabernacle. Many professed to accept Christ, and on the last night numbers of Christians as well as converts testified to having received much blessing.

Newton Abbot.—Mr. John B. Rochfort, of the Evangelisation Society, concluded on Sunday week a very successful fifteen days' mission at the Baptist Chapel, Newton Abbot. Much good has been done, both in reviving the believer at the Bible readings, and in the converting of sinners at the mission services, many having professed conversion. S. L.

Bayswater.—Mr. W. R. Lane has, during the past week, conducted a five days' mission in the Church Room, Moscow-road, in connection with the parish of St. Matthew's, Bayswater. Much blessing has crowned the effort. Mr. Lane addressed crowded meetings each evening; the attendance on Monday, February 10th, necessitated an overflow meeting in the lower room.

Grimsby.—A mission has been conducted in the Tabernacle, Grimsby, by Rev. C. B. Sawday, who is specially gifted in stirring up and stimulating God's own people. The services have been marked chiefly for their awakening power amongst believers, resulting in a great increase of spiritual fervour in the church. The meetings grew in interest, and were well attended throughout.

Basingstoke.—A fourteen days' mission has just been concluded in the Longcroft Mission Hall in this town, by Mr. G. London, of the Evangelisation Society, whose addresses made a deep impression upon saved and unsaved. Some professed faith in Christ, prejudice was broken down, unity among Christians promoted, and the meetings well attended, every available seat having been filled some nights.

Tundergarth, Lockerbie.—Mr. Robert Snaith, of Newcastle, has closed a three weeks' mission here. The meetings were the largest ever held in this scattered country district. God's presence was manifest at every meeting. Numbers of souls were dealt with, while some passed from death unto life. There was a real work of grace among the young, and there are tokens of changed lives and genuine witness for Jesus. G. H.

The Christian Instruction Society.—The evangelistic mission lately held at Coverdale Chapel, Limehouse, has been a distinct success. Mr. W. P. Crombie, evangelist, of Canada, was assisted by a number of brethren. Last week the mission at Burdett-road Congregational Church was conducted by Mr. Lawson Forster. The meetings were largely attended, and were a great blessing to Christians; others were led to yield up their hearts to the Saviour.

Johnstone, N.B.—The series of evangelistic services in the Good Templar Hall, Johnstone, which are being conducted by Mr. Thomas S. Metrusky, have been visited by remarkable revival power. Every Sunday night the large hall is filled by different classes of society to hear the plain Gospel of the grace of God. Many persons have been led during the past four months to Christ, and some of these have been rescued from the very depths of sin. Great joy is being experienced by God's people at such a token of his favour.

Eastbourne.—Mr. Newton Jones recently conducted a successful mission at Eastbourne. Services were held in the Congregational, Baptist, Wesleyan, and Presbyterian Churches, and were well-attended. As a result, many teachers have stated that they have been much encouraged, and that they will go to their classes in future with a new spirit and a determination to put more heart into their work. Many young people have also been impressed, and accessions of Church membership are confidently expected.

Canonbie, Langholm, N.B.—Miss Thompson, of Stanwix, Carlisle, conducted a four weeks' mission in a barn at Tod Clenchside on week nights, and in Rowanburn on Sabbaths. Every evening both places were filled to overflowing long before the services began. Many attended who were not in the habit of attending places of worship, and for miles round about the whole district was moved. Much blessing has been the outcome, and many have taken a decided stand for Jesus Christ. Personal dealing with the people in their homes was very much blessed. J. EDGAR.

Harpley, Norfolk.—Mr. C. Chenery, of the Evangelisation Society, has been conducting special services at the Gospel Hall, Harpley. A great awakening has spread through the whole district. Large congregations have been gathered night by night for the past three weeks, while numbers have professed to receive Christ. One of the peculiar features of the revival has been the united spirit of prayer. The power has been such that it has often been impossible to close the meetings before 10 o'clock. On one occasion, after the lights were extinguished, a second meeting had to be held, several young men returning to seek the Lord.

Personalia.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey has gone to the Pacific coast to hold a two months' series of meetings. He will be assisted by Mr. George C. Stebbins.

Mr. Richard Weaver is somewhat better. He is thankful for sympathy in prayer, and trusts many will continue to plead on his behalf.

Rev. Dr. Talmage, who lately went to Washington to assist in the First Presbyterian Church, has now become the pastor of the church, his co-pastor having resigned.

Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., the President of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, is laid aside by a temporary disability, occasioned by overwork, and has been ordered to take complete rest. He has, therefore, been compelled to cancel all engagements for the present.

The Dale Memorial.—Principal Fairbairn announces that about £4000 has been received for the memorial to the late Dr. R. W. Dale. Besides the public statue, it is intended to found a lectureship on the model of the Bampton lectures. Probably the specified subject for the lectures will be that which is associated most intimately with his name, the doctrine of the Atonement.

Mrs. Grimke writes: "The Lord has led me to seek favourable air and brought me along the Riviera to Rome. Here an attack of lung congestion, which unknown to me had probably begun in England, has culminated in severe illness. By God's blessing on the means used, there are now good hopes of restored health. I hear of fourteen cases of text cards, with new languages, having arrived since I left (490,000 cards). A letter from Miss Annie Taylor has followed me with blessed news of their work and value, and of course like many others asking for additional supplies. Ask the Lord to raise me up, and to send me abundant means to pour out these small but living streams to refresh the sin-stricken world."

Mr. J. E. Budgett Meakin writes from Basra, on the Tigris:—"I spent a very busy seven months throughout India last summer, visiting seventy-two of the chief places, and covering over 11,000 miles, passing fifty-six nights in the train." Since then I have had two months in Persia, and now I am sailing up the Tigris to Bagdad, whence I hope to cross to Damascus and Jerusalem. All through I have been blessed with the best of health and with exceptional facilities for travel, as well as in obtaining information. I have been peculiarly impressed with the needs and opportunities of special men and women among the English-speaking students of India, and may possibly return there next winter, after visiting Madagascar, Zanzibar, the Cape, New Zealand, and Australia."

A "Revised" Bible.—The Board of Education of Chicago has now completed its abridged Bible for the use of schools. The committee who have had charge of the work have expunged all passages or incidents which seemed to them unsuited for the young. This "revised version" of the Bible has been in preparation for some years. It contains only two prayers, one being the Lord's Prayer, which is set to music. The twenty-third Psalm also finds a place in it. The Song of Solomon is entirely omitted, as are also the stories of Jacob and Sarah. The Psalms have been greatly cut, so that only terse extracts appear. The story of Joseph has been treated serially, each incident being narrated in a separate chapter. The Potiphar episode is left out. This abridged Bible opens with the thirtieth and thirty-first verses of the twelfth chapter of the Gospel according to St. Mark, followed by the tenth chapter of the same Gospel. Then come the Proverbs, the Book of Job, and the other selected passages. The whole volume consists only of 200 pages of large print.

Temperance Notes.

PROHIBITION has won a notable victory in the Manitoba elections. Out of thirty-nine constituencies voting recently, thirty-two returned representatives pledged to Prohibition.

The Bishop of Winchester, speaking at Aldershot, said he was one of the deputation to Lord Salisbury, and he must own that they did not receive as warm a welcome as they expected.

Mr. Robert Lewis, district agent of the North of England Temperance League at Workington, has been appointed secretary of the Manchester, Salford, and District Temperance Union.

The temperance party have got two Bills well to the front this year. One is the Scotch Liquor Veto Bill, and the other the English Sunday Closing Bill. Both these measures have obtained good positions, and are likely at least to reach a second reading.

Mr. Firth, a waste merchant of Huddersfield, who became an abstainer three years ago, resolved to obtain 1000 pledges last year, and did so in eleven months. He is now addressing meetings in pursuance of a plan to procure 10,000 pledges during the present year.

The consumption of absinthe in France is increasing at such a rate that a return has been issued by the Ministry of Finance. Men, as a rule, take the absinthe diluted with water, while women drink it neat. At the present moment there is one absinthe seller in Paris for every three houses.

Mr. John Morley, replying to a deputation at Arbroath, promised to vote for the extension of the ten o'clock closing hour for public-houses in the seven exempted Scotch towns, and for the second reading of the Local Veto Bill, leaving himself free to consider amendments on the question of compensation.

Dr. J. J. Atteridge, in a paper on abstinence, read before a large number of men in Sutherland-place, Bayswater, dismissed the theory that alcohol could be used as a food, and said that after a long study on this question he had come to the conclusion not only that alcohol was not a food, but that it was better outside than within the body.

The Berlin correspondent of The Times reports some remarkable statements as to the use of alcohol in German spheres of influence in Africa. The Evangelical Mission in the Cameroons report that in certain Government plantations in Victoria the native labourers receive on Saturdays a bottle of spirits as part of their wages. It seems that the price at which the bottles of spirits are reckoned enables the Government, when employing 200 men, to save 100 marks a week.

The Lever, giving an account of the first of a series of meetings in Chicago commenced in a Congregational church by Mr. Francis Murphy on Jan. 19, says:—"Mr. Murphy comes back with his old vigour. He is a bit whiter and a bit older in years, but his enthusiasm and magnetism are of the same power. He secured a large number of signers to his blue ribbon pledge at the conclusion of the service, and announced he would speak and have the best music in the city for ten more evenings at least. The church was filled."

On the afternoon of February 14 a crowded meeting was held at Grosvenor House, under the auspices of the Women's Total Abstinence Union. A paper, written by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, who was prevented by illness from attending, was read by Miss Docwra. Sir Benjamin declared that of all classes nurses were most in need of protection from alcohol, and nothing did so much to preserve their efficiency and good looks as total abstinence. He advocated the establishment of a Temperance Nurses' Pension Fund, to be supported by the public as well as the nurses themselves. Mrs. Hawkes next made an earnest appeal to the nurses for their practical sympathy and help in the total abstinence movement.

The Central Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating liquors on Sunday held its annual meeting at the Manchester Town Hall; Mr. A. Pease, M.P., presiding. The annual report stated that, although no progress was made in Parliament during last year with the Sunday Closing Bill, the advanced position held by the movement throughout the country was fully maintained, and in some respects considerably strengthened. In the judgment of the committee the events of the year justified their policy of adhering strictly to the programme agreed upon at the inauguration of the Association—Sunday closing for the whole day and the whole country. The chairman said the result of canvasses which had been made showed that in some constituencies seven out of eight people were in favour of total Sunday closing, while in others the proportion was even greater. It was sometimes said that Sunday closing would lead to private drinking. The most satisfactory answer to that was that, whereas in Scotland the population had increased more than thirty-three per cent. between 1852-53 and 1892-93, the consumption of spirits in the latter year was 160,000 gallons less than in the former year.

THE BOOK WORLD.

The Story of an Old Oak Tree: Told by himself, by G. T. Fancourt (Elliot Stock), is a diverting fable about a talking tree and equally wonderful things, for the delectation of young readers.

Duty's Call. By H. N. B. (3s. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) A story of considerable merit, giving vivid glimpses of undergraduate life, and also of womanly devotion in the service of the outcast and the poor.

The three addresses delivered by Rev. Andrew Murray at his farewell meetings in Exeter Hall are issued in a neat and well-printed booklet under the title of Eagle Wings. Their careful study will be a most profitable exercise. (1s. Marshall Bros.)

God's Food for the Afflicted. By Rev. J. Barnes. (9d. G. Stoneman.) A booklet containing wise and helpful words to the sorrowing. Its tasteful get up will commend it; while its message of true comfort admirably adapts it to be put in the hands of them that mourn.

Helen Murdoch. By Alice Jane Muirhead. (2s. 6d. H. R. Allenson.) A story of trials bravely met, and of light ultimately arising out of the darkness. The character-sketching is well done, and the tale is altogether wholesome and profitable, as well as full of absorbing interest.

"Translated": A Memorial of Eustace G. D. Maxwell. By his Mother. (1s. Marshall Bros.) This outline of a beautiful life is in its fourth edition. It is a means of grace to read the pages; they have attractions for young and old, and we trust they will yet have a widely-extended circulation.

The Secret of Holiness. By Rev. F. S. Webster. (1s. net. Marshall Bros.) This, the latest issue of the Keswick Library, is a very fresh and stimulating utterance on different aspects of the spiritual life. Mr. Webster is nothing if not practical, and his chapters are full of home thrusts, from which the reader finds it hard to escape.

Tales told by the Fireside. By Rev. Charles D. Bell, D.D. (Elliot Stock.) These stories, at once vivacious and pathetic, reveal the ex-rector of Cheltenham in a new light. His gifts of imagination are well-known through his poems, but this book proves him to be a born story-teller. The tales are full of tragic and human interest, as well as being admirable specimens of constructive and descriptive literary work. May Dr. Bell be long spared to exercise his varied gifts.

A Bright To-morrow. By Rev. J. H. Townsend, D.D. (1s. Marshall Bros.) The "Upward Life Series" has already provided some helpful devotional books, and this, its latest issue, is a welcome addition. Its theme is the personal return of Christ, and the author, shunning minute details, endeavours to stir a loving longing for the Lord Himself. Believing this great event to be imminent, he urges earnest and prayerful preparation. The book will doubtless be a rousing message to many hearts.

A biography of Sir Arthur Stevenson Blackwood, the late Secretary of the Post Office, is to be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. It is compiled by a friend, and edited by Lady Blackwood.

Two new publications by John Kensit (a penny each) are PROTESTANTISM: Its Perils and Its Duty, the substance of an address by Dean Farrar; and GACE'S CATECHISMS, an Exposure, by John Kensit.

Messrs. Blackie & Son have issued three new series of children's books, in prettily-designed cloth covers, illustrated. Already six have been brought out at a penny each, six at twopence, and six at threepence. Historical incidents and stories of adventure are well represented in the series.

EXPOSITION OF MATT. XXIV., with special reference to the Signs of our Lord's Coming, by Silas Henn. This is a thoughtful pamphlet on a much discussed problem. Though we do not regard it as settling all the difficulties which encounter the expositor, we commend it to the prayerful attention of students of Scripture. (2d. The Author, 4, Himley-road, Dudley, Worcestershire.)

THE LORD JESUS TEMPTED. By Dr. Neatby. (1d. Shane.) A letter booklet on a great subject. It shows the greatness of Christ's work, and the blessings flowing therefrom. In conclusion, Dr. Neatby says:—"Is it not a rock beneath our feet in temptation, to know that our High Priest Jesus, the Son of God, is He who has overcome Satan by an absolute trust in God, and shown that 'IN HIM IS NO SIN'? God help us to value Him more! May He give us to make better use of One so divinely fitted to meet all our need!"

THE REUNION OF CHRISTENDOM MADE PRACTICABLE AND PACIFICATORY, by Rev. W. Earle, M.A., B.D., curate of St. Clement Danes, W.C., is a large pamphlet. Non-Episcopalians are hardly likely to think that the author understands their position. (2s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) A much more valuable essay is THE UNION OF CHRISTENDOM, a sermon by Rev. Wm. Baillie, M.A., rector of Killybegs (2d. Partridge), in which spiritual union is recognized, and an appeal made for loving co-operation in testimony for Christ. Dr. Handley Moule gives the booklet a prefatory word of God-speed.

It has been resolved by the pastor and elders of Lyndhurst-road Church, Hampstead, to devote one Sunday evening service in each month exclusively to praise. The first of these was on last Sunday evening, conducted by Professor Adeney. The service concluded with the Lord's Supper.

The year book for 1895 of Leytonstone Church, under the care of Rev. C. B. Symes, shows an income for the year of £1647, including £279 for the L.M.S. Eighty-one new members have been added during the year, the total number being 494. The numerous societies are all reported as in a flourishing condition.

The forty-second annual meeting of the English Congregational Chapel Building Society was held at Finsbury Park Congregational Church. In the afternoon the anniversary sermon was preached by Rev. Rev. John Thomas, of Liverpool, referring to the current rumours that it was his intention soon to leave the pastorate at Myrtle-street for the purpose of accepting a theological presidency, has assured his people that he had not formed any such decision, and that he had every expectation of continuing his work in Liverpool for a long while to come.

The second anniversary of Rev. John Spence's settlement at Chelsea Chapel, was celebrated on Tuesday week. During the past two years 151 have joined the church, and 109 have been baptized. The pastor's sermons have been published monthly, and there has also been an increased attendance at all the services, both Sunday and week-day.

At the annual meeting of Upton Chapel, Lambeth-road, Rev. W. Williams took the chair. Sixteen reports were given, bearing testimony to the activity, generosity, and un-failing blessing which the church has for many years enjoyed. The conditions of the neighbourhood make Christian work more and more exacting and difficult. But the church has more than held her own. Sixty-eight new members were received, and after heavy losses, there is a net gain of twenty-two. The membership of the church is 616. Much labour is expended among the poor of North Lambeth, and material, as well as spiritual help is afforded.

Whitewick reports a great revival with good results. Mr. J. Sampson has held a successful mission in Lincoln. The Methodist New Connexion is building a new chapel at Nunhead, S.E.

Rev. J. Proudfoot, who has charge of the Bocas-del-Tora Mission in Central America, tells of substantial progress. The Mission is much too extensive for the present staff, and new chapels are to be built on at least two stations.

Rev. R. Woolfenden, writing from Ningpo, gives interesting details of a visit paid to a station recently established, and situated about six hours' sail east of the city. There he baptized six converts, ranging from twenty-six to sixty-six years of age.

Isaac, who for the past sixteen years has been an acceptable local preacher and active temperance worker in the Bristol circuits of the United Methodist Free Churches, is about to remove to Cornwall, his services having been engaged by the Liskeard Circuit. Rev. J. A. Gardiner, who at one time was minister of Grosvenor Square Presbyterian Church, Manchester, has undertaken the pastorate of Manly, New South Wales.

No Moderator has yet been found for the English Presbyterian Synod, although several well known names are mentioned, such as Revs. Dr. Moinet and D. Fotheringham.

At the annual meeting of the Grange-road, Birkenhead, Rev. William Hutton presided, and reviewed the work of the year, and called attention to the approaching jubilee of the church. Reports were read in connection with all the different societies in the congregation. During the year thirty-nine had been added to the roll, which now shows a membership of 553.

Camden-road Church held its annual meeting on the 12th inst., Rev. Dr. Thornton presiding. The church roll stands at 417, and the mission rolls at 202; total 619. There are 838 Sunday scholars in the three schools and 101 teachers. Two local missions are vigorously worked by this congregation. Encouraging reports were submitted by the office-bearers, and admirable addresses were delivered by Mr. R. T. Turnbull and Rev. D. C. Macgregor.

An animated and very useful discussion has been held by the Presbytery of London (North) on religion and morals among the people. Dr. Gibson, in introducing the subject, asked how it was that people could not be induced to attend a prayer-meeting, when they would be present if there was to be a lively address? The need of their churches was more spiritual life. Amongst those who took part in the discussions were Rev. A. A. Ramsay, G. H. C. Macgregor, J. A. Scott, Z. B. Woffendale, R. C. Gillie. The chief theme was how to get hold of the mass of the people.

Calls.—Rev. W. Williamson, of Islington, Liverpool, to Trinity, Sunderland; Rev. A. N. Bogle, of Edinburgh, to Larbert Free Church; Rev. J. Macmillan, of Nairn, to Lansdowne U.P., Glasgow; Rev. H. W. Perry, of Rathfriland, to Portadown; Rev. John Davies, of Landilo, to Carmarthen.

Resignations.—Rev. Walter Morison, D.D., of Westbourne Grove; Rev. R. Edwards, of Rhiwar; Rev. R. Edwards, of Cefnecard.

Society of Friends.

Samuel James Capper is extremely active in promoting the propaganda of peace, and is especially engaged in urging a court of arbitration, rendering war with America for ever impossible.

Another venerable Friend, by the decease of Wm. Bennington, of Scarborough, in his ninety-third year, has just passed away. The longevity of many Friends, recently removed, is remarkable, and the average length of life seems to become higher.

American Friends have just liberated two of their number for missionary work in South Brazil. New York quarterly meeting gave them a very warm welcome last month, and seems waking up to a deep sense of the privilege of advanced work.

Luke Woodard, of Indiana, writes an able letter to last week's Friend on the burning theme of "By what means is the Society of Friends to be revived?" And the editor invites discussion thereon. Some earnest words and action are sure to follow.

Theodore Neild, B.A., of Dalton Hall, Manchester, has been lecturing in a very interesting manner in Leeds on "John Dalton, the Quaker chemist." Among other notable things referred to was his remarkable likeness to Sir Isaac Newton and his colour blindness.

The Home Mission Committee has arranged to render help, over the country, in the holding of "General Meetings," viz., series of Gospel meetings, for the purposes of awakening and instruction, leading to the spread of spiritual truth, thus antagonising indifference, formality, and every other evil.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

WE have received several testimonies of keen interest in Pastor Storjohann's articles on "King David and his Psalms." Some have not hesitated to declare them a very valuable contribution to the study of a great theme. This week we are compelled to hold over a section already in type. The remaining articles in our hands pursue the subject with remarkable insight and lucidity.

Our readers will, we believe, have read with profit the articles by Miss Lucy A. Bennett entitled, "Rallying Points," which have been appearing in our columns. There are many more which might be added, could we afford the space, but some of our readers may like to search them out for themselves, and a very profitable study it should be. In these days of divisions and competing interests it is well for us thus to join forces and estimate our strength. "LET us draw near," "LET us hold fast," "LET us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works."

A minister who has been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN for several years writes:—

I would tender hearty thanks to the Editor for spiritual help and refreshment. Owing, no doubt, to the natural bent of my mind, there is often much which does not commend itself either to my sympathies or my judgment. But there is also always much that is profitable, often very helpful, sometimes richly suggestive.

We thank the writer as much for his candid criticism as for his kindly appreciation. There are few things in life which any of us find entirely to our liking; but we shall do well to regard them in the same spirit in which our friend's letter is conceived.

A terrible disaster has befallen Johannesburg, in the form of a dynamite explosion, which has caused the death of at least fifty persons, besides injuring 200 others, and rendering thousands homeless. Twenty tons of the explosive, which were being unloaded, blew up through the effects of the extraordinary heat of the weather, and excavated a hole 30ft. deep, 200 long, and 80 wide. This calamity has created universal sympathy, and has called forth a generous liberality on the part of the wealthier inhabitants, who in a few hours subscribed a sum of £60,000 for the relief of the distressed and wounded. The "mushroom city of the Rand" is passing through a severe trial. Its brief prosperity made it a centre of much temptation and iniquity. Its sudden falling on evil times, may, and we trust will, be a means of purification. Communities, like individuals, are often redeemed by calamity and suffering.

New countries and new cities always abound in temptations to sin; nowhere is faithful Christian work more needed. And, thank God, someone is always raised up for the emergency, in some cases the greatness of the evil calling forth the least likely of persons to grapple with it. In San Francisco, which, like all "gateways" of the world, is full of abominations, the women have risen up in defence of young girls, and are demanding justice on their seducers. Mass meetings are being held in the interests of social purity. The wrongs done to Chinawomen by men of their own nation, who entrap and bring them over to America, and then sell them for immoral purposes, are also being redressed by one or two Chinamen of a better mind. It is not easy now to do any of these wrong things in the dark, as the Press is so eager for all kinds of news, and vigilance committees are practically in every place. The awakening of woman has also been her safeguard. She is the best able to speak with the enemies of her sex in the gate.

Our greatest temptations lie close to our greatest qualities. Where we are strong, there too are we weak. Moses fell into impatience, though he was the meekest of men. David was full of spiritual fervour, yet his sins were of the coarsest kind. Elijah was bold enough to face a nation, yet fled from the wrath of a woman. There must be some reason for this, and it is not far to seek. We do not guard our strong places, and so the evil one takes them by surprise. It is the compensation of frailty that it keeps us humble and watchful. Therefore, while watching unto prayer in those things where we are weak, let us not forget that it is just as important to watch and pray over our "virtues" and strong qualities. We need Divine help and grace at all times, and in all parts of our sinful nature. Self-reliance and self-despair are trap-doors that must be equally well guarded.

Travel has its religious advantages, if it brings its own temptations. A visit to Rome has often proved to be a complete disenchantment to those who had a Romeward tendency and a confirmation of the faith of intelligent Protestants. A journey from Rome, a prolonged residence, has often broken the formal tie which held some of "the faithful." The second or third generation of Romish emigrants to America are said to leave that Church. At the present time the large colony of Italians who have planted themselves at Alexandria is found to be very open to the teaching of the Gospel, and the efforts of Christian workers have had marvellous success. No doubt these emigrants feel it to be a new thing to have spiritual friends who will teach their children, aid their mothers, and prove their love by self-sacrificing devotion.

Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., called attention the other day to a fact which, we fear, is not sufficiently realised, viz., that in many places, even in large towns, Protestant children are being forced into Roman Catholic day schools, because of the insufficient accommodation in Board Schools. The Church of Rome has only to provide much more accommodation than is wanted for her own children, and the School Board or Protestant churches to be remiss in providing enough for the Protestant children, and at once an engine of proselytising is set in motion at the cost of the ratepayers. It would be worth while for the Romish Church to plant schools by the hundred, if she could obtain the superintendence and education of children who otherwise would never have come under her influence. It is high time that Protestants saw that in the elementary schools we are threatened with a re-establishment of Popery.

Recent events in many directions have been eloquent in the exposure of evil, and in the vindication of the righteous laws through which the Ruler of Nations vindicates his will. The railway scandals which have been gradually unveiled in France during the last few months have been a perpetual source of political disturbance. All the efforts of corrupt officials in the Government and out of it have been directed towards hushing these scandals up and defeating the hand of justice. But slowly and surely the exposure has proceeded, and a severe crisis, in which the very constitution has been threatened, has resulted from a conflict between the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate on the question. The difficulty seems to be the fact that members of all parties are more or less implicated in corrupt practices, so that there is no section of politicians solid for reform. But it is unlikely that any efforts can long avail to stay the advancing step of justice. It is established from of old that though that step is slow it is sure.

Two great federation movements have received a distinct filip during the last week. First, an important step in advance has been taken in Free Church Federation. By the generosity of leading Nonconformists provision is being made for an aggressive movement extending over five years. Great preparations are being made in view of the next Congress at Nottingham, at which one of the leading features will be a large meeting for young Nonconformists in the Mechanics' Hall, to be addressed by leading representatives of the Churches. This work of bringing the Evangelical bodies into line for common purposes is likely to have far-reaching consequences. The former attitude of aloofness and isolation was perilous to spiritual life in all the Churches, and a standing argument of unbelievers against the common faith, which had great practical influence among the undecided. We are glad to see such clear signs that the reproach is in a fair way of being wiped out.

The other movement is that for securing a permanent Court of Arbitration between England and America. It seems after all that this will be the real and happy outcome of the recent war scare arising out of the Venezuelan difficulty. The bare possibility of conflict between the two great families to whom, as Mr. Payard, the American Ambassador to this country, says: "God has given the English language," has stirred the deepest chords of mutual relationship and regard. This sentiment of goodwill has spread from the religious to political circles, and has been voiced more and more emphatically by leading statesmen on both sides of the Atlantic, until by this time there is a real hope of definite results being speedily attained. The steadying influence of such an agreement between the English-speaking nations on the peace of the whole earth cannot be estimated, besides being a practical example for all the other races of the civilised world.

The history of the arbitration movement, as summarised in an article in The Daily News of February 21, is full of encouragement for those who are leading "forlorn hopes," and who are so frequently denounced as "faddists and visionaries" in the secular press. The Parliamentary history of the arbitration movement only dates back some twenty-three years, when Mr. Henry Richard, secretary at that time of the Peace Society, moved an address to the Crown on the subject. There was a simultaneous motion in the House of Congress at Washington. The matter then languished so far as the political world was concerned for fourteen years. But it was making steady progress in public opinion, mainly through the influence of the Churches; and a memorial signed by 234 members of the House of Commons, and presented to the President of the United States by Mr. Cremer and Sir Lyon Playfair, was cordially received. One of Mr. Gladstone's last public acts in 1893 was to give his influence in aid of a House of Commons resolution in favour of the same thing. Now the little one has become a thousand, and if no untoward event interferes, the dream of 1873 is likely to become the reality of 1896.

The Bishop of Hereford, in his Lenten lectures in Lombard-street, has been insisting that if the Christian life of to-day is to have its due transforming power, there must be seasons of personal detachment from the stress and worry of daily work. We become the slaves of our surroundings if we do not seek solitude with God; the cares of the world and the lusts of other things choke the Word, and it becomes unfruitful. The more we live under the distinct influence of God the safer shall we be from the world's influence, and the more power shall we have to influence the world.

The return of the Jews to the Holy Land—the burden of ancient prophecies, the expectation of many earnest believers—has found a champion in Mr. Holman Hunt, who writes a remarkable letter on the subject in The Jewish Chronicle. His point of view is that of the philo-Jewish philanthropist and the statesman. He says that Palestine "will soon become a direful field of contention to the infernally-armed forces of the European Powers, so that it is calculated to provoke a curse to the world of the most appalling character." Russia, Greece, Italy, France, Austria, and Germany, are even now actively pushing their interests there, and England cannot afford to allow the land to get into the possession of any of her rivals, because Syria is the key to Egypt, as history plainly shows. This all points to the possibility of the country becoming once more the centre of political disturbance for the modern, as it was for many centuries for the ancient, world. Mr. Hunt would suggest that the settlement of the Jews on their own soil, as an independent kingdom, would be a satisfactory solution of the impending problem.

The means suggested by the eminent painter for this end are eminently peaceful. He affirms it as his conviction—the result of years of residence in Syria—that the poor oppressed Israelite is passionately sincere in his longing for the re-establishment of his nation in the land of his fathers. The sentiment throughout the world is so intensely strong in favour of this dream of the ages that every hour its advocates will increase. There is an enormous mass of wealth in the hands of the Jewish race that would be freely available for the purpose. By purchase from the insolvent and hated Sultan, the land could be readily obtained, if only the sanction of the civilised nations could be gained. Then a wise expenditure of capital in renewing the exhausted resources of the country would complete the Restoration. The plan looks feasible—if only the "Powers" could be brought round to it. But the Powers have just proved themselves to be Impotencies where questions of humanity and progress in the East are concerned.

In these days, when so much of the popularity of some of the most widely-read tales and sketches depends upon the free use of dialect on the part of the characters introduced, it is refreshing to notice that the old and immortal books have never a trace of such a thing. Bunyan could, no doubt, have very easily made Christian speak in the Bedford dialect, and Mr. Greatheart in that of Leicester, and Mr. Facingbothways in that of Northamptonshire. But how long and how widely would they have been read? Their dialects would, two centuries and a-half ago, have marked the limit of the travels of the wonderful "Pilgrim's Progress," and the curious language would soon have proved the grave of the book. The greatest teachers have employed no amusing oddities of language and manner, but simple English, as it is understood by persons of all classes; and they have had their reward in ministering to successive generations. The more widely scattered the English-speaking people are, the more extensive becomes their usefulness.

The inquest upon the hairdresser's lad, aged thirteen, who committed suicide by drowning himself in the Thames, throws a painful light on business life. It appears that this little fellow, when an errand-boy to a chemist, had been frequently sent to pay gambling stakes to gentlemen of over £100 at a time. By the hairdresser, to whom he was next sent, he was trusted with less sums, but for equally bad purposes. No wonder the boy had a love for "common books." The important lesson from the case is that parents and guardians of children should be very careful to send their children to good places of business—a suggestion, no doubt, more easily made than carried out in these days when poor people are only too thankful to get work anywhere for their children to do.

In the world of theological thought there is no question just now that more fascinates the minds of earnest thinkers than that dealing with the mystery of our Lord's Person. Two notable works on this subject have been published by leading men representing widely separated sections of the Christian Church, but both uncompromising in maintaining the reality of the Saviour's Divine and human natures. One is by Canon Gore, entitled, "Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation"; the other is by Principal T. C. Edwards, D.D., of Bala Calvinistic College, on "The God-Man." The latter is an earnest and scholarly but somewhat too condensed treatment of the questions relating to the conditions of our Lord's earthly life. It is full of suggestive thought, and is written in a spirit redolent of loving and devout worship. The book forms the first of the "Davies Lectureship," founded by an earnest citizen of Bootle, near Liverpool, for the purpose of expounding various aspects of Christian thought and life. Dr. Edwards is one of the first Welsh theologians, and his book should have a wide circulation among those who are much perplexed on this important and living subject. It is the result of close study, and is filled with evangelic fervour and charm.

The future life is again becoming the theme of thought and speech in a very marked degree. This time it is not being presented as a subject of speculation, or of debate as to the destiny of the race, but as bearing directly upon conduct and life. We greatly need the reinforcement of its mighty and solemn powers in order to fight victoriously against the domination of things seen and temporal. If to-morrow we die, and there is an end of us, then, indeed, we may say, "let us eat and drink." Or if it is all dim and uncertain what the future of the wicked and of the righteous will be, if the reward is doubtful, then we are robbed of one of the most powerful motives by which to warn and persuade men. Judgment to come still has awe enough to make even such men as Felix tremble; and the good hope of the joys at God's right hand has attraction to lift men higher. Even the phlegmatic Strauss, who had abandoned with many other good things the hope of the future life, would have been glad of its comfort when he saw his mother lying dead, the only occasion on which he craved for it. The future life should have a prominent place in Christian teaching.

The courtesy and wisdom of the Apostle Paul in determining not to build on another man's foundation is at all times, in all places, and by all Christians worthy of imitation. It is wasted time and strength to do work twice over, or to occupy a place with two men where one would serve. It is almost certain to breed envy, strife, and every evil work for new hands to meddle with work which other hands have toiled to raise. The "enemy" is sure to find his opportunity in this clashing of wills. As yet the world is wide enough for everyone who has an honest wish to do anything for God's kingdom to do it without jostling and hindering a fellow-labourer.

The same courtesy which made Paul sensitive about work is evidenced in his treatment of other workers. He had what may be called a proper pride that would not detract from the value of any labourer, however obscure or humble, and that would not allow him to obtrude himself. He was quite ready to withstand even Peter when Peter "walked not uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel," but no trace can be found of his ever having interfered between Peter and his converts among the Dispersion. He was a Christian gentleman. Some of the friction which causes pain to gentle and retiring natures might easily be avoided in churches and societies if everyone would be careful to walk wisely, not exalting himself, and not bringing himself into comparison with others.

Indifferentism.

By REV. WM. HARDY GAUSSEN.

"Gallio cared for none of those things."—
Acts xviii. 17.

"None of these things move me."—Acts xx. 24.

A TRUE magnet is not indifferent to magnetic substances; to all else it is, and must be, if it is to possess any value. It would be of little use for extracting a particle of metal from one's eye, if it exercised an equal amount of attraction on the eye-ball and on the steel-filing. The illustration may help us to see that when we speak of indifference, we must, before forming a favourable or adverse judgment, ask the question—Indifferent about what?

There is a marked distinction, and even opposition, between Gallio's indifference to eternal realities and Paul's indifference to the evils of life. The two cannot co-exist, at least in their full strength. They vary in direct proportion. It should form a subject for prayerful inquiry in each of our hearts, how far the latter state of mind has ousted the former. While we look at the things which are not seen, we look not at the things which are seen.

The Apostle Peter aptly characterises the Gallio type in the words, "seeing only what is near" (R.V.). The species has never been wholly extinct. Representatives of it abound in our day. No Christian worker, especially in places where much effort has been put forth, can fail to be struck with the callousness of multitudes both to law and grace, to sternness and tenderness. Among professing Christians also, how much carelessness there is as to the fate of those without Christ! If this is in any degree a feature of our times it may be explained, but not excused, by the high pressure at which we live—the cares of this world choking the Word—by the materialistic atmosphere we breathe, and by the scepticism engendered of the "oppositions of science falsely so called."

On the other hand, how few there are who "count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus" their Lord, whose eyes are inwardly ablaze with the things that are eternal, and whose ears are deaf to the siren voice of pleasure! The Pauline immovability somewhat reminds us of the Stoic conception of "apathy," though Paul was free from its great defect, the absence of pity. That he was keenly sympathetic is evident from his words, "What mean ye to weep and to break my heart?" (Acts xxi. 13). But the difference between the Christian and the stoic has been well put thus—"the one upholds individual independence, the other absolute faith in God." J. S. Mill approaches the Stoic ideal when he says, "The conscious ability to do without happiness gives the best prospect of realising such happiness as is attainable." The Christian ideal is expressed in the words of the Psalmist, "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings; his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord" (Ps. cxii. 7).

As the root of failure is unbelief, so the remedy is "the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ." He alone reveals things in their innermost reality, in their due collocation and true bearing. He it is that produces in us the precious fruits—faith, love (Gal. v. 22), and hope (Rom. xv. 13), of which three, if we may change the figure, faith is the fulcrum, without which hope and love cannot exercise any leverage. We want heavenly eye-salve that we may see. "We needs must love the highest when we see it." Were the man with the muck-rake once to look upon the crown which one that stood over his head did proffer him, he would be indifferent to the straws, the small sticks, and the dust of the floor, and no longer "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

Rallying Points.

VII.—STEADFASTNESS.

"Let us hold fast our profession." Heb. iv. 14.

"Let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." Jer. i. 5.

IT is a heartening sight to see, in early springtime, the delicate pink-and-white blossom peering forth, with shy enterprise, from its sheath. It is, to the eye of the gardener, a better thing to see, in golden autumn, the ripening fruit hang, large and luscious, on the bending boughs.

It is good to see young and unselfish spirits cemented in mutual love and friendship. It is better, after the lapse of years and the pitfalls and dangers of every human affection, to find the old ties firm and enduring.

It is pleasant to watch the vessel set sail in her gay young glory, with fair sails spread to catch the favouring breeze; it is grander to see her, though torn and battered perhaps, re-enter the harbour, bringing with her the spoils and the honours of a successful voyage.

In like manner we esteem it even a better, gladder sight to see the soldier of the Cross faithful to his colours at the close of the long campaign, than it is to see him buckle on his sword and address himself to the battle.

"I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth," was the wise decision of a veteran Apostle; and it is one in which every Christian parent, Christian pastor, and Christian worker can surely join most heartily. The exhortation of Barnabas to the disciples at Antioch, was that "with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord" (Acts xi. 23), and a greater than Barnabas uttered the too-often forgotten words, "Continue ye in my love" (John xv. 9).

Chief of the charges against the Church of Laodicea was that of lukewarmness; and even over Ephesus, active in service, and patient in tribulation, there was the one mournful cry, "Thou hast left thy first love."

From many another warning and tender word we learn how especially grievous and abhorrent to the Lord's heart is the unfaithfulness of his people. This it is that stirs Him up, both in the Old Testament and the New, to words of tremendous force and import. And the more attentively we study the many passages in which He condescends to plead with one treacherous heart for a firm and full allegiance, the more eager shall we be to pass on to others, and to heed for ourselves, the clarion cry, "Let us hold fast our profession."

There are many waverers, and many too, alas! who are not only waverers, but who seem eager to throw off entirely the restraints and obligations of Christianity—even as a profession. The unrest of unbelief has become more widely felt, and to the cry, "Who will show us any good?" men will not wait for the answer. Is it a time for us, who love the Lord, to slumber, or to go on in indifference or carelessness, as if the eternal verities were as capable of readjustment as the slides of a magic lantern? Is this a time for lowering our standard, for going with the stream, for acting as if we were without strong convictions on any subject whatever?

Nay, but let us all the more earnestly hold fast our profession, and all the more determinately take our stand on the side of Christ, resolved that whoever wavers, we will, by his grace, be faithful to the end.

Hold Him fast, tho' men deride Him,
Count it joy, to stand beside Him.

Would not the enemies of Christ oftener be, to say the least, shamed into silence, if his friends were as loyal and outspoken as they should be?

It is told of the late Sir Robert Peel, that he was once at a dinner party in London, at which the conversation turned into a channel dishonouring to our Lord. Whilst the other gentlemen were talking, this distinguished guest was silent, and presently he asked that the bell might be rung. When the servant appeared, he ordered his carriage, and with gentle courtesy apologised to his host for his enforced departure, as he was "still a Christian."

"Let us hold fast our profession." Outward profession is however, but a part of true discipleship. It needs that the homage of the heart's true allegiance be personally rendered to the divine Master, and be reverently maintained.

"Let us" then "join ourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant." Let body, soul and spirit, be veritably yielded unto the Saviour, in the same spirit which animated the mighty men who came to the rejected David at Ziklag, "Thine we are, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse."

Nay, but the tie is incomparably closer, so close that we need to give expression to it in the words of inspiration, for we had not presumed ourselves to speak them, "He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit."

"We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones."

Blessed be God, the covenant is his, and it is a perpetual covenant, one of which He will "ever be mindful" (Ps. cxi. 5), however forgetful we may be.

Let us, then, with glad and grateful hearts again look at its wonderful provisions and its seal of blood; singing sweetly the old-time refrain, "Come, and let us join ourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant."

I change, He changes not,
The Christ can never die;
His love, not mine, the resting-place,
His truth, not mine, the tie.

The Birmingham Mission.

From February 17 to 21 this mission was continued at Smethwick, Small Heath, and the Town Hall, Birmingham. At Smethwick Rev. F. C. Spurr was the missionary. He gave some most instructive Bible readings. Many inquirers gave in their names in the inquiry-room. At Small Heath a notable feature was the great number of letters of thanksgiving received. These letters contained many warm expressions of gratitude to God for blessing while the mission was proceeding.

On Friday afternoon, at Carr's-lane Chapel, reports from the secretaries of the eighteen districts were read, showing that the whole mission has been an untold blessing to the churches and the people. On Friday night Rev. Thos. Cook instructed the "converts" at the Town Hall—1000 invitations having been sent. The Town Hall was packed. Many of the inquirers in the central district came from the slums of this city. B.

Irish Society.—Seldom have the facilities for evangelistic work and the work of scriptural education in Ireland been more encouraging than at the present. The last census returns show that 307,000 persons still understand Irish in the province of Munster alone. There are in Ireland nearly 700,000 who understand and are attached to the vernacular, while many thousands speak Irish only. During the past year nearly 3000 pupils, old and young, presented themselves for examination in reading, translating, and repeating from memory the Society's selected portions of Holy Scripture in Irish and English. The secretary of the Society (Rev. T. Keane, 32, Sackville-street, N.) desires the prayerful sympathy of friends.

The Present State of Europe.

By GEORGE WASHBURN, D.D.

President of Robert College, Constantinople.

THE events of contemporary history can never be fully understood by those who take part in them, and no statesman can foretell with certainty what course they will take in the immediate future; but I believe that there is a general impression among thinking men in Europe that we are approaching a great crisis in the world's history. It is certainly within the bounds of possibility that this year may see the great Christian nations engaged in a universal war. I am by nature and choice an optimist. I like to find out the good rather than the evil in men and in nations; but a man must either shut his eyes, or fall back upon an unwarranted faith in God, to be an optimist in Europe to-day—so far as the immediate future is concerned. There are wealth and culture here as well as poverty and ignorance—nobility as well as meanness. There are servants of God as well as slaves of Mammon; but, taking the nations as a whole, with their rulers, judging them in the light of their national life and their public policy, nothing could be more hopeless than the present state of Europe. A year ago we might well have hesitated before using such strong language; but now God, in his providence, has tried and tested these nations by a call so clear and unmistakable that their answer to it was of necessity a choice between God and Mammon—a determination of their own character; just such a call as comes to every man who hears the words of Christ, and, in accepting or rejecting Him, determines for himself his position in the spiritual world.

The events which have taken place in Turkey during the past year have forced each one of the Great Powers to decide whether it would act in view of its own selfish, political interests, or of the demands of humanity, justice, and Christian sympathy. There was no doubt about the facts, or the responsibility, or the duty. There was no question of ability. Yet they each and all chose to sacrifice half a-million of their fellow-Christians to their own selfish interests. Has the world ever seen such a spectacle before?

They are not all equally guilty. It may not be possible to determine the exact responsibility of each of the Powers, but certain facts are clear. So far as the people are concerned, it is only in England that there has been any general interest in the fate of the Armenians, or any recognition of any responsibility for what was going on in Turkey. With rare exceptions, the newspapers on the Continent have either ignored the subject, or defended the Turks, or made it an occasion for abusing England. The speculation in South African gold mines has excited ten times as much interest as the Armenian massacres; and, as far as we see, it would not have roused any excitement if the whole Christian population had been either killed or forced to become Moslems. If Nordeau had written his book a little later he would have needed no other evidence than this of the degeneration of European people and the general prevalence of egomania.

This is also a happy illustration of the "altruism" which scientific unbelief has substituted for Christianity, as the basis of personal and national morality, which practically means that everybody should make sacrifices for us and that we should make sacrifices for nobody. It is perfectly plain that the civilisation of Europe is rotten to the core; and if we can learn anything from the lessons of history, it must pass through the throes of death before it can rise again to a new and higher life. If it were only the Governments which were corrupt the people might rise in their strength and overthrow them; but with a degenerate people there is no hope.

That Europe will suffer as much as, or more than,
(192)

Turkey for this great crime, there can be no doubt. And, like all God's judgments, it will come in a natural way, in a conflict of those selfish interests which the nations worship, and great wars, or in the rapid degeneration of the people and internal strife, or perhaps both together. If it were not for the vital force which there is in Christianity we might expect a gradual relapse into barbarism; but there is an invisible kingdom of God in Europe which can never die, and out of it there will come some day a new and better Europe, which will worship God and not Mammon.—New York Independent.

Conference at Ongole, India.

TEN years ago American Baptist missionaries in the Telugu country celebrated the jubilee of their Mission. Canadian missionaries took part in the celebration because the Canadian work grew out of the American. Then it was decided to hold a union conference every five years, and the first was held at Cocanada. Now, after another five years, we have been meeting at Ongole, a name well known because of the great ingathering on that field just after the famine of 1876-77. We went from nearly all parts of the Telugu country, and travelled in all kinds of conveyances—railway carriages, bullock-coaches, ox-carts, palankeens, and canal-boats—I almost forget to add, bicycles.

When we all got there we numbered eighty-two missionaries, including our wives, four visitors, and twenty-six children. I counted fourteen tents in the Mission compound, and there were several more in the college compound. The bungalows of the sub-collector and the superintendent of police had also been kindly placed at the disposal of the Ongole missionaries, so there was ample accommodation. Meals were served in a large pavilion covered with bamboos and mats, and as one sat where one chose, there were good opportunities for social intercourse.

The Conference assembled on Saturday, Dec. 28, at 8 a.m., the first hour being spent in devotional exercises. This was the case on the following days also. At 9 o'clock Dr. CLOUGH took the chair, and in his address of welcome gave some interesting reminiscences of the early days of the Mission. Visitors were invited to a seat in the Conference, and several responded, among whom was Mr. Fry, of the new Industrial Missions Society. In the evening, historical sketches, covering the past five years, were read.

The second day was Sunday. As the Lord had evidently given a message to the preachers, it was considered a good day by most people. Mr. CRAIG preached in Telugu in the morning to an overflowing house. His text was, "I am Jehovah thy God; I brought thee out of the land of Egypt; open thy mouth wide, I will fill it." It was inspiring to look into the faces of such a congregation of missionaries and Telugu preachers and others. In the afternoon, Mr. DAVIS, of Cocanada, preached on the text, "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." And at night, Mr. MONSZ, of Bimlipatam, preached in English from the words, "It is expedient for you that I go away." All these sermons dealt largely with the work of the Holy Spirit, a subject that had been before us in Saturday's devotional meetings, and that was resumed on Monday morning, when both the devotional hour and the following hour also were devoted to it.

On this day papers were read by Mrs. CHURCHILL, of Bobbili, on "Work among Caste-women," and by Miss Dax, of Madras, on "Bible-women's Work." The organisation, discipline, and support of our Telugu churches were treated respectively by Mr. BROCK, of Kanigiri, Mr. HOPKINS, of Palmur, and Mr. DAVIS, of Cocanada. Considerable discussion followed.

On Tuesday the subject of Telugu literature was presented by Dr. McLAURIE, of Bangalore, who reported on behalf of a joint committee on the question of organising a society for the publication of Telugu literature. The report was adopted, and the Conference adjourned to allow time for the organisation of such a society. In the afternoon officers were elected, and the Telugu Baptist Publication Society was fairly launched. May God make it a means of great blessing to the Telugus! In the evening the subject of technical education was before us. Dr. CLOUGH told what had been done towards the opening of a Technical Institute at Ongole.

To everyone's surprise, light rain fell on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. But the new year opened with bright sunshine, and in the afternoon we all went to the top of Prayer-meeting Hill, and listened to the story of the first meeting on the same date forty-two years ago, when Dr. and Mrs. JEWETT and three Telugu Christians prayed for a missionary for Ongole. One of that little company, JULIA, of Nellore, was present, and told the story herself, both in English and Telugu, after which several persons led in prayer. On the way back we marched through the bazaar, singing English and Telugu hymns. A social meeting and service of song at the Mission House brought this happy day to a close.

Many other interesting subjects connected with our work were brought before the Conference, the papers and addresses being of considerable merit, and invariably interesting. Several meetings for business were held, the outcome of one being the formation of a stock company to publish the Baptist Missionary Review. Resolutions were passed in reference to the death of beloved brethren of note in America, among them being Dr. S. F. Smith, the author of the well-known lines on the Lone Star. Meetings were conducted every afternoon by our Telugu brethren, but the missionaries were seldom able to attend. I am sure that they too had a good time.

The closing meeting came at last, and the farewell words had to be spoken, but we parted stronger in the Lord, and in the power of his might, because of the exhortations we had listened to, and the seasons of communion we had enjoyed.

Coming Spring.

THE snowdrop bows to the coming spring,
The daisy* looks on the sun;
Oh, why will the northern tempest fling
A pall on the life begun?

And I, when thrilled by the Living Light
To the rapture of love divine—
Oh, why do I wander where sin can blight
The fault, my soul, is thine.

But still through the sunbeams and the showers,
Will the infant spring grow strong,
Till the world is a garden of summer flowers,
And the wood is a hall of song.

And thus does the grace of God lead on Through the dark and wintry way,
To the rise of the great unsetting sun
Of the endless summer day.

Crystal Palace Bible Stand.—The latest report of this institution says:—"Over a third of a century has run its course since this was commenced, at the International Exhibition of 1862. More than 12,850,000 of separate Gospels, including many Bibles and Testaments, and 13,450,000 cards and leaflets (all Scripture)—in all over 26½ millions—have been disposed of." The Bible carriage work in France continues, in the hands of M. F. Pointet, who goes from village to village, giving away the Word of God, and preaching the Gospel at fairs and market places. He says that the opportunity was never so great as now, when liberty of speech is freely granted. The secretary and general manager of this excellent enterprise is Mr. W. Hawkes, Bible Stand, Crystal Palace, S.E.

*Daisy is said to be the original name of daisy.

Letters from South Africa.—6.

ON January 8 the two ladies I have previously mentioned and myself paid a visit to an hour's voyage by a small steamer from Cape Town. Miss Holt had obtained an order for us to visit the Government establishments for lunatics and for lepers, which are the principal objects of interest—painful interest—on this desolate-looking sandbank in the sea. But in the spring it is verdant with grass and beautiful with flowers.

The lepers used to be located at a place in the mountains between Sir Lowry Pass and Caledon, called Himmel-und-Erde (Heaven and Earth), under the care of the Moravian United Brethren; but they have now been removed to this island, and are under the charge of the Episcopal Church, the clergyman taking a warm and kindly interest in the patients. We were delighted to find in the attendant in the men's department a Swede, an earnest Christian, and I had some conversation with one of the patients, who was also rejoicing in the Lord. It is difficult to conceive a more depressing sight than a ward full of beds wherein lie fellow-creatures whose bodies are falling to pieces, and whose features are in all stages of decay.

The trial of leprosy to its victim consists less in the suffering than in the separation that the disease entails. "Do they suffer much?" we asked of the attendant who took us through the wards. "No," he replied, and then in his broken English continued to assure us that the physical pain was slight in comparison with the mental suffering caused by the severing of the home ties, and the complete separation from all loved ones—suffering which has in it much of the element of despair as the patient realises that his is a life-long isolation.

The hospital overlooks the sea, and in passing out we lingered in conversation with one of the inmates, who was standing in the doorway. "You have a beautiful view," we remarked.

"Oh no," was the pathetic response. "To me it is not beautiful, but dreadful," and then he went on to explain to us that his home was on the farther shore, and that the bright waters were to him but the reminder of his perpetual desolation—the barrier which must for ever lie between him and all that he held most dear. This patient spoke well of the comfort of the hospital and the kindness he received there; but he dwelt much on the agony which such entire banishment was to them all, and said that he had written to the Queen to beg her to have some other arrangement made for them, adding, "She is your mother, but though only a coloured man she is my mother too, and I love my mother."

In the female lunatic asylum the matron was exceedingly kind and sympathetic, and the nurses partook of her consideration and pleasant influence. One poor woman I shall never forget; her whole bearing in face and figure was the embodiment and expression of perplexity and despair. When spoken to, she would turn her head away, and say, as if to herself, "It's too dreadful," or "I didn't do it." It seemed as though she had been, perhaps, falsely charged with some offence, and that the anxiety and misery had been too much for her. All the sad faces of the lepers did not impress us with a deeper sense of anguish than that one mentally-afflicted woman; and this, together with the sorrow of the leper first mentioned, could but suggest that the torment in the lost world will rather be that of mind and soul and spirit, than of the outward frame. It reminded me of Mr. Moody's story of a maniac bemoaning his fleeting opportunities in the perpetual lament, "If I only had! If I only had!" It was a relief to hear that the poor woman appeared to be, however, slowly recovering.

Before we left the island we were kindly and hospitably entertained by the Civil Governor or Commissioner, Mr. Piers, and his genial wife.

THE AFRICAN CART.

In America the favourite and almost universal carriage is the light, narrow, four-wheeled buggy. You scarcely ever see a two-wheeled vehicle. In Africa, on the contrary, we travel in a cart and pair, or four-in-hand, or in a bullock-wagon. Only now and then an Englishman or an American, in or near a town where the roads are good, reminds himself of the home-land by importing a home-built vehicle of the kind to which he has been accustomed there.

Our first experience of the African cart (which is as well adapted for Africa as the buggy for America) was in this wise. We left Cape Town one afternoon at four, by rail, alighting at the station at the foot of Sir Lowry Pass. Here we had secured seats in the post-cart, but the driver said there was no room, the bed of the cart was full of mail bags. However, the two ladies bravely decided to make the attempt, and at 6.45 p.m. we started on our forty-mile journey to Caledon. We began with a team of four horses, and when we had shaken down into our places we found it not nearly so bad as had been represented. Indeed the weight of the letter-bags steadied the cart, so that we were not so much shaken as we were afterwards without them. We were charmed with our drive through the silent, solemn mountains, by the light of the brilliant stars, though the heavens above the southern hemisphere seemed to us less grand than those above our own; and the constellation of the Southern Cross was somewhat of a disappointment, both as to size and brilliancy. We understood that later in the year it is brighter than now. The journey, after the first stage over the hills, was performed with a pair of horses, of which there were three relays.

We arrived at Caledon at one o'clock a.m., and, after some hours' sleep and visiting the mineral baths, and bathing in the most iron-impregnated waters in the world, we left at 3 p.m. on our journey of three hours and a-half to

GENADENDAL.

Dutch looks an uncouth language in print, but the name of this place is more euphonious than may appear at first sight to an Englishman. Probably the reader has already pronounced it Jenadëndal, with the accent on den; but the true pronunciation is Genāhdendal, with the accent on the second syllable (German, Gnādenthal). The original name of the locality was Bavians' Kloof, the Hill of Apes, because baboons dwell there. But when Governor Jansen, in 1806, a week before the colony was ceded to the English, made a grant of a considerable tract of land to the Moravians, to secure the permanence of their mission there, he said: "Bavians' Kloof is not a fit name for such a paradise as you have made the place. It is genaden dal (a vale of grace)." The Moravians saw at once the appropriateness of the title, and Genāhdendal—the Vale or Dale of Grace—superseded Bavians' Kloof, in name as it had already done in fact, though the original inhabitants haunt the mountains still.

The history of this unique and interesting institution is briefly this. In 1737, George Schmidt, a working carpenter, a Moravian by birth, who had been an evangelist in Bohemia, and suffered six years' imprisonment for the Gospel's sake, went, the first missionary, to South Africa, and settled in Bavians' Kloof. He laboured for several years among the natives, and baptized some of them. The Boers could not endure that Hottentots—scheppele, animals, as they called them—should be regarded as fellow-men, to whom "the sacraments were to be administered." Dogs and Hottentots were not admitted to their churches. Nor were the Dutch worse in their treatment of the natives than other European nations. Schmidt was forbidden to baptize any more, and at last was summoned to Holland to answer for his conduct. He was never permitted to return, though his heart was there. For fifty years the work was stayed, but living seed had been scattered, and whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap, if not here yet yonder, where the sower and the reaper shall rejoice together.

In 1792, three brethren, artisans, arrived, and found an old blind woman, Magdalena, or Lena, the last living disciple of George Schmidt. She had been the means of leading a few to Jesus, and had preserved a small Dutch Testament carefully wrapped up in sheepskin, which she and her few fellow-disciples read together; and, like the noble Bereans of old, found in their own experience that the things there written were so. A pear-tree which had been planted by George Schmidt, had died away, but out of its roots a new and fruitful tree had grown; and this was, and still is, taken to be an object lesson in nature, showing how in grace, life comes out of death, and how the work of God, though it may seem to perish, is perpetuated in another form.

Our visit to this interesting spot will form the subject of another letter.

SETTLERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

It is better to emigrate to this or any other country before twenty-five to thirty years of age, rather than later in life; otherwise habits are formed which create a constant pining for the mother-country, to whose apron-string the emigrant has become tied. Young men who have no trade, business, or profession are of little use. I read in The Times some years ago a remark worth remembering: "To know a handicraft often makes the difference between a living and starvation." It is as true here as at home. It is cruel to send men here who are wasters at home. They are almost certain to go more quickly to utter ruin in any foreign country than among their own friends. Just now drought, locusts, and the political complications, make everything trying and depressing. But artisans and young men who understand a business or banking, and who are industrious, capable, and trustworthy, will become more and more a necessity as the country is developed. Train up your children according to their character and capacity. Study them from infancy, and you will know what they are fit for as they grow up. Pray for and with them, and God will guide you to guide them wisely. Teach them honest trades for necessary uses (Titus iii. 14), and they will be wanted almost anywhere.

R. C. MORGAN.

Worthing.—The convenient building, bought and adapted as a Tabernacle in connection with the labours of Pastor Crouch, has been opened with many hopeful tokens. According to the inaugural statement the work in the Tabernacle will be carried on on undenominational lines, following no teaching but that of the sacred Scriptures, and no head but that of the Lord Jesus Christ. Details were given of the site, the building, and the outlay on alterations, showing about £500 needed to clear present liabilities. Sympathetic addresses were given by Mr. C. R. Hurditch, Revs. G. Turner, W. Fuller Gooch, and C. B. Sawday.

Protestant Reformation Society.—Rev. Preb. Webb-Peploe presided and gave the address at the monthly prayer meeting of this society held on Thursday last. Praise was offered for the blessing which has rested on the work of the missionaries, specially at Halifax and Weston-super-Mare. Many requests for prayer in connection with the work at Hastings, Manchester, Oxford, and Liverpool were read. Preb. Webb-Peploe's helpful address was based on Col. iii. 14-17. He drew attention to the high standard of Christian life in this passage, dwelling chiefly upon the four following points: (1) The love of God, as a hand above all, covering all, completing all. (2) The peace of God, ruling in our hearts (the word implies as a judge with authority). (3) The word of Christ dwelling richly in us, our lives permeated by it. (4) The doing everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, and thankfulness pervading the whole life.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, March 1.

"AND HE SAID, SIBBOLETH."—Judges xii. 6.

IT was only the omission of "h," but it meant the death of the man who missed it. One little letter, and the whole wonder and beauty of a human life was forfeited. It is only recently that the peace of an empire was in jeopardy, because a full-stop was misplaced. Dr. Jameson's premature entrance in the Transvaal is said to have been due to this.

How thankful we should be, that our admission to the privilege of the Kingdom of God does not depend upon our pronunciation; that the reality of the new-birth is not tested by the accuracy with which we utter the creed; that we shall not be excluded from the gates of the New Jerusalem because we fail in the utterance of an "h." Our acceptance with God does not depend on how much we believe. The woman who was healed had very inadequate notions of faith and Christ. She thought that his garment would communicate blessing, yet she was cured. The dying thief had but a glimmering ray of knowledge of the majesty and power of Jesus, but he entered Paradise in his company. The prime necessity with us, is not faith in the sense of creed, but as standing for TRUST. It is not our belief about Christ, but our trust in Him; not our ability to answer the questions of the Catechism, but our coming to Him, and finding rest to our souls, that will pass us across the fords of Jordan.

MONDAY, March 2.

"IF THE LORD WERE PLEASED TO KILL US, HE WOULD NOT HAVE RECEIVED AN OFFERING AT OUR HANDS."—Judges xiii. 23.

Manoah was a pessimist, given to dark foreboding, fond of anticipating misfortune. So soon as he realised that he had seen the face of God, he made sure that his wife and he would die. His wife, on the contrary, was prone to look on the bright side of things, and she must have been an admirable help-meet. How much some of us owe to the temperament of those with whom we live! Many a time would Christian sit down to die, and succumb in the dark waters of the river, if it were not for Hopeful, who pierces the gloom, and beholds the light shining beyond the cloud.

Often enough Foreboding whispers, "We shall surely die." It is the voice of conscience, dreading the result of sin. It is the voice of mistrust, which fails to look beyond the hills for its help. It is the voice of human frailty. At such times let us look back and recount the blessings of the past. Did not God receive our burnt-offering? Did He not conspicuously answer our prayers? Did He not give his only begotten Son? Has He not led us by his right hand and holy arm? Has He not delivered us in severe troubles? Besides, has He not pledged Himself for the future? Has He not showed us "all these things"? It is impossible to believe that He will allow us to be overwhelmed.

"His love in time past forbids me to think,

He'll leave me at last in trouble to sink," etc.

TUESDAY, March 3.

"OUT OF THE EATER CAME FORTH MEAT."—

Judges xiv. 14.

Young lions roar at the saints. The lion of hell gives them no little trouble, though he may not come upon the path of holiness, for no lion shall be there, yet he comes very near it. "He goeth about like a roaring lion." Temptation may well be compared to the attack on Samson by the young lion of Timnath.

The lion's carcase, lying where Samson had rent and cast it, became the home of honey bees. And as the hero went back to look at it in after days, he obtained meat and sweetness.

How apt the parable! Every conquered temptation yields these two things—strength and sweetness. We are more than conquerors, not only vanquishing the foe, but dividing the spoils of victory.

It yields strength. Each time we overcome sin, the strength of the temptation passes into our hearts, as the Indian warrior supposes that the might of each warrior whom he levels to the dust enters into himself. To resist impatience, makes us more patient in proportion to the strength of the temptation we resist.

It gives sweetness. There is a new gentleness to those who have been tempted, a humility, a modesty, a consciousness of the presence of God, through whom the victory has been secured; a new zest for the word of God. How sweet are thy words to my taste; sweeter than honey and the honey-comb?

WEDNESDAY, March 4.

"AND NOW SHALL I DIE FOR THIRST?"—Judges xv. 18.

It had been a great victory. With the jawbone of an ass Samson had smitten a thousand men. But he knew where to attribute the glory. It was not he, but the Spirit of the Lord which had come mightily upon him. This is distinctly recognised when he called unto God, and said, "Thou hast given this great deliverance by my hand." It was because he had been expending his strength for God, had been, so to speak, burnt up by the Divine fire, that he was able to claim God's interposition for his thirst.

This is the great law of prayer. We have no right to count on God in the agony of a crisis, unless we have been walking in fellowship with Him previously, or are exhausted in fighting his battles. There is nothing that we may not claim of Him when we are living in the current of his life, or when we are exhausted in his service. "Thou hast given me this great deliverance, and now shall I die for thirst?"

God's springs burst out in unlikely spots. He is never at a loss. If there is no natural spring, He can create one. If all around the mighty rocks reflect the sultry heat, and our spirit seems on the point of exhaustion, then in the wilderness, He will cause streams to break out. Be of good courage, fainting warrior! The God who made thee, and has used thee, knows thy frame, and what thou needest before thou askest. Hereafter the place shall be known as "the spring of him that called!"

THURSDAY, March 5.

"HE WIST NOT THAT THE LORD WAS DEPARTED FROM HIM."—Judges xvi. 20.

Beware of unconscious deterioration! Grey hairs may be here and there upon us without our knowing it. The Lord may be gone out on foot so noiseless, that we are not aware that his Spirit has glided along the corridor, and through the doorway, whispering, Let us depart.

Deterioration is unconscious because it is so gradual. The rot that sets in on autumn fruit is very gradual. The damp that silences the violin or piano does its work almost imperceptibly. Satan is too knowing to plunge us into some outrageous sin at a bound. He has sappers and miners engaged long before the explosion, in hollowing subterranean passages through the soul, and filling them with explosives.

Spiritual declension blunts our sensibility. The first act of the burglar is to gag the voice that might alarm, and poison the watch-dog. So, sin blinds our eyes, and dulls our keen alertness to the presence of evil. Thus, the stages of our relapse are obvious to all eyes but our own. We are drugged as we are being carried off captives.

The progress of evil within us is a matter of unconsciousness, largely because we are quick to discover reasons to justify our decadence. We gloss over the real state of affairs. We call sins by other names. We insist on considerations which in our eyes appear to justify our conduct. We still attend to our religious duties, and try to persuade ourselves that it is with us as in times past.

FRIDAY, March 6.

"DWELL WITH ME, AND BE UNTO ME A PRIEST."—

Judges xvii. 10.

Men crave for a priest. In every age of the world's history, where there has been a tent indicating the presence of human life, there has been an altar indicating man's consciousness of God, and a priest suggesting his consciousness of unworthiness to enter into the Divine presence. Man has perpetually taken one of his fellows whose character seemed less blemished than that of others, and after setting him apart with special rites from the ordinary engagements of life, has promised him maintenance and honour, if only he will act as priest. Be my priest, say for me to God what I cannot say. The sacrifices offered by thy hands are more likely to avail with Him than those rendered by mine.

Two mistakes must be guarded against. (1) Let us beware of the religion which ignores man's craving for a priest. The world abounds with attempts at religious systems, from which the conception of the priest is eliminated. These reduce the worship of God to a system of high-thinking, but fail to deal with man's consciousness of sin, and his yearning for a settled basis of peace. (2) Let us remember that all human priests will ultimately fail, and God has put them all aside, setting up the priesthood of the blessed Lord. Stars are needless when the sun has arisen. The human priesthood is rendered unnecessary since the Son of God has passed into the heavens to be a priest after the order of Melchizedek.

SATURDAY, March 7.

"YE HAVE TAKEN AWAY MY GODS, AND THE PRIEST."—

Judges xviii. 24.

Whatever can be taken from us has the mark and signature of man upon it. Since the Jewish priests were not permitted to continue, by reason of death, it was evident that they were men at the best, and nothing that man makes is adequate to supply the immortal cravings of the soul which, having come from God, craves for God.

Change cannot take away our High Priest. All around us is in a state of flux. No two days in the most brilliant summer are quite the same. The hues are deepening towards autumnal decay. But He continueth ever, and hath an unchangeable priesthood. All that He was years ago, He is still, and will be. What to our forefathers, that to us.

The concerns of other souls cannot take Him away. It is not difficult to conceive of the attention of a human priest being diverted from those who once claimed all his help, to fresh interests and younger generations. But, however many they be who flock, as doves, to the windows of Christ's mercy, they will never be able to divert an atom of his love and sympathy from us.

Sins and failure cannot rob us of Him. Indeed, they make Him nearer, dearer, more absolutely necessary. The bands of Danites left Micah wailing, but neither principalities nor powers, sorrows nor sins, can sever us from Him who ever liveth to make intercession.

Manchester.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh has delivered ten anti-infidel lectures under the auspices of the Lancashire and District Christian Evidence Society. Much blessing has attended this effort to reach the sceptical and the indifferent, especially among young men.

Dublin City Mission has eleven agents visiting from house to house, and room to room, in the city, the poor, the sick and dying, instructing them and teaching them the glorious principles of the Gospel. The thirty-fifth annual report states that plenty of work could be found for double that number of missionaries, there being many nominal Protestants embedded in a mass of people only too ready to proselytise them. A number of incidents arising in the work are given, the committee believing that the past year was one of real and constant blessing to souls. The office of the mission is 9, Anglessea street, Dublin.

The Mandarin's Little Page Boy.*

I HAD often noticed Chih Shwin's bright black eyes and intelligent face as he sat on a bench quite near to me during the Sabbath services. I had not been very long in China then; but the Chinese faces, which to anyone fresh from home seem to look so very much alike, were beginning to appear as distinct and different to me as the faces of friends in dear old England.

One summer Sunday afternoon, when I had been in Wuchang for about a year, the afternoon service being over, I was sitting waiting till Mr. Bryson should have finished answering the questions of some of the congregation who wished to speak to him. My little friend Chih Shwin came into the room, and began to talk to me. Now, it happened that I had in my pocket a small tract or leaflet, which had been written by one of the Chinese Christians. It was in simple ballad form, like many of the songs which the Chinese like to hear. Instead, however, of some foolish tale of the strange doings of the gods, or some foolish sentimental love story, it told of a babe which had a manger for a cradle, but at whose birth heavenly strangers sang sweet songs of peace and joy to all men. It went through all the wonderful history in graphic, simple rhyme. The characters in which the verses were written were easy to read, and I asked my little friend to go over them with me. He tried to do so, but stumbled over many words, and looked so much confused that a coolie, who was peering curiously in at the door, laughed aloud. "You pretend to read!" he exclaimed. "Why, boy, you hardly know a word!" Poor Chih Shwin looked quite abashed, for Chinese boys are as vexed at being laughed at as English children.

"How I wish I could learn to read better," exclaimed the lad. "Some time ago I used to come regularly to the school Mr. Bryson carried on here. Then he went back to England, and it was closed. There is no Christian school I can go to now, and father says I shall not go to the other schools, where the boys must worship Confucius and the god of literature. How I wish we had a Christian school opened here again."

I wished that too, nearly as much as Chih Shwin, but there was just one obstacle in the way. You cannot open a school either in England or China, without having some money to pay the teacher, and buy stools, desks, books, writing materials, and other necessary things; and where was the money to come from? We thought about the matter a good deal, and prayed about it too; at last, one day, when the English mail came in, it brought me a letter from a Sunday-school in a town far off in England. It said that the children of the church of which John Bunyan was once pastor had sent me some money which they had collected, and wished to be used in teaching Chinese children. How glad the boys and girls were, when I told them, and particularly some of the older Christians, who knew something of Bunyan, and his wonderful pilgrim. The "Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated into Chinese, and Christian appears in the dress of a Chinaman in the illustrations, with pig-tail and flowing robes. With this contribution we commenced our school, and though often we had very little money to carry it on, the gifts of friends in England, and the contributions of gentlemen in the English settlement of Hankow, have enabled us to keep it open ever since.

Chih Shwin was, of course, one of our first scholars, and we were much pleased with the rapid progress he made in all his studies. He continued to attend school for some time, till at last his father's serious illness made it necessary for him to do something for his own support. A sympathising friend, who had some influence in the yamen, or official residence of the Futai or mandarin, obtained for him the situation of a page-boy there. So Chih Shwin left school, and was at once thrown into the midst of a number of men who hated the religion of Jesus, and who were always inventing wicked tales about the Christians. He carried with him in his little box his school Bible. Sometimes he used to feel tempted to keep the sacred book hidden away, fearing lest the other servants might see him reading it and take it away from him. Then he remembered all he had learnt at school, as well as the wise counsels of his Christian father, and determined that, although he was only a very young soldier, he would not be ashamed of his colours.

But the mandarin, his master, was accustomed to go round the house sometimes at night, when all the rest of his household had retired. One evening, he suddenly opened Chih Shwin's door, and there he saw the boy, by the dim light of the flickering lamp, bending over his book intently reading one of the beautiful Scripture stories.

The boy was discovered at last, and he expected nothing less than dismissal from the mandarin's service when he discovered that he was connected with the despised sect of the Christians. It was with a fearful heart that Chih Shwin placed his Bible in the official's hand, which was held out to receive it. The Futai turned leisurely over the pages, reading a passage here and there. Apparently the verses which caught his eye were such as met with his approval, for after a time he returned the volume to the lad with the remark, "I have read strange stories of that book, but do not notice any evil teachings in it. You can keep it if you like." Chih Shwin felt as if a great load had been lifted from his heart as his master left his room, and his faith was stronger than ever in the God who was able to protect him in the mandarin's mansion, just as He had preserved the little Israelitish girl long ago in the home of the Syrian general.

The mandarin had become attached to his little Christian page, and asked Chih Shwin to accompany him to the far-away province of Kiang-Su. So the lad went, and remained with his master for about a year, till hearing of the serious illness of his father, he gave up his situation, and came the long journey up the great Yang-tse-kiang, that he might see him once more before he died.

After his return to Wuchang he was taken into the service of an American missionary, who allowed him to come regularly to his old class in the Sunday-school. His master was much pleased with the lad's industry and attention to his duties. After Chih Shwin had been with him for a little time he felt anxious that a lad so bright and intelligent, who was also a Christian, should have greater advantages in the way of education, so that in the future he might be able to teach and preach the Gospel to his own countrymen. So Chih Shwin, through his master's influence, was admitted into a training college in Shanghai, where many young men were being educated for the Christian ministry. He has been there for some years now, and in time to come, the God whom he served in the mandarin's yamen will strengthen and bless him when he stands up to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation through Jesus, to those who have never heard it before.

What a Pail of Water Did.

YOU have heard, I expect, of the dynamite explosion in Johannesburg, where such dreadful havoc was caused. Your parents will tell you all about it if you ask them.

Large pieces of burning material flew about in all directions, and one piece actually fell into a dynamite factory some distance away. This was enough to cause a second explosion far more terrible than the first, which would have caused destruction of life and property for miles round. What do you think prevented it?

The dangerous missile fell into a pail of water, which extinguished it. What a hissing it must have made, and how frightened the people in the factory must have been until they understood what had occurred.

I think that is something like children's tempers. Sometimes a quarrel arises which causes a great deal of trouble, and in the heat of the discussion a fiery remark or threat is shot out which will make things worse than ever. But some wise boy or girl, by tact or kindness, manages to turn it off so that it expends itself in a bit of splutter, but does not do any harm. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." Look up these texts—the first in Proverbs, and the second in Ephesians. Learn them by heart, and try to remember them directly the quarrelling begins.

1. Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue. 2. Those received later, in the one following.

But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the competition appears.

ABOUT PRIZES.

On March 26 there will be special "Bible Searcher" Questions, for which prizes will be given. But only those boys and girls will be allowed to compete whose names have appeared in the lists as "correct" nine times during the twelve preceding weeks.

Those who have joined too late, or have been unsuccessful too many times, to make up nine "correct" weeks by that date, must wait till the next Prize Questions, of which I shall tell you in good time. But you see how important it is for you to send "correct" answers every week if possible, so that you may be able to compete for the prizes when they are offered.

* FROM CHILD LIFE IN CHINESE HOMES. By Mrs. Bryson. (Religious Tract Society.)

British College Christian Union.

We extract the following from an occasional paper recently issued by this Union (formerly known as the Inter-University Christian Union).

THERE can be no question that the Spirit of God is working mightily in our midst: from colleges in all parts of the country come tidings of the formation of new Unions, and of fresh forms of activity undertaken by old ones. Five new Unions at least have already been formed, viz., at Durham University, Liverpool University College, Yorkshire College, Leeds, Gorton College, Cambridge, and Newnham College, Cambridge; while Westfield College, London, and the Medical School at Newcastle are taking steps in the same direction. At the same time contact has been made with some other institutions which already had a more or less organised Christian Union, but which had not yet entered into any practical relationship either with the B.C.C.U. or S.V.M.U. Among these may be mentioned St. David's College, Lampeter; the Women's Bible and Missionary Union of University College, Aberystwith; Cavendish College, Cambridge; Cheltenham Training College (men), and the Military Academies at Woolwich and Sandhurst. It will be of interest to know that in both of the last-named places, there is a small body of Christian men who are seeking to uphold the standard of Christ, and whose arms we must faithfully support by prayer.

"In many of the older Unions new departures have been taken, and definite results have been achieved. Oxford entered upon work among the freshmen after a special conference for college secretaries and others, held at Wycliffe Hall. This has borne fruit, and a larger number of freshmen than in any previous year are reported as attending the daily prayer-meeting; in one week ten men were led to Christ, largely through personal work. There is strong probability also that the quiet work which has been going on in the ladies' colleges will speedily culminate in definite organisation.

"Cambridge arranged a special mission at the beginning of term, and at the closing meeting, when an invitation was given to those who were desirous of taking a decided stand for Christ to signify the same by rising, upwards of 100 men stood up, this being in the majority of cases their first public profession of Christ. Among five of the London hospitals a special mission was organised by the Medical Prayer Union, a meeting being held at each in turn.

"The Edinburgh Medical Students' Association have organised six social meetings at the houses of professors or doctors, the plan being to invite about an equal number of senior men and freshmen, in order that the latter may have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the former. The Arts Christian Association has made considerable progress. We hear also of a splendid start having been made among the lady students. Glasgow reports the acquisition of new Association rooms, and the starting of two daily prayer meetings. The Christian medical students at Bristol are uniting to pray for a great revival both among themselves and their fellow-students. Newcastle tells of a daily prayer meeting, and of many students having attended Rev. John McNeill's much-blessed Mission. A conversation of a missionary character is held in connection with Magee College, Londonderry, and a large attendance recorded; the Victoria College ladies have a successful campaign among the new students.

"All this should inspire labour in prayer and effort yet more fervently for the salvation of fellow-students."

A CALL TO PRAYER

for theological students has been issued by the Union. There are nearly seventy theological colleges in the British Isles, with a student population of over 2000. This means that every ten years more than 8000 men pass through these colleges into spheres of unique influence. There is much need to see to it that spiritual vigour is daily increasing, and that religious activity is spontaneous and not professional. For the week of special prayer the present week is being observed. The definite subjects of intercession should be:—

(1) A great deepening of personal religion among theological students; (2) The promotion of the spirit of true unity; (3) The evangelisation of the world. To accomplish this purpose more effectually, the following methods may be found useful:—

(1) At daily prayer or the meetings of classes mention should be made of these points. (2) The students should meet once each day for united prayer and the quickening of spiritual life. (These meetings might be made very powerful by including a series of addresses on personal holiness.) (3) Colleges near each other might arrange to have united meetings during the week. (4) Ministers should be requested to commend theological colleges to the prayers of the Church.

LONDON POVERTY.

The "Dossers Out."

THE wrecks of humanity who crowd the common kitchens have reached, it may well seem, the lowest and last stratum of utter wretchedness; but still there remains a depth beyond. If the "dossers in" be unfortunate, what of the pitiful "dossers out" who throng the Embankment, crouch under the parapets in the small hours of the night, or huddle together in the recesses of the bridges? These are the shelters most frequently sought; but the absolutely homeless may be discovered in all sorts of out-of-the-way nooks and corners, in doorways, under arches, in standing vans, and on common staircases where the front door lies open all night, as in many of the lower-class dwellings. The poor tenants suffer much from the "leavings" of these free lodgers; but, as one woman remarked to me, "What can we do? The poor creatures have nowhere to go. If we complain and have them turned out, they'll die in the streets, so we've to let them be; but it's bad for us, they do leave such a lot behind them."

A little while ago I joined a scouting expedition among "dossers out." Our object was to seek such before they settled down to sleep, and discover those who were on the streets by genuine misfortune, and who might really be helped. Alas, there are whose one aim is but to win a few coppers daily to spend in drink, and who care not where or how they pass the night. Long self-indulgence, dire want and misery, sometimes disease, have brought them to sheer hopelessness. Now and then, as by a miracle, one may be awakened to accept a chance of escape; but mostly they are in a lethargic, anæmic condition, caring only to be let alone.

Not so with all "dossers out." Every here and there one comes on decent people, "down on their luck." Homeless and helpless, they sleep on the streets simply because they have nowhere else to go. These are largely country people, unfamiliar with London, scarce knowing that there are casual wards or where to find them. Others are labouring men and women, out of work, and hopelessly stranded. Being strangers to the dodges whereby the habitual tramp finds something to eat, these are often in utter starvation, unless a fellow dosser with a bag full of scraps take pity on the gaunt, famished women and children. It is a gross mistake to fancy these shivering wanderers are all depraved—the truth often is rather that they come to this condition because they are not depraved. The men have not learned to steal, the women to sin, and even the children are as yet ashamed to beg. Anyone who keeps his eyes open will see such families, walking along wearily and aimlessly, asking nothing from anyone, yet evidently nearly dropping on the ground with faintness. At night they have no coppers for a "kip," and cluster together in some corner to gain a few hours' sleep and forgetfulness. One such family we found in a sheltered doorway not far from the Minories. They had tramped—the man being out of work—from Leicester. On the country roads they managed to get food from cottagers, but in London, friendless and frightened, nothing was to be had, or, rather, they did not know how to get it. Work, in the condition the father then was, was hopeless. The three children were wailing with hunger, the mother like to faint. A day more must have ended it for some of them; but help had come. We could not leave them thus. They were guided to a Shelter, fed, warmed, and cheered. Now they have gone back to the country, wiser by this grim, hard lesson.

Another, a big, strong, hulking lad, but an utter stranger to London, had come seeking work. Not knowing how to go about it, he had failed. His clothes became shabby, and he lost hope. A few words—the first kind words since he reached the great city—won him. Coming with us, he was sheltered, and put on his feet once more.

Among a knot of men crouching together on one of the bridges, we found several who declared they had lost their places because they were advancing in years, and younger men were preferred. Three had been clerks, one a baker, one a painter, and another worked in a brewery. Most of them suffered badly in their legs from constant tramping, getting wet, and want of food. Work was improbable, and while shelter and food were offered for the night, they were urged to go into the workhouse.

Many men in this and other groups were obviously that is, ruined body and soul by drink. Their only idea in life now was to loaf at the corner, and cadge for a drink from old mates, or anybody else looking likely to stand them one. There are many such in the common kitchens as well as on the streets, for they know enough to get a few coppers for a bed when they care to.

As to the women found dossing out, they are (apart from countrywomen tramping up to London with their husbands, and failing to find work—a class who may easily be helped when discovered) charwomen and seamstresses out of work and ailing; deserted wives, whose homes have been sold out by the landlord; friendless servant girls, who, in some inexplicable way, considering the demand for maids, have lost their places, have no character, and have come to want, being turned out of their temporary lodgings when funds ran out; also, here and there, though not a large number, of sick homeless outcasts, tasting the last bitter days of sin. Amongst these various types, some can be helped to work, others sent to hospitals and workhouses, while a few cannot or will not be helped at all—give them gin, they care for nothing more.

But, now, are there helpers for such? Are there those who

the tenants of the streets? There are. Field-lane has its refuges for such. St. Giles' Christian Mission has its shelter where every night policeman knows he may send a homeless girl found sleeping out. The Christian Community offers a warm hall to sleep in, and counsel and aid when likely to be of service. Medland Hall shelters large numbers of the homeless class, and is adding a fresh shelter to help more. Ham Yard, too, offers retreat to others. And the Salvation Army, with its Blackfriars and other penny shelters, provides for hundreds who can find a single copper. Thus, as I said in opening, those who know their way about can, if they choose, find somewhere to go. It is the greenhorns—those who have come down, or who have come in, from the country—who know not where to turn. There are, happily, those who seek for such, but it is trying work; it means late, weary hours, and contact with malodorous and unpleasant people; and only the strong in faith and the strong in physical health can undertake it with hope of success. One rejoices to know that even a few such night toilers are ready to bear all so that the lost may be found.

PEARL FISHER.

THE LATE

Hon. Walter Stuart, MASTER OF BLANTYRE.

ALMOST a year ago there was called home from his early stewardship and service, in the prime of life, one who trod so closely in the footsteps of Jesus Christ that his death brought to a wide district the sense of irreparable loss. This was the Master of Blantyre. A brief but pathetic and beautiful biographic monogram of his last years has been written by Miss Catherine Marsh (Nelson and Sons), and it is from this book that the following details are drawn.

WALTER STUART was the only son of the twelfth Lord Blantyre, and according to Scottish custom he bore the honorary title of Master of Blantyre. He was born in 1851, so that when he was taken to his heavenly rest last Spring he had scarcely attained his forty-fourth year. Miss Marsh thus sums up his position and character:—"The possessor of many earthly advantages, he had before him the prospect of a life of wide-spreading influence. Brave as a hero when confronted with danger, and gentle as a woman to those whom he loved, he combined the strength of a resolute man with the tender heart of a child."

From childhood, as we learn, he had shown the fearless hardihood and love of adventure which were distinguishing traits in his after life. While still very young, he began to take a keen interest in farming, and made it his life occupation; first in Argyllshire, then for a season in Australia, and latterly in the north-western corner of the Scottish mainland. Before settling down, he had gone round the world, meeting with not a few adventures, and having some hairbreadth escapes. For twelve years he was tenant of a large sheep farm in Sutherlandshire, and in that district he enjoyed a popularity which one of his biographers describes as "quite unique," by reason of his unwearied helpfulness to the poor of the neighbourhood, and his genial kindness towards all. The last years of his life were chiefly passed at Eilanreach, in the district of Glenelg, Inverness-shire, where he had a farm, and where he spared neither thought, pains, nor purse, in his earnest endeavours to promote the physical comfort and spiritual welfare of his neighbours.

A relative writing to Miss Marsh after the Master of Blantyre's death, alludes to the service he was glad to render to the poorer section of the community. In these days, when so many complaints are heard of the gulf of indifference which separates rich and poor, it is truly refreshing to learn how the grace of God wrought in the heart and life of this young nobleman, prompting him to constant deeds of thoughtful self-sacrificing kindness to those of a humbler social station. Says the writer:—

He did much to improve Glenelg when he was there. He made a postpath, kept it in repair, and got a daily post provided. He secured a telegraph wire, by giving a large guarantee. He built good houses for his shepherds. He kept three pairs of horses that were quite unnecessary for himself, and which he used to plough the crofters' lands for them. He grew potatoes, oats, and turnips in order to give the people employment, though it would have been much cheaper to have bought them. He provided the poor with coals at two shillings a ton less than it cost him to procure them, and delivered them free of cartage. He took a leading part in the work of the Parochial Board, and the people went to him constantly for advice. During the last winter of his life he conducted magic-lantern services for the people in the Mission Room which he had built. If the people were sick he visited them and sent them food: he also lent them money to enable them to tide over bad times.

If all the titled class of Society in these realms were animated by such a spirit as those actions indicate, there would surely be no dissent from the famous couplet which has brought down no little satire on the head of its author:—

Let laws and learning, art and science die,
But leave us still our old nobility.

A great part of Miss Marsh's interesting sketch is taken up with the spiritual experiences and Christian endeavours of this truly noble scion of our Scottish aristocracy. Before she met him first, early in 1891, he had been earnestly feeling after God, and desiring more conscious knowledge of and communion with Him. She was able to minister guidance to him, and his subsequent correspondence with her reveals a heart thoroughly set on pleasing and serving the Saviour, in making Him known to others, and in commending his Gospel by a lowly consecrated life. He was full of schemes for the enjoyment and the spiritual good of the people. The lantern services which have been referred to were utilised to illustrate the "Pilgrim's Progress" to the country-folk in the long winter evenings. He arranged special Gospel missions, with the sympathy and help of the local Presbyterian pastors. Throughout two winters, and on into the early spring, he engaged the continuous services of an evangelist, who laboured earnestly and successfully among the people. His own Christian life, moreover, was singularly bright and cheerful; no one could say (as might truly be said of not a few in that part of Scotland) that his religion had made him gloomy or morose. His presence, says Miss Marsh, was like the sunshine, or like a breeze from his beloved sea.

This reference to the sea reminds us of his yachting voyages along that beautiful, but wild, western coast. He used his yacht not alone for personal recreation but for the good of others in varied ways. A month, or rather more, before his death he got delivery of a new yacht which he had specially built, that he might help the crofter fishermen of the district to get their goods to and from the markets at nominal rates. His devotion to the interests of his neighbours, indeed, was the immediate cause of his being prematurely cut off in the very prime of his days. He had made several voyages in the new yacht between his residence and the Clyde, round the Mull of Cantyre, in the terribly cold weather of February of last year. Though in command he always took his four hours' turn on the bridge, day and night. Thus the fatal chill was taken. "He who lived for others, without a thought of self, literally laid down his life for them; and to that heroic nature no other ending of life could have been so welcome."

The cold settled on his lung, and although he had all the attention and care that the best medical skill could procure, he succumbed to the attack after a brief illness. During his sufferings he exhibited such calmness and resignation and even joy, at the prospect of entering into the nearer presence of his God and Saviour, that one of the doctors was constrained to testify: "I have seen many sick beds, but none that affected me so much as his." The account given of his closing earthly moments by the other medical attendant is singularly pathetic:—

Just before his last breath expired, he appeared to summon up all his energy and regained a conscious and clear state for a minute. He shook hands with Dr. F— and myself. Then he took hold of Mr. C— by one hand and Duncan F— (his personal attendant) by the other, and said, "Good-night, good-bye; I am dying. Pull together, boys, when I am gone." A moment later he said, "Full steam ahead," then he sank back on his pillow and calmly passed away, the expression on his face one of happiness and peace.

Great and genuine was the mourning among gentle and simple alike when the sad news of the Master's death was known. His body was followed by a large and sorrowing company to the yacht that bore the loved remains to Glasgow, whence they were taken to the family place of sepulture in Haddingtonshire. For nearly a year now he has been experiencing the joy of his Lord, but many a year will pass before his loved and cherished memory will fade from the stricken hearts of the people for whose well-being he planned, and toiled, and died.

Mr. Sankey in California.

IN the San Diego Union of Feb. 3 we find some very interesting references to Mr. Sankey's visit to the Pacific Coast. Our contemporary says:—

"Hundreds of persons were unable to get into the First Presbyterian Church building last night to hear Mr. Ira D. Sankey sing. Nearly every seat was occupied half-an-hour before the time set for beginning the services. Men and women stood up along the wall and in the aisles. There were many in the congregation who seldom go to church, but the fame of the singer was sufficient to draw them to the sanctuary. Mr. Sankey expressed great pleasure in being in Southern California at this season, and stated that the journey from Brooklyn had been taken for the benefit of Mrs. Sankey's health. They expected to remain a few weeks on the coast, he said, and would then return to the east, where he is still engaged with Mr. Moody in evangelistic work."

After describing the impressions made by Mr. Sankey's songs (among others, "When the Mists have Rolled Away," and "The Ninety and Nine") the account proceeds:—"Mr. Sankey is an eloquent preacher as well as a singer. After his opening song at the Methodist Church he preached an able sermon, from Matthew iv. Altogether, yesterday was a very busy day for Mr. Sankey. In the morning he assisted in the services at Graham Memorial Church at Coronado, and in the afternoon preached and sang to the sailors on board the cruiser Philadelphia, in the harbour. The evening was passed at the Presbyterian and Methodist churches."

Against the Tide.

A STORY FOR GIRLS.

EVERYBODY stopped to look at Rose Cottage and its garden. That is, everybody who loved flowers, and was attracted by an air of the most comfortable cleanliness, and the most cleanly comfort. Inside, everything was just as sweet, neat, and homelike as the outside was inviting. From this little nest of a sweet country home Mary Ellam was sent one day in early spring to a large house in London, where she was to train as house-maid under several other servants and a housekeeper.

The morning she left home, her father and mother specially commended her to God's keeping, care, and love.

"For," said her father, "you are going among strangers, and some of these are sure to think and act contrary to the teachings of Christ. Be on your guard, dear child, and watch against temptation." At prayers the night before, father, mother, and five children had asked that Mary in everything might serve only God.

As the young girl stepped out into the fresh morning air her mother said to her, as she gave her the parting kiss: "'Tis not to be expected as you'll find London air so good as this, but there's many things you'll learn there for your good as I can't teach you here. Be a good girl, that's all, and you'll find your place here always ready for you when you come home. And here's a posy for your new missis."

The "new missis" was Mrs. Grant, the housekeeper, and when Mary put the country flowers into her hand, she smiled and said, "Ah, sweet, fresh things! But they'll soon fade here. Don't let me see that you fade, by getting into any bad ways!"

"No, ma'am," said Mary, "I truly hope I may not."

After Mary had been three months in her new place, a very valuable ring was missed from one of the visitors' rooms. Valerie, the ladies' maid, said she had seen Mary leaving the room silently half an hour before the robbery or loss was discovered. The housekeeper questioned Mary as to this:

"Yes," said Mary, "I did leave the room quietly. I had been called there by Emily to help strap a trunk, and I left the room noiselessly because I was not on my own floor." Emily was questioned, and said Mary's explanation was the right one.

"I had to strap a trunk for Mrs. A." (the visitor who had lost the ring), "and I saw Mary passing through the hall and called her up for a minute. She kept quiet for my sake, as I felt I ought not to have called her upstairs."

But, somehow, Valerie managed her story so well, and insinuated one or two other things besides, that Mary was regarded in the servants' quarters with doubt, to say the least of it. At last Valerie complained of the loss of a silver bracelet. "Someone is a thief in this house," said she, "and I am going to find out who it is. I think I know, but I will be sure."

The servants offered to have their boxes searched, but Mary—unversed in the ways of the servants' world, was silent. She felt she did not care to have all her little home treasures displayed before so many unsympathetic strangers.

"We will begin with the youngest," said the butler, winking. He and the ladies' maid were great friends at this time.

Mary reluctantly gave up the keys of her box, and almost the first thing that came to view was a piece of lace, the property, as Valerie testified, of the lady of the house. Then the bracelet fell out of a folded apron, and everyone was ready to say, "Look farther, the ring is sure to be there." Mary was stunned. She could not believe her eyes "I did not put those things into my box," she sobbed, "and last night they were not there, I am sure."

Everyone laughed at this. Then the butler asked, "Did you lend your keys to anyone else, my dear?" "No-n-no!" sobbed Mary, "I always keep them in my pocket." "Well, we shall have to see what is to be done," was the butler's verdict. "This will have to be put into the proper hands, but as it's late to-night, and there's a big dinner on, I think we'd better wait till to-morrow." That night the poor child thought her heart was broken; she could not sleep—they had put her in a tiny room off Valerie's, the latter saying "she would take care the little thief did not escape in the night." She heard Valerie come late to bed, and about an hour afterwards the sound of crackling, and a low roar attracted her to listen, in the midst of her weeping. A bright light glowed into her little room—she rushed into the next room to find it in a blaze, Valerie fast asleep, a brandy bottle and glass by her side near the bed, and the flames fast leaping to where she lay. The child shook the sleeper—"Oh, do wake, Miss Valerie! Oh, Mademoiselle, the house is on fire, and you'll be burned to death! Wake—wake!"

At last the maid awoke from her heavy sleep—a sleep made fast and foolish by strong drink—and shrieked with fear. She was mad with terror and rushed to the door, locking it in her frenzy. Mary struggled with her, trying to open the door, but the mad woman clung only the closer to the handle. "Oh," she screamed, "save me, and I will confess that I took the ring—I put those things in your box—I—oh, save me!"

Mary felt that she must at all costs get the maid out of the room somehow—she was suddenly happy and calm, and in her joy did not see that the flames were creeping to where they stood by the door. It was no use speaking to the maid, she was mad; with all her strength the poor girl wrested the other away from the door, half-supporting her, and, turning the key, led the fainting, terror-stricken Valerie out to the landing. Then, without a thought of herself, or of rousing others, she returned to the chamber, and was attempting to put out the roaring flames with the water she found in the room, when suddenly she felt dizzy and fell fainting to the floor. By this time Valerie's hysterical cries had roused the household, who came from their different rooms to the scene of the fire, which was now appearing on the landing. Everyone set to work, and it was stayed, but Mary was found to be severely burned and quite unconscious. Valerie, in her terror, confessed everything—she did not know what she was saying, but fright acted upon her conscience and her tongue, and Mary was cleared.

The poor girl was still unconscious next morning, when the doctor said that shock, as well as her burns, caused this. For some days her life was despaired of; but when she began to mend, she did so rapidly.

"Who is this girl who not only forgives but rescues her enemy at the risk of her own life?" asked Mary's master, who had heard the whole story, having demanded to do so. He was told she was a country girl who had evidently been well trained at home. The housekeeper added, "She is religious, like her parents. It was that which first made Valerie dislike her, and resolve to get her out of the house. I think, sir, that Valerie is now a changed woman." When Mary's parents heard everything, they resolved that as soon she was well enough to travel she should return home, never to take service in London again.

"I cannot hear of it," said her mistress. "Mary has nearly lost her life in my house; she must stay that I may prove how I value such a character and such services."

So after a month's rest at home Mary returned to London, and finding that Valerie (who had begged to be allowed to remain and retrieve her lost character) was there also, she asked that she might continue to sleep in the little room adjoining the maid's. In this way the two grew to be great friends, and Mary had the joy of finding that Valerie was really a changed character.

Mary wrote home to her parents, six months after her return:—"I feel I must shine for Jesus here, there is so much need of it. Valerie is my best friend next to my mistress; she is sincerely penitent and really a Christian now."

"Dear mother, though things looked so dark here at first, that text you gave me on the morning I first left home, how true it is! 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' Even in the fire this is true."

Mary's mother gave me this account, saying:—"Many girls go with the tide and are lost. Ah! if they only had enough Christ in their hearts to love and to resist their enemies, don't you think, ma'am, domestic service would soon become the most honourable employment?" And I said, "I do."

Armenia.

IS this the vision of the Seer of yore?

Lies the great tribulation at our door?

Staggers poor Earth the last stage to ascend?

And have we "the beginning of the end"?

The skies are blue, no thunder-cloud is there;

Yet bolt on bolt may cleave the charged air.

Though springing flowers are ready to our hand,

Hangs not the curse of Meroz o'er our land?

Beats not the nation's heart? Can deeds of wrong

Awake no other answer than a song? [vain]

If swords must gleam, bear they not swords "in

Who draw them not to cup the captive's chain?

Are we, like priest and Levite, passing by,

Regardless of our suffering kinsmen's cry?

What if white Britain writhed in mortal pain!

What if the cries were ours, all cried in vain!

Though strange paralysis be on "the Powers"!

Must weeks and months be measured from the hours?

Arise, O Lord, for there is none but Thou;

Send thy salvation, send thy succour now!

Avenge the sorrows of a martyred race,

And purge the nations from their dark disgrace!

LUCY A. BENNETT.

Cootham, Sussex.—The work at Cootham Mission-room has now been carried on for something like twenty-two years, with many signs of God's blessing. It was first opened by the late Mr. Walter Stanford as a place where the "Gospel of the grace of God" might be preached in its purity. Four services are held weekly, expenses connected therewith being met by the offerings of the people. The seating capacity is now greatly taxed, and the earnest desire is to enlarge it to the extent of about fifty more sittings. This can be done at a cost of £35. Towards this amount we shall be glad to have the fellowship of all who desire to enlighten the dark villages. (Mrs.) P. VALLANCE.

Court House, Cootham, Pulborough, Sussex.

West Chelsea.—A large and substantial block of premises specially built by a firm of brewers for a public-house is within measurable distance of being directed to evangelistic purposes. The house, known as the "Ashburnham Arms," stands in a district containing 5000 of the working classes and poor people, and there is no mission room in the district. Vigorous mission work is carried on in St. John's parish, and cottage meetings are held regularly, but the want of a mission room has been long felt. Repeated application has been made at the Brewster Sessions for a licence, but vigorously opposed, the vicar himself appearing in court to oppose the granting of a licence. £200 are needed to purchase and fit the premises for mission purposes. Communications should be sent to Rev. F. W. A. Wilkinson, St. John's Vicarage, West Chelsea.

A Children's Palace.

"NO subscriptions are asked for; none will be accepted; this institution is fully endowed."

What a refreshing announcement to meet with among the thirsty sands of circulars and prospectuses through which the charitable public is daily called upon to force its weary way! One can hardly believe one's eyes, but it is true nevertheless; the writer has not only read it, but has visited the institution to which it refers—the Yarrow Convalescent Home, at Broadstairs.

The history of this delightful retreat is an interesting one. It was founded last year by the gentleman (of torpedo-boat renown) whose name it bears. Finding it in his heart to set aside a large sum of money (considerably over £100,000) for a philanthropic purpose, he hit upon the happy and sensible plan of erecting a Home for the children of respectable parents who, by reason of circumstances, are unable to provide them with that most exhilarating of tonics—a sojourn at the seaside.

It needs no descriptive pen to picture the benefit that such a scheme affords to the thousands of, not exactly poor, but still, necessitous families who, having to maintain a certain social position, find it a hard struggle, year in and year out, upon a limited income to make ends meet. The clergyman with a small stipend, the widow who has seen better days, the clerk whose income barely suffices to keep the home together, the unsuccessful professional man, the skilled foreman—these are types of the classes the institution is designed to befriended. The children have perhaps been ill, and are now on the road to recovery; a brief change would "set them up." "But where is the money to come from?" ask the perplexed parents; and the thought has no sooner seen the light than it is perforce banished into the darkness of disappointed hope.

Here it is that Mr. Yarrow steps in and offers to boy or girl a three weeks' sojourn at his beautiful Home.

The conditions are simple. A nominal payment of 5s. a week, and a specially-reduced railway fare (from London) of 1s. 9d. each way; an assurance of respectability given by a householder; and a medical certificate that the child has neither been suffering from an infectious or contagious disease, nor come from a house where such maladies exist—such are the chief conditions for the admission of the young visitors.

Accommodation is provided for fifty boys (from four to fourteen years of age), and fifty girls (four to sixteen), and such accommodation is rarely met with. The building itself is palatial; the internal arrangements are perfection; the sanitary, ventilating, and heating appliances are elaborately carried out upon the latest scientific principles; while extensive grounds, which lead directly to the cliffs overlooking the sea, are Nature's contribution to the beneficent scheme of the founder.

"And are you happy here, little one?"

"Oh yes. I wish I could be as well looked after at home as I am here," was the reply.

She was a sad-faced little maiden whose form bore evident traces of recent illness, but here she was now, heartily enjoying the blessings of fresh sea air, excellent food, good and careful nursing, and bright surroundings. Standing, sitting, or playing near her were other children, paralysed, crippled, weakly, in various stages of convalescence; but all fully appreciative of the kindness of the certificated nurses (under the able superintendence of Miss Power, late of the Children's Hospital, Great Ormond-street), whose cheeriness and care add so much to their happiness and the prospects of physical recovery.

The Home is vested in four trustees, and full particulars respecting admission may be obtained of the secretary, at the London offices, 73A, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

All that is wanted is a good supply of little inmates. There are thirty now in the Home which only needs to become known to ensure occupation of every vacant bed. This ought not to be a difficult matter. It will rejoice the founder's heart; and will it not also win the blessing of the "Friend of little children," who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me?"

For London Cripples.

A MOST important and significant conference was held on Tuesday week at the offices of the Ragged School Union, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, on "How to make permanent recent developments in work among crippled children." Before the recent Daily Telegraph Crippled Children's Fund, over 2000 home cripples were registered on the R.S.U. books, and were visited and cared for in divers ways. But the general interest aroused by the Fund brought in hosts of names, previously unknown. Every case was investigated by R.S.U. workers, and all proving genuine were registered. Thus there are now some 6500 on the books, and the question is, How are all these to be really helped? Of course many fresh workers have also been called forth, but all feel the need of organisation to prevent overlapping and to promote efficiency. Hence the conference.

Mr. F. C. MILLS opened with a paper, based on long experience in this work, reviewing the origin in the ragged schools, describing its remarkable development, touching on the helpless condition of most of the afflicted ones discovered, and urging the fact that over 6000 now need care, and are open to visitation in London alone. After emphasising the call for fresh helpers, he spoke of home-teaching—such as Miss Smith carries on—and in especial industrial training in arts, by which they can earn in some measure their living.

It is, he said, comparatively easy to get up treats, but much other real work needs to be done. He wants: (1) Visitors to visit regularly helpless cripples who cannot leave home, to tell them of Jesus. (2) To provide instruction for them, either the visitor at home, or in small groups, when possible. (3) By teaching of trades, and in some cases apprenticing the older ones. (4) By providing fresh air and Christian influence at Seaside Homes, suitable to their peculiar needs.

A very practical open conference followed this paper, shared in by Mr. R. Stone, Mr. J. Hall Richardson, of the Daily Telegraph, Mr. John Kirk, Mr. Percy Alden, Rev. J. S. Lidgett, and Sister Grace, of the Bermondsey Settlement, Mr. C. J. Montague, Mr. James Robertson, and several deaconesses and workers. The outcome was the formation of a small committee to consider the whole matter, and confer with the London School Board and the London County Council as to the best and most effective measures to be taken to help most beneficially the hosts of home cripples in London. Friends interested or willing to aid personally should communicate with the secretary of the R.S.U. at the address given above.

Rome in India.—Eighteen nuns and a number of monks were brought to Bombay in Christmas week. The Church of Rome is constantly sending reinforcements of this character, and none but those who are wilfully blind can avoid seeing what stupendous efforts are made by the Roman Church to gain control of the education of the European and Eurasian girls of India. The boys are by no means neglected; but evidently the first care is to get the girls. If the Church of Rome can get the girls of the present generation, she will control the homes of the next generation.—Indian Witness.

Lifeboat Work.

FOR a long series of years the National Lifeboat Institution has been sustaining one of the grandest works of Christian philanthropy known to this age, in the rescue of shipwrecked mariners by means of lifeboats stationed along our rock-bound coasts. As every reader well knows, this work is carried on sometimes at the expense of the lives of the would-be rescuers. The recent Kingstown disaster was one notable and lamentable instance of this. In order to help in maintaining the beneficent operations of the Society, a movement, known as the Lifeboat Saturday Fund, was started in Manchester some five years ago. It caught the popular heart, and since its inception it has quickly spread over a large part of the country, with local committees in most of the large cities and towns of the provinces. Very substantial help has in this way been poured into the coffers of the parent Society.

Last year it was deemed advisable that the headquarters of this young and growing movement should be transferred from Manchester to London. With the new year this transfer was carried out. The Lifeboat Saturday Fund now has offices in Adelphi-terrace, W.C., and Mr. A. P. Smith, of Manchester, who has been associated with the work from its beginning, is the very capable London secretary. The Fund works, of course, in the fullest harmony with the parent Society. Sir E. Birkbeck is chairman of both committees.

Last Friday a meeting was held in the United Service Institution, Whitehall, for the purpose of publicly inaugurating the London work of the Saturday Fund. The chair was filled by the Marquis of Londonderry, who made an earnest speech on behalf of this affiliated channel of awakening and securing public support for the good cause of life-saving at sea. Addresses in advocacy of it were also given by Lord Kinnaird, Lord Tweedmouth, Archdeacon Sinclair, Messrs. J. H. Wilson, M.P., and E. Flower, M.P., Rev. T. S. Treanor (author of "Heroes of the Goodwin Sands"), and Sir E. Birkbeck. It was stated that every effort will be made to secure the co-operation of London employers and of the industrial masses of our great city, in commending the movement to general sympathy. A committee of influential ladies has been appointed, with Lady Rodney as hon. sec., and it is hoped soon to have district committees scattered throughout the metropolis.

the Broussa Orphanage.

THE new report finds its keynote in the Armenian atrocities, which have stricken the people with terror, devastated whole districts, and left many fresh orphans to be cared for. At one time a van-load of orphaned children appeared at the gate. The work in the Orphanage goes on steadily; several boys have left to learn trades, and girls to become teachers. The superintendents say: "Our labour for the next year will be a very difficult one. From our own country we dare not expect any substantial help, for all over the country collections are started for the victims of the late atrocities, who escaped with their lives and skin, hiding themselves in caves and hollows of trees, feeding upon leaves and roots. For these, all collect now, and our help is expected in the way of rescuing some of their starving little ones. We, for this purpose, look for chief help to our dear friends in Britain, who during twenty years have lent us a helping hand, without getting faint and weary." Communications may be sent to Rev. W. A. Essery, Bible Lands Missions' Aid Society, 7, Adam-street, Strand, London, W.C. The superintendents are Mr. and Mrs. Baghdasarian.

Deacon Abraham, in a recent letter, says: "My wife and I are very thankful for what the Lord has done for our work. Do not forget us in your prayers. We trust that Simon Lazar and David Mar Yausef will return in good time to their native land, David to be a preacher, and the other to teach the orphans in the workshop. This will prevent our young people from going to Russia and falling into the snares of Satan. We have many refugees from our people in the mountains of Kurdistan; and although we are in debt we cannot withhold our compassion towards them." Communications regarding the work may addressed to Mr. H. Taskor, Brookside, Andover, Hants.

L.C.M. at the Mansion House.

FOR some years it has been the custom to hold at the Mansion House an annual gathering on behalf of the work of the London City Mission in the Central and East-end districts, closely connected with the City. This was held on Thursday evening, when there was a large gathering.

Mr. SHERIFF COOPER presided, and the district secretary, Mr. James Dunn, stated that the Central and East-end comprised 116 districts worked by the L.C.M. As partial support the parent society required £6718 last year, but the amount raised came short of that sum by £850. The committee still retained agents in sixteen districts for which there was no guaranteed support, trusting that God might raise up subscribers.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the number of missionaries at work four years since totalled 500, but, at the present time, owing to lack of funds, there were only 480. Of this number 121 were special missionaries, men who by reason of previous occupation understood the difficulties of those amongst whom they were sent to labour, and were thus particularly fitted to minister to them with success. Mr. F. A. BEVAN, treasurer, explained that it was the two million people in London who never went to a place of worship that the missionaries were seeking to save from moral and spiritual destruction. Mr. Bevan called upon three missionaries engaged in Billingsgate, the Central Meat Markets, and the City taverns, each of whom gave interesting testimonies of their work. Men have been influenced to sign the pledge, others have been converted. As many as 170 men would stay at a time to listen to the Gospel preached. One specially interesting instance mentioned was that of a man who had given up drink and gambling, and was enabled thereby to save £1 a week of his earnings. In conclusion, Mr. Bevan stated that some gentlemen on the Corn Exchange were anxious to raise £80 a year in order to maintain a missionary to labour especially amongst men employed at flour mills. He pleaded earnestly for increased support on behalf of this additional effort and the whole of the Society's work.

Rev. H. E. Fox, of the C.M.S., besides bearing valuable testimony from experience to the earnestness and zeal of the missionaries, dwelt on three important factors which must exist in all successful mission work, namely, system, sympathy, spirituality. His address was a fine vindication of the necessity for such work, as rendering valuable evangelistic aid to the churches, and in no way competing with them. He concluded with a forcible appeal to his audience as to their own living interest in spiritual matters.

Rev. W. WRIGHT, D.D., of the British and Foreign Bible Society, also spoke, pointing out the great and increasing need of such effort as that carried on by the London City Mission.

The Salvation Army.

MANY will hear with regret that the American split, caused by the approaching removal of Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth, has become gravely accentuated. Public feeling in the States seems to be on the side of the Commander retaining charge of the American work, and he has now formally resigned his position in the Army. Pending General Booth's return, the resignation has not been accepted, and Miss Eva Booth is temporarily placed in charge of headquarters in New York.

Jews and Usury.—In times of oppression, when honourable occupations were generally denied them, many Jews adopted money-lending on usurious interest as a means of livelihood. During recent generations, with less excuse, the race has furnished many petty bankers with the spirit of Shylock. The nobility of Jewry in recent years have been much exercised on the subject, and the late Chief Rabbi of British Jews, Dr. Nathan Adler, in his ethical will, said: "Whatever be your calling, continue to shun every kind of usury; for usury still constitutes, alas, the malignant canker which eats into the vitality of the House of Israel." That a wholesome sentiment on this matter is growing, is evident from an article in last week's Jewish Chronicle, which records the fact that at Glasgow a notorious money-lender has been informed that he will not in future be allowed to hold a sitting in the synagogue.

Glasgow Evangelism.

FEW meetings this winter have been more inspiring and more encouraging in the cause of city evangelisation than the annual meeting of the United Evangelistic Association held in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, on Monday, February 17. The great hall was not only filled, but crowded, and crowded for the most part by men and women taking active part in aggressive work throughout the city.

Lord OVERTOUN, president of the Association, took the chair, and accompanying him to the platform was a large force of ministers and prominent Christian workers, while behind them were the Mizpah Band choir, the students of the Bible Training Institute, and members of the various choirs of the Association. Before the meeting and during its progress hymns were sung by the Mizpah Band choir, and by the students, the latter being accompanied by the American organ, a cornet, a flute, and two violins.

The Association was an outcome of Mr. D. L. Moody's work in 1874, and as an indication of the progress made, the hon. treasurer, Mr. Alex. McKeith, stated that in 1874 the ordinary income (from voluntary offerings) was £3848; while for 1895 it was £18,294. During the twenty-two years of the Association's existence £177,945 had been sent in as voluntary contributions. Mr. J. W. Arthur, as hon. secretary, and Mr. MacKeith gave their reports, with illustrations by limelight views of the interiors of the various halls, the modes of work, homes of the fresh-air fortnight scheme, etc., and this novel style of report was much appreciated.

Lord OVERTOUN's address, as president, mainly dealt with the scope and aims of the Association's work, pleading with earnestness that it was not outside the Church, far less was against the Church, but was the Church; ministers and office-bearers of churches forming its directorate, and every worker received into its ranks being understood to be a church member. Mr. JOHN ANDERSON, of the Bible Training Institute; and Mr. ALEX. SLOAN followed, in brief, terse, and bright speeches.

Rev. JOHN McNEILL gave the closing address. Mr. McNeill goes forth on his missions under the auspices of the United Evangelical Association, and it was therefore appropriate that he should report for himself on his world-wide work. Fresh from the large gatherings in Sheffield and Leeds, he was very warmly received, and after a few passages touching upon South African and Australian visits, he came back to the need of the meeting before him, and, from the grand old story of David and Goliath, drove many a lesson home to the assembled workers. He spoke of David's three victories, (1) over himself; giving to Eliab "the soft answer that turneth away wrath," a lesson pointed by the old warrior Paul to young Timothy, "Take heed to thyself, and the doctrine," yourself first, then your rifle; (2) over custom; he could not go in Saul's armour, he must be himself the herd laddie from the hills; (3) over Goliath. What a backing he had! "I come to thee in the name of God." Silence! Silence until you can go in the name of God! And what an easy victory when God works! One stone, and four to spare. So will it be if we go to the fight as the stripping did.

Pastor Brown's Thank-offering Day.

PUNCTUALLY at 7 o'clock on the morning of February 24 Pastor Archibald G. Brown was in his vestry to receive the freewill offerings of those friends who had reason to thank God for blessing through the preaching of his own Word in the East London Tabernacle.

Prayer-meetings were held in the schoolroom below during the day, and the first words of praise, which ascended at 7.30 a.m., "All hail the power of Jesu's name," gave expression to, and were prophetic of, the experience of succeeding hours.

There was a steady stream of offerers all day long. By 10 a.m. £100 had been brought him; by 1 p.m., £200; at 4 p.m., £450; while at the close of the day the total amount stood at £634 6s. 8d.

The Home of Industry.

WHO are these ever-increasing crowds of children that come before the saints of God month by month at the workers' meeting asking their prayers? They are typical of the thousands, now men and women in Canada, who might have been among the submerged but for the hand of loving help. The few condensed histories given below show that it is well to gather them in ere they fall into the fowler's snares. Emigration is a necessary safeguard for the population. If the lovers of children do not wisely see a little money (£10 per child) expended judiciously, much larger sums must be afterwards spent upon them in gaols and workhouses. It is proved that 98 per cent. of the little emigrants grow up into citizens in our colonies.

We place them principally in the farming districts where they are placed side by side in school and in business with the best in the land. Those with special gifts have been aided by a college course, whilst others have become heirs to the farmers' homestead. Over a thousand happy marriages speak louder than words, whilst here we sigh to think of the struggles to live in the one-roomed house, and rear children amid the surrounding drink temptations.

Last summer, a minister called upon us, and selected a boy of nine; he now looks from his pulpit upon three other small boys being reared among the people of his congregation. Hundreds of wholesome facts, verified with one's own eyes last summer in Canada, have encouraged us to rescue the 70th party now in our Training Home: having arranged with Messrs. Allan, of Liverpool, that they shall sail on April 16, under the care of Mr. James Merry. After this we go on training the 71st party, hoping to accompany them to Canada in June or July.

CONDENSED HISTORIES.

Charlie and Georgie, 11 and 10.—Mother dead five years. Father suffering from an incurable disease in the hospital. Unlikely ever to come out again.

Fred and Johnnie, 12 and 9.—Mother died of decline. Were sheltered day after the funeral. In dying, mother asked district lady to bring her boys to us.

Georgie, 11 years.—Father terribly unsatisfactory. Mother, with heart disease, may pass away any moment. Five children on the borders of starvation.

Gordon, 10.—Father did wrong after being in one situation fifteen years, now thoroughly repentant; is in a Salvation Army Home working for his board.

Edward, 13.—A nice boy. Been some years in the workhouse. Two little brothers already in Canada. Father dead, and deserted by mother.

Janie and Mary, 8 and 6.—Mother died a year ago. Father an elderly man, weak in mind, and able to do but little work, quite incapable of looking after them.

Sallie.—An orphan, who lived with an aunt. The aunt was separated from her husband, and obliged to take a situation; so lonely little Sallie was brought to us to love and care for.

Daisy and sister, 10 and 7.—Father's whereabouts not known; supposed to be dead. Mother very unsatisfactory, but trying to do right in a situation.

Thank God, we have hearts in the Home of Industry and its Training Home who can love these dear lambs enough to bathe them and cleanse them, and to try if love and patience for the next few years can make useful men and women of them. It is royal work ministering to such, but it is done for the Master's sake. If those who have stitched and sent us garments to fill the boxes could see the change in each one—no longer self-willed, but obedient and diligent to their teachers—how pleased they would be! When a Canadian mail comes in, bringing us letters brimful of gratitude and happy recollections, all the tears and sad memories blotted out, we can thank God, and take courage. We gratefully acknowledge the help of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN.

ANNIE MACPHERSON.

Ardrossan, N.B.—The Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. have carried on work here for some fifteen years, during the latter part of which the operations have been much hindered by changes and unsuitable premises. Our present hall has been let over our heads, and we know of none in which to carry on the varied work of the Associations. We have for some years been collecting funds to build a hall of our own (estimated cost £500), to consolidate and give permanence to the work. Towards this we have £220 in hand, but our sources are now exhausted. Any help will be very thankfully received.

Evangelical Alliance.

JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

THE Council of the Evangelical Alliance have had under consideration for some time past the detailed arrangements for the Jubilee Conference. One of the greatest difficulties has been to secure a suitable place for the meetings, outside the din and noise of the main streets of Central London. Another difficulty was to avoid clashing with the Mildmay Conference (which is always held at the end of June), and especially as our president is chairman of that Conference, and many of the friends interested in that gathering are members of the Alliance. In view of these circumstances, consultations have taken place with the leaders at Mildmay, and it has been arranged that the Evangelical Alliance Conference should be held jointly with the Mildmay Conference, which was itself founded by a highly-esteemed member of the Council of the Alliance (the late Rev. William Pennefather), and has ever since been conducted on Alliance lines.

The principal subject selected for the Conference is practically the very foundation of the Evangelical Alliance, and at the same time equally appropriate for a Mildmay Conference. It is as follows: The true unity of the Church which is the body of Christ: (1) In new birth and life; (2) in growth and development; (3) as perfected in glory. This general topic will be followed at the morning and evening meetings, except on the Friday evening; while the afternoon sessions will be occupied with other and more general subjects suitable for an Alliance Conference.

The celebration of the jubilee of the Alliance will commence on Tuesday, June 30, at Exeter Hall, when the preliminary prayer meeting will be held in the Lower Hall at 3 o'clock, followed by the conversation and reception; and a public meeting in the Great Hall. All the other meetings will be held at the Mildmay Conference Hall, commencing July 1. On Wednesday, July 1, and each morning afterwards, there will be a prayer meeting at 7 o'clock. This will be followed by the morning session, from 11 to 1 o'clock, at which addresses will be given in English on the leading subject named above—the speakers being British and foreign. In the afternoons the Conference will be divided into sections—French, German, English, etc., at which addresses will be given in various languages by selected delegates. In the evenings brief addresses (in English) will be given by selected speakers, British and foreign.

On the afternoon of Friday, July 3, the united Communion Service will take the place of the sectional meetings, and in the evening of that day there will be a great missionary meeting, followed by two or three brief farewell addresses. On Saturday morning, at nine o'clock, there will be a special conference of Alliance delegates only, to consider matters affecting the whole Alliance; and this will be followed by a praise meeting at eleven o'clock.

It is hoped that the alteration in date will be found convenient to all the delegates from various countries. The invitation to the Jubilee Conference is addressed to Evangelical Christians in all lands; and those intending to be present are requested to communicate as early as possible with the general secretary at the office in London. The council assure all visitors of a hearty Christian welcome, and hospitality will be provided as far as possible for all duly appointed delegates from foreign branches of the Alliance. It is important that early intimation should be given of such appointments.—On behalf of the council,

A. J. ARNOLD, General Secretary.
Alliance House, Adam-street, Strand, London.

The London Sunday School Choir held their annual festival on Saturday last at the Royal Albert Hall. Mr. Luther Hinton, who has conducted these festivals since their commencement, was absent through ill-health, but a very attractive programme was rendered, consisting of oratorios, choruses, etc., by the choir of 1000 voices, assisted by the London Sunday School Orchestra.

Work in Costa Rica.

DEAR SIR,—I do not know the kind friends who regularly send THE CHRISTIAN to me, but I would like to express my gratitude for their kindness, and assure them that it is greatly appreciated. The Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, with which I became connected in 1893, has been labouring here for nearly eight years. At Port Limon a church, holding nearly 500 people, and filled every Sunday (with a substantial dwelling-house), has been built. Along the Costa Rica Railway for fifty miles churches are planted, and being planted. About 122 members have been gathered into these churches, but lack of funds prevents us going forward. It is hard work getting the necessary means from negroes who labour on the banana farms with just enough to support them.

The Roman Catholics are now building churches, in opposition to us, where we have put churches. They get money by lotteries, gambling, and drink for this purpose. Recently they tried to get up a petition to expel all Protestant missionaries from the field, but fortunately the President is too liberal, although we are only tolerated here. They have burned and torn the Bibles sold by agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society. One priest got a lot of ruffians to attack Mr. F. de P. Castells, of the B. and F.B.S., with machetes, knives, and revolvers. Rome does not like the Bible. Missionaries of the Central American Missionary Society in the interior have had to flee at night, under protection of officials, through a priest inciting the people to attack them.

Amongst the Indians, who are in a low, degraded condition, seven missionaries from the U.S.A. have gone to commence work by forming themselves into an industrial mission. Others are expected in the spring.

A magic-lantern, with slides, could be used to great advantage here.—Yours truly,

JAMES HAYTER.

Port Limon, Costa Rica.

Evian-les-Bains, France.

IN a report of their work in the Haute Savoie during last year, the Misses Wellington have to tell of sad disappointments as well as of encouraging successes. What with the darkness of the people and the intrigues of the priests, the lives of our Evangelical friends are a round of anxiety and hard work. The report says:—"There was at one time a great deal of sickness in the villages round, and our nurse's help was invaluable. She was kept well, though out at all times and in all weathers; but it was impossible to reach some of the cases, the villages lying one, two, and three hours away. This made us long for rooms where we could have them under one roof, thus avoiding so great an expenditure of time, strength, and money. We thought and prayed much about it, but the way was not opened, and we were obliged to do the best we could.

"The women's knitting meeting was well attended, and about 100 pairs of stockings were made by them. It was most painful to know of the need last winter among these women, but a generous order for 50s. worth of stockings, which were afterwards sent to poor children in London, enabled us to give them work at home as well as at the weekly meeting, and so tided them over the most difficult moment. It had long been a chateau d'Espagne with us to be able to give employment to the men during those months of the year when they have no work; directly the bad weather comes many find themselves among the unemployed. With the help of three Evian gentlemen a wood yard was opened, which, though on a very small scale, succeeded admirably.

"The Café de Temperance and reading room has been opened as usual to the men in the evening, and to the market women at the weekly market. There is a band of young men who are to be found there nearly every evening, and who thus come directly under Gospel influence, through the meetings and the talks of the evangelist. All the total abstainers are now formed into a section of the Croix Bleue Française. This society is recognised by the State. The lending library has been well used.

"The evangelist, of a singularly sympathetic and loving nature, has been much discouraged by late difficulties. He felt at one time that he must give up his post, but he has taken courage again. The need of distinct Gospel work in the villages round about is pressing much upon our hearts, and we hope to be able to open a room where the evangelist could hold a series of meetings, first in one and then in another, until all the villages have been visited; but this plan will require more money than has hitherto been sent us."

Inquiry Room Cases.

THE following are some of the cases met with in the recent Mission by the Brothers Weaver at the Great Assembly Hall:—

A most interesting case was that of a master cooper, a man of respectable connections, who had been a backslider for fourteen years through the drink. Twenty-five years ago he worked with Richard Weaver and Rev. William (now General) Booth, and was much used of God. It was a touching sight to see him pleading that God would restore to him the joy of salvation.

A sad case of a young gentleman who had spent his all in riotous living. Twice he had been to Australia, to make a fortune and spent it, leaving himself in debt there. When Christ spoke peace to his soul, his one thought was the debt unpaid. He came to see Mr. Weaver, and, filled with joy, said his cousin was paying his way back to the Colonies, where he was going to cancel the money he owed.

One night we found in the inquiry room, a fine bright lad of some eighteen years of age reduced to rags. His story was the fifteenth of Luke retold. We wrote home, found his story quite true, and forwarded him to his parents in the country.

One of the saddest cases was that of a young Irishman and his wife. They were most respectably connected, but the drink fiend had robbed the husband of all true, manly instinct. He had drunk the home from over their heads, and for two nights the young wife, with babe in arms, had walked the streets. In an agony of soul, he poured out his heart to God for forgiveness. The next day, Mr. Charrington sent them home to Ireland, and we have since had a letter saying he had arrived, and confessed Christ to all at his native place.

Modern Spiritualism.

IN the Journal Religieux for February 15, a précis appeared of a series of lectures on Spiritualism and cognate subjects, given at Geneva and Lausanne by Professor Alois Berthoud. Contrasting with the Christian supernatural that which is false and deceitful, the professor pointed out that "whereas the former is a Divine manifestation, the latter has a miserable intercourse with darkness. In all times the effects of thaumaturgy have been nil; magical arts have revealed nothing, have made no contribution to the welfare of the race. In fact, they have but terrified men—have never made them better.

"As to modern spiritism, which arrogates the title of a religious system, spiritualist doctrine, it is unquestionable that it brings men into contact with the world of spirits; but assuredly it does not bring them near to God. Spiritualism is a return to Gnosticism, to Brahmanism; it is the doctrine of emanations reversed. This aberration was victoriously combated by St. Paul, when, even in the first century, it attempted to enter the Church. In the Epistle to the Colossians the Apostle sets over against the entire world of spirits, the Christ in whom all fulness dwells, who fills up and bridges over the abyss between God and man.

"That there are spirits, that there are angels having spiritual ministry upon earth, who will deny a priori? But mere phantoms there are none, excepting in diseased imaginations. The dead can only come back by way of resurrection. Appeals to the dead are the outcome of unbelief, which ever gives rise to superstition. To get rid of the Gospel of grace and pardon, of repentance and sanctification, and to avoid meeting the living and holy God, unbelief, of the type which easily germinates in the human heart, loves to launch into the gloomy and unwholesome spheres of counterfeit marvels.

"In Christ we have all. Even those who seek with wavering need not be discouraged; whose seeks will find. The thirsty shall be satisfied by Him in whom are hid 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.'"

THE BOOK WORLD.

"HIGHER CRITICISM" CRITICISED.

BOOKS which reduce the Pentateuch to a jumble of documents of doubtful origin and still more doubtful authority, are very numerous; and those which "reconstruct" Israelitish history in harmony with an unscriptural theory of development are a great host. Therefore, it is with pleasure that we hail such a work as Rev. Dr. Baxter's Sanctuary and Sacrifice, which is a reply to Wellhausen and all his tribe, a defence of Scripture, and a vindication of what has come to be styled the "traditional" view of Israelitish history.

This substantial volume, by the minister of Cameron, N.B., is a fair and square examination of the modern views, which are shown to be irreconcilable in themselves as well as contrary to Scripture. Those who have followed Old Testament discussions of the past few years will not need to be told that the title of Dr. Baxter's book suggests subjects which go to the root of the controversy. The pages are singularly refreshing as an exhibition of keen criticism; and as we read we are frequently puzzled to choose between the ignorance of Scripture and shortness of memory which consort so easily with analytical genius and historical intuition. Though by no means anxious to be Scriptural, Wellhausen might have aimed at consistency, but this assuredly he did not achieve; and this flagrant deficiency is not supplied by numberless assumptions dogmatically advanced.

In conclusion, Dr. Baxter well says: "The points raised by Wellhausen cannot possibly be regarded as trivial, or as subsidiary. They practically confront us with the alternatives—Is our Old Testament a succession of reliable records? or, Is it a bundle of impudent and discredited inventions? The errors charged throughout our pages have been so numerous, and so glaring, as to put the 'higher criticism,' as represented in its most admired champion, quite effectually on its trial. In assailing his speculations, our only weapon has been a fair and independent comparison of his pages with those pages of Scripture which they profess to expound. We have taken the Bible student to the Bible, and the Bible alone, and there we have felt a firm confidence, as well as a great delight in showing him that Wellhausen's speculations are an unsupported—Imagination." We trust this timely volume will find its way into the hands of many who have been fascinated with recent fabrications, German and English, under the name of Criticism. (6s. Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Lion the Mastiff. By A. G. Savigny. (1s. 6d. Kelly.) The autobiography of a dog, written with a purpose—the inculcation of kindness to animals—and written in a winning and readable style, which will attract young folk and aid in influencing them in merciful ways.

Bethesda Chimes, edited by Pastor F. E. Marsh, is a bright Gospel monthly, of which the first number (dated March) has just been issued. Its contents are of a spiritual type, and it is suitable for localisation. (1d. monthly. F. G. Marsh, 3, Park-place West, Sunderland.)

The Glorious Lord, by Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., is the first volume of the "Golden Library of Christian Doctrine." It contains eleven papers on spiritual heights and depths. In the last, some practical hints are given on the subject of Bible study. (1s. J. E. Hawkins & Co.)

The Bible its Own Evidence. By W. Collingwood. This is a thoughtful little book on the Bible and its writers, teachings, and characteristics. The pages are as simple in style as they are helpful in substance, and we trust they will have many readers. (1s. nett. Scriptural Knowledge Institution, 78, Park-street, Bristol.)

Everybody's Guide to Poultry-Keeping is a useful illustrated manual, by Denzil Sherraton. Everybody's Book of Confessions, for young and old, proposes a host of questions, and gives space for a record of the reader's opinions and feelings, also for a family register of births, marriages, and deaths. (Cloth 6d.; leather 1s. Saxon & Co.)

Life of Christ. Messrs. Cassell & Co. are issuing to the readers of The Quiver Farrar's famous "Life of Christ" at 1s. 6d. As the book was originally issued at 2s., it will be seen that this is a remarkable offer, and affords an opportunity which few will care to miss. The conditions, which are fully set forth in the March number of The Quiver, include the buying of three numbers of that magazine.

Rest and Reaping. Vol. IX. Edited by Charlotte Mason. (2s. Morgan & Scott.) In this volume of her useful little monthly, Miss Mason keeps notes on expository and prophetic subjects well to the front; but, besides, attention is given to the claims of Christian work and workers at home and abroad, not forgetting the House of Rest, with which she is so intimately associated, and for which she is responsible. Thus the annual volume presents much that is stimulating and helpful.

God's Food for the Afflicted.—In our notice, last week, of this book, we gave the author as Rev. J. Barnes; it should have been Rev. J. Burns.

Recent useful additions to Miss Headland's excellent "Sketches of C.M.S. workers" are: "ARCHDEACON COWLEY, for many years a labourer in British America; and Rev. GEORGE SMITH, who did good work in Fuhchow thirty years ago. (2d. each. Nisbet & Co.)

Messrs. Marshall Brothers have issued in pretty booklet form (one penny each) four of Rev. Andrew Murray's very helpful addresses, as follows:—"YE ARE THE BRANCHES"; "WE CAN LOVE ALL THE DAY; CARNAL AND SPIRITUAL"; and "OUT OF THE GRAVE A NEW LIFE."

Professor ZOEGLER, in the Beweis des Glaubens, speaks in high terms of "Lex Mosiaica," the volume of essays, edited by Dr. Valpy French, and published by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. He declares the proofs given of the antiquity of the Pentateuch to be of irresistible importance, and hopes the work will be translated into German. M. E. Doumorgue, writing in Le Christianisme, says that a French translation would probably be equally useful.

Barnwell Mission, Cambridge.

THE new report states that though this Mission bears the name of "Barnwell" it has the whole town for its parish, and reaches to the villages around. Mention is made of the renovation and improvement of the building, the old Theatre Royal, during the past year. The whole work is now in a most flourishing condition. The Weaver Brothers paid a visit to re-open the theatre in August, and their Mission was signally blessed—numbers professing conversion; since then our services have been much better attended, owing to the labours of Mr. Hart, supported by many undergraduates from Corpus, and also of our missionary, Mr. Walker, who by God's blessing has been able to knit our people more closely together in brotherly love and the bonds of the Gospel. During the year we have started a Christian Endeavour Society, which will embrace a fund for the relief of those in sickness or distress. Never in the history of the Barnwell Mission have we had such good reason to thank God and take courage. Next June we hope to celebrate the coming of age of the Mission, the work having been commenced in the Ragged School in June, 1875, by our valued friend, Rev. W. R. Mowll, and others, some of whom have gone to their reward. The hon. superintendent is Mr. Wm. K. Vawser, 38, The Cury, Cambridge.

The Zanzibar Rest.

MR. AND MRS. KNAPMAN have undertaken the charge of this work, and go forth relying on the help in prayer of the Lord's people at home. The new report of the Zanzibar Rest has been issued, showing how God has blessed the constant and faithful testimony of his servants. Reference is made to Mrs. Agnew's return home last year, after three years' useful service, and to the devoted work of Miss Hurditch while holding the fort single-handed.

Readers will like to know something of the friends who are now taking charge of "The Rest." Mr. Knapman spent three years at Harley College, during which time he worked frequently amongst the sailors at the "Ratcliffe Strangers' Rest." He afterwards went to Ireland, where he worked for one year in connection with the Open-air Mission, often amid great persecution, but with abundant blessing from God; he also had charge of a church in Yorkshire, where God manifestly owned his labours. Mrs. Knapman has also been trained by Dr. Guinness, at Doric Lodge, and has varied experiences in mission work. Both these missionaries know "the blessedness of living and working for Him"; their hearts have long been in heathen lands, and they rejoiced when the call came to them from the Master to go to East Africa. Their position is very responsible and important; they will have many difficulties in reference to language and climate, and we would ask the prayers of God's children for them. In conclusion, we would say this work is in great need of liberal help; it depends on God, and on his stewards. Our missionaries who have gone to Zanzibar have no independent means, no private resources, no guaranteed support. Communications should be made to Mr. J. T. Isaac, The Strangers' Rest, 163, St. George's-street, E.

Mr. William Noble addressed a large and enthusiastic temperance meeting at Newport, I.W., last week. On the preceding evening he gave a lecture on "J. B. Gough" to the members of the Ryde Y.M.C.A.

Scottish Notes.

DR. JOHN ROBSON, of Aberdeen, is mentioned as the probable Moderator of the next U.P. Synod. Mr. Robert Donald, of Wellwood, a much-esteemed citizen of Ayr, died last week. He took a deep interest in temperance, educational, and religious work.

The students of the Missionary Society, Edinburgh Theological Hall, have undertaken to raise the cost of establishing a new training college at Bellary, South India.

At a meeting in Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow, in connection with the pioneer work of the congregation, Rev. Wm. Ross made a very gratifying statement of progress. Mr. John Galloway and Lord Overton, two of the founders, gave addresses.

Special services have been held at the Free High Church, Aberdeen, in celebration of the semi-jubilee of the pastor, Rev. H. W. Bell. Dr. Williamson, of Belfast, Mr. Bell's predecessor, preached on Sabbath, and a meeting of the congregation was held on Monday.

Help is needed to enable the Y.W.C.A. to open a restaurant at Peterhead for the women who go there from different parts of Scotland and England for the herring fishing season, which usually lasts from the beginning of July till the end of August. There are generally from 1400 to 2000 women. The secretary, Y.W.C.A., 116, George-street, Edinburgh, will be glad to hear from friends who can aid the work.

At the forenoon service in Mayfield Free Church, Edinburgh, last Sabbath, Rev. Lewis Davidson closed his sermon with an account of the unhappy condition of the Armenians under Turkish rule, and made a strong appeal on their behalf, both on the ground of the terrible massacres that had taken place and the famished condition of the survivors. A retiring collection was taken, which amounted to £120.

Rev. Donald MacEachern, minister of the parish of South Knapdale, died suddenly on Sunday week while on his way to church. The congregation had gathered in the church for the usual Gaelic service held in the forenoon, but as Mr. MacEachern did not put in an appearance, one of the elders went to make inquiries, and found the reverend gentleman lying dead on the road. Dr. Hunter, of Lochgilphead, who was sent for, certified that the cause of death was the bursting of a blood-vessel.

Two cases of deep public interest, were decided last week in the law courts. The Court of Session held that the codicils added to his will by the late Sir W. Mackinnon, revoking legacies amounting to £35,000 for certain Free Church objects, because of the passing of the Declaratory Act, have made these bequests void. The same authority has declined to upset the testamentary dispositions of the late Mr. John Hope, by which he left £85,000 for carrying on total abstinence and anti-Popery crusades. It was contended by the next-of-kin that Mr. Hope was of unsound mind, but the judges could find no evidence of this.

Irish Notes.

A new Methodist mission hall has been opened at Killymaddy, near Armagh.

The evangelistic meetings held under the auspices of the Belfast Presbytery during the past week have been largely attended. Preparations have been in progress since December last. A weekly prayer meeting, begun at the new year, has been continued since, with encouraging results. Revs. S. R. Macphail (of Liverpool) and J. J. Mackay (of Hull) rendered great service during the week.

Gathered Gold.

PREACHING CHRIST.

A philosopher may philosophise his hearers, but the preaching of Christ will alone convert them. Men may preach Christ ignorantly, blunderingly, absurdly, yet God will give that preaching efficacy, because He is determined to magnify his own ordinance.—Cecil.

THINGS THAT WILL COME.

Offences.—Luke xvii. 1.

Death.—Heb. ix. 27; 1 Cor. xv. 22; 1 Kings ii. 2.

Judgment.—2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 10.

He will come.—Heb. x. 37; 1 Thes. iv. 16.

THE FOURFOLD ORDER OF DUTY.

"Take care of number one"—that is, thy soul.

Thy house is second—seek to save it whole.

The church is third—its health and peace pursue.

The world is fourth—oh, seek to save that too.

Follow this fourfold plan—

In Christ's great strength—YOU CAN.

The Y.M.C.A.

MEETINGS for the Deepening of the Spiritual Life were held in the Shaftesbury Hall, South Parade, Leeds, on Friday, Feb. 14th, by Rev. John Sloan, of Glasgow.

For a prize distribution at Aldersgate-street on Wednesday evening the Association was privileged to have the presence of Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Pound, who delivered an appreciative address.

At the Penge annual meeting a balance in hand was reported of £61. Mr. S. Thompson occupied the chair, supported by local ministers and clergy; and Mr. W. Hind Smith represented the National Council.

The Bedford Association reports fifty fresh members since October. The Bible classes, mission services for non-church-going young men and women, open-air services and other operations have been most encouraging.

The annual meeting of the Bishop Auckland Association was held on Wednesday evening, and was well attended. Mr. G. E. Markham, president, was in the chair, and satisfactory reports were presented by Mr. R. Oliver, secretary, and Mr. Joseph Lingford, treasurer.

The Oxford Association held its anniversary gathering on Wednesday week in the Examination Schools. About 1200 were present, and the meeting was pronounced a great success. The Rector of Exeter College presided, the report was wisely taken as read, and addresses were given by Revs. F. B. Meyer and A. T. Pierson, D.D., and Mr. Robinson Souttar, M.P.

The annual meeting of the Birkenhead Association was crowded and enthusiastic. Mr. C. J. Proctor presided. The report showed an increase in membership, now 559, and a large amount of evangelistic and other work. "Success and progress" has been the keynote of the year. Amongst the speakers at the anniversary were Rev. E. J. Kennedy, Dr. Stansfield, and Messrs. Lee and Ralston.

A sub-district conference was held at the rooms of the York Association on Wednesday week, presided over by Mr. J. C. Moor. Interesting papers were read by Mr. J. P. Howard, of Newcastle, and Mr. C. H. Ellison, of York. A meeting of the local Association was held in the evening, presided over by Mr. J. R. Hill, J.P., when addresses were given by Mr. A. K. Yapp, North Midland District secretary, Derby, Mr. J. C. Moor, travelling secretary, Mr. W. D. Dobson, Harrogate, Mr. Thomas Moffett, Leeds, and Mr. T. Herring, Darlington.

A successful demonstration was held at Hamilton on 14th inst., on the occasion of the visit of the National Council. Ex-Provost Wylie presided, and addresses were given by Mr. Macpherson, of Glasgow, on "Personal Religion"; Mr. John McPhail, of Greenock, on "Local Association Work"; Mr. Jas. Gavin, of Stirling, on "District Association Work"; and Mr. Archibald Kennedy, of Edinburgh, on the "International Work of the Association." Mr. Kennedy's address was illustrated by lime-light views of Association buildings all over the world, different branches of Association work, and prominent workers.

The first annual meeting of the Camden Town Association since the death of the late beloved president, Mr. John White, was held on Thursday evening; and, though necessarily somewhat saddened by the frequent references to the heavy loss the institution has sustained, was nevertheless a great success. Mr. Henry Robson occupied the chair, and part was taken in the proceedings by Rev. D. M. Connan, Mr. A. C. Furse, Rev. W. R. Mowll, Mr. F. L. Jermyn, Mr. Hind Smith, Mr. J. L. Whelan, Mr. J. G. Murdoch, Rev. Alex. Connell, Rev. Geo. Hawker, Rev. H. Coley, the general secretary (Mr. T. Swanston Smith) and others.

The foundation stones of the handsome new premises of the Sunderland Young Men's Christian Association in John-street and Borough-road were laid on Wednesday afternoon in the presence of a large gathering. Mr. John Henderson (secretary of the Building Committee) made a brief statement as to the origin of the Association in 1871 and its progress since. The total cost of the new erection he said would be £5000, of which £3700 had already been subscribed. The ceremonies were followed by a public meeting in the evening, when over a thousand were present. Dr. G. B. Morgan presided. Mr. Clement Thompson gave an interesting statement of the history and development of Y.M.C.A. work in Sunderland during the past twenty-five years, and an address was delivered by Mr. Robinson Souttar. At the conclusion of the meeting an exhibition of limelight views, showing the rise and progress of the Y.M.C.A. in the world during the past fifty years was given, with a descriptive address by Mr. W. M. Hudson, of South Shields.

In the last bright and successful conference of the Y.M.C.A.'s for French-speaking people in Switzerland, held at La Chaux-de-Fonds, that which struck us most was the clear, categorical affirmation of the public and social action that is henceforth to be taken. The Y.M.C.A. is no longer what it was perhaps for a time, what some people may still think that it is, some very pious young men meeting privately, round a smoky lamp, to sing a few hymns and murmur a few prayers. No, the Y.M.C.A. has left the quiet chamber to go out into the street; it shows itself in the broad daylight. The long procession of seven or eight hundred young men going twice through all the streets of La Chaux-de-Fonds, the triumphal arches, the decorated churches, the cannons re-echoing from the valley, all clearly proclaimed the coming of a new, young, strong, courageous troop. We greeted this manifestation with deep joy, for the Y.M.C.A. is, before all, a society for the future; its organisation sufficiently says so: work for the young by the young.—The National Church.

The Y.W.C.A.

ANNUAL WEEK OF PRAYER.

THE Week of Prayer commencing February 16th has now closed, and numerous are the evidences of blessing which have been received at the various institutes engaged therein. As an opportunity for quiet communion with our loving Father, and as refreshment by the wayside, the past week has resulted, by God's grace, in renewed strength and fervour for the work of the Y.W.C.A.

At the Central Institute, 316, Regent-street, W., Miss L. Duff gave the address at the praise meeting held on Sunday, while special meetings for prayer were held during the week. On Thursday, Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe delivered an exhortation to a crowded audience on "Love," drawing illustrations from David and Jonathan. On Friday, Mr. C. T. Studd, from China, spoke on the heartrending contrast between a Christian and a heathen country. Rev. F. B. Meyer followed with an address on the Holy Spirit as "The Living Waters."

Miss Rouse, of Putney, and Miss Pacy have been stirring up the members of the Lavender-hill and Clapham Junction Branch to a more diligent and prayerful study of God's word, closing with an address on "The Beautiful Gate" (Acts iii.). The presence of God's Holy Spirit has been felt at these meetings.

Addresses have been given every night at the Brixton Institute to crowded rooms, as well as a three nights' mission for juniors. Rev. W. R. Mowll delivered the sermon on Sunday, 16th, at Christ Church, and a special address to Christians was given by Col. Oldham on Saturday. Miss Garrett, hon. sec., writes: "This has been one of the best weeks we have ever had."

At the Cambridge Institute special prayer meetings have been held, followed by an address. Miss Freeman spoke on "Three Prayer Meetings" mentioned in Acts (chapters ii., iv., and xvi.). Miss E. Coryton gave a reading on "The Candlestick." There were good attendances throughout, and a deep interest and spirit of prayer realised.

The Week of Prayer at the Clapham Institute has been a time of searching and refreshment, and God's presence has been manifestly felt. Rev. J. Pettiman, Capt. Treeby, and others were the speakers at the meetings.

Miss Boxer reports that meetings were held every evening at Eastbourne House (Sydenham), as well as on Sunday, for prayer and praise. At Gipsy Hall (Upper Norwood), members waited definitely upon God in the spirit of prayer and expectancy. The Hon. Gertrude Kinnaird and the Hon. Emily Kinnaird were among the speakers at the Finsbury Institute.

Special meetings were arranged for at Princess House (108, Brompton-road, S.W.). Miss Soltan gave an address on "The Prayer of Jabez," Miss K. Barlow on "God's Everlasting Covenant of Peace," while Miss Barlow spoke of our bringing everything in prayer to our Heavenly Father.

A special evening service was held at Eaton Episcopal Church on Thursday, in connection with the Belgravian Institute and Princess House. Lady Bangor, Mrs. E. Streafeld, and Miss Maunsell conducted meetings at the Belgravian Institute from February 16 to 19.

Mrs. W. T. Paton reports good attendances at the Cloudesley Institute meetings for prayer and praise, a deeply earnest and prayerful spirit being manifested throughout.

A mission has been held during the week at the Putney branch. Miss Rouse spoke on Sunday, and Bible readings were given each afternoon by Miss Oakeshott (C.I.M.), Mrs. McLaren, Mrs. Dixon, and others.

"Hindrances to Prayer" was the keynote of the address given by Mrs. W. H. Stone at the St. James's (Hatcham) branch, and meetings (February 19-21) for Bible study and prayer were held each evening, conducted by the members. Miss Evans spoke on "Unity in Prayer," and Miss L. Meager on "Praise, the Outcome of Prayer." Many have testified to blessing received at the Percy Institute, and the meetings have been owned of God in a marked way. A praise meeting was held on Friday, led by Rev. F. T. Snow, when definite results were looked for in the power of the Holy Spirit. At other centres in London and throughout the country meetings have been held with most encouraging results. C. W. D.

MORLEY HALLS CONFERENCE.

THE monthly conference, on Thursday, 20th inst., was of more than usual interest, the meeting at 3 o'clock being largely attended. The hon. Mrs. Waller presided. Interesting letters from Y.W.C.A. workers in India were read by the Hon. Gertrude Kinnaird, asking for more workers, more prayer, and increased funds. The Hon. Emily Kinnaird read letters of praise for prayer answered, and for God's wonderful way of working. Half an hour was spent in prayer and praise on behalf of India.

After tea, served in the gymnasium, the large hall was crowded to hear an address from Mrs. Penn Lewis, on "Effectual Prayer and its Conditions." Mrs. Lewis said it takes a deeper life to pray than to work, and lack of power in prayer results in a resort to human resources. A number of points were then powerfully enforced:—First, what is effectual prayer? Our Lord shows that it is not always asking, but to "ask and receive." We need power to take. The conditions are expressed in the words "Ask the Father in my name." This is not merely mentioning his name, but asking in his nature, in union with Him. Then there is the promise of what Jesus would do, "I will shew you plainly," etc. The Holy Ghost reveals Christ, and Christ manifests the Father. Prevailing prayer is a life of prayer, the very desire of the heart, Christ in union with us asking the Father. It is impossible to live two lives and have power in prayer. We cannot live in the spirit of the world and then, at stated times, have power with God. This is only possible to spirit-possessed souls.

The hindrances are—(1) love of sin; (2) idols in the heart—position, views, theology, work; (3) a grudge in the heart, an unforgiving spirit cannot pray effectually; (4) unbelief in the heart; (5) self. The power of the Holy Ghost cleanses the heart, removes idols, begets love, brings in faith, and deals with self, and we then ask and receive to the glory of God.

The remainder of the time after the address was occupied with prayer.

BRIEF NOTES.

A scheme which has long been in contemplation, for providing dinners and boarding accommodation, at very moderate cost, for members of the Y.W.C.A. and others, has been successfully commenced in Dundee, under the management of a committee presided over by Mrs. Ogilvy Dalgleish, to whom the credit of organising the affair is due, and who has generously given £100 towards the expenses of the undertaking. Miss Reynolds formally opened the building a few days ago, and Miss Grant, of the Glasgow Institute, will start the new work.

At the annual meeting of the Lady Havelock Branch, Hammersmith, the chair was taken by Mr. H. Trengrouse, and addresses were given by Revs. H. Denning, of Bristol, J. L. Brooks, and W. Page. The report shows a year of very successful work. The meeting was somewhat saddened by the resignation of the hon. sec., Miss M. Holt, who has held the post from the commencement of this branch nine years ago, and who, by her self-denying labours and earnest efforts, has contributed so largely to the success of the work. Several members referred to the efficiency of this work. This branch is also losing the services of Mrs. Page, who has been the president from the beginning.

Madagascar.—The interests of all foreigners (says a Times correspondent), whether traders, explorers, or missionaries, require the speedy establishment of French power and influence throughout the island. The personal safety of a large number of Norwegian and British subjects in the south is just now hanging in the balance. Should the insurgents succeed in their intentions, the Norwegian mission stations will be destroyed, and the Betsileo province and its capital, Fianarantsoa, attacked.

Union Tabernacle, Wandsworth-road.—Interesting services were held last week at this tabernacle in connection with the completion of the necessary alteration and the laying of a commemoration-stone. Amongst those who took part were Mr. James E. Mathieson, Revs. P. A. Milne, R. McIntosh, W. Fuller Gooch, and Mr. P. M. Thornton, M.P. In laying the stone, Mr. Mathieson expressed his sympathy with and confidence in the work carried on by Rev. D. M. Cameron and his helpers.

Christian Endeavour.

IN and around Hull the Endeavourers have become a force for good in many directions. The fifth anniversary of the Christian Endeavour Society at Newbridge, Mon., showed a membership of 110 and vigorous work.

The Endeavour movement is taking hold in South Wales, and societies are being formed by the Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Baptists.

In Lamartine, Penn., the Union C.E. Society has closed a personal-work campaign in connection with Gospel meetings, when eight souls were saved.

The Christian Endeavour Society in the prison, Michigan City, Ind., has about three hundred members, more than a hundred of whom have been baptized.

The National Lutheran Christian Endeavour Union of America have published a leaflet showing how well the C.E. organisation is suited to the Lutheran Church.

The C.E. Society in connection with the Athlone Baptist Chapel is truly missionary in its character, having a missionary working party for children and adults, a missionary giving union, and a postal department, the object of which is to send THE CHRISTIAN and The Life of Faith to foreign missionaries.

H. CLARKE, secretary.

An enthusiastic rally of the Gloucester Y.P.S.C.E. Union was held in Tyndale Chapel on February 20, the president, Rev. G. M. Smith, in the chair. After papers on "Consecrated Energy" and "Power of Association," and an address by Rev. J. Moore, a consecration meeting terminated a happy and profitable gathering.

F. C. HARPER.

The Endeavourers of Alameda Co., California, believe that Christian Endeavour means aggressive work for the unsaved, and they have formulated a plan that is worthy of widest imitation. A committee has been organised to go out on evangelistic tours into neighbouring towns and country districts. Recently seven young men and nine young women visited a small inland town, thirty-five miles inland, and held services; and nine souls accepted the Gospel invitation.

Oxford Notes.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

DR. PIERSON'S visit last week proved to be a season of real blessing. Christians of the various churches have been instructed and stimulated, while University men, who attended in good numbers, have also received great blessing. Dr. Pierson also addressed the annual meeting of the Y.M.C.A.

The death of Sir Charles Aitchison is a very serious loss to the cause of Evangelical truth in Oxford. God's work ever found in him an earnest advocate, and the high positions in the State to which he had attained made his testimony of special service in the city and University.

Sermons in aid of the Colonial and Continental Church Society were preached on Sunday last by Rev. J. M. Ham, Association Secretary, who had much of interest to tell about this valuable society's work.

Conference at Margate.—A very profitable conference, arranged by Mr. Owens Mell, on the Second Advent, was held at Shaftesbury House last week. The speakers included Revs. H. C. Sturdy and John Wilkinson, Pastor Fuller Gooch, Mr. Walter Sloan, and Captain Baring. The interest manifested was extremely encouraging. W. M. C.

The American Baptist Publication Society has had its fine premises in Philadelphia burned to the ground. Early on Sunday, February 2, a conflagration broke out at the next building; the flames spread, and in a short time nothing remained of the splendid depot but four black walls and a heap of charred ruins. The loss is expected to be £100,000. In the building were the offices of the Publication Society; the Missionary Union and the Home Mission Society, as well as the Pennsylvania Education Society, the State Mission Society, and the City Mission, and various other Baptist societies.

Artillery-lane Mission, Fournier-street, Spitalfields.—God has greatly blessed the workers in this Mission. Many cases of conversion might be given, especially among young women in the lodging-houses. Amongst the meetings held are lodging-house visitation, Gospel meetings, mother's meetings, and open-air work. During the winter months, free breakfasts have been given to the poor and destitute every Sunday morning; 2,730 free meals, breakfasts, have been given during the year. This winter these breakfasts have already been given on six Sunday mornings. These earnest workers are sorely in need of funds.—(Mrs.) S. FINN, Hon. Supt., 29, St. Ann's-road, South Tottenham. [204]

Obituary.

MRS. MATHEW HALL.

ON February 13 there peacefully entered into the joy of her Lord the last surviving member of the family of the late Mr. Samuel Evans, of Ottery St. Mary. Early in life she gave herself to the Lord Jesus, and engaged in Christian work. After her marriage she became the true helpmate of her husband in all Christian work, and especially did she shine as the centre of a large family circle. Her Christian hospitality was large, especially to those who most needed it. In January last her husband and she celebrated their golden wedding, surrounded by twenty-eight children and grandchildren. She was apparently as well as usual, but early in February she was called to her rest.

M. FRANCOIS NÆF.

Lausanne has lost a noble son and benefactor by the death of Francois Næf, at the age of 63. He was a descendant of the famous Félix Næf, whose work among the people of the Upper Alps is well known. He was one of the first members of the Y.M.C.A. in Switzerland, and in 1858 became a pastor in the Free Church. He laboured in several spheres, and took a wide interest in evangelistic effort. He studied philanthropy with keen sympathy, and was actively associated with a large number of societies, leagues, and committees. In 1880 he started at Lausanne popular meetings after the type of the McAll meetings in France, and thus became the pioneer of an important home mission enterprise. At length, in 1893, he was elected to the Communal Council of Lausanne. So he served his generation in a variety of ways; and his decease is widely and deeply mourned alike in Switzerland and France.

REV. WILLIAM RICKARD.

The whole district of Child's Hill and Cricklewood seemed bereaved in the falling asleep of this beloved pastor, who entered into rest on Jan 21. During his twenty-nine years' ministry of the Baptist Chapel, Child's Hill, N.W., he had gathered a warmly attached congregation; but, as we have found evidence on visiting the place, his peculiar power lay in his pastoral work. While health permitted he was ever busy from house to house, cheering and comforting the sorrowing, whether belonging to his flock or not, and exhorting the careless to flee from the wrath to come. Thus he was a man greatly beloved by the people for his self-denying labours and untiring energy on their behalf. The last two or three years of his life were spent in much suffering, which necessitated his retirement some eighteen months ago. The funeral took place on the 25th, the service being conducted by Rev. W. Brock, of Hampstead, when the whole of the village appeared to have gone into mourning, and hundreds attended to show their respect and love for him.

REV. C. F. COBB, TESTON.

This devoted servant of Christ passed away at the Rectory, Teston, near Maidstone, on Monday, February 3, aged sixty-nine. The son of a faithful Evangelical rector, he was trained in his earliest days in warm sympathy with evangelical and missionary work. Entering the ministry, he engaged in parish work for two years, and then offered himself to the C.M.S., and was sent to Benares as principal of the Mission College there. Failure in the health of his wife (a daughter of Rev. E. B. Elliott, the well-known author of Horæ Apocalyptice) led to resignation of his post and return home. The hearts of husband and wife were, however, in missions, and from that time they have been constant and ready friends and helpers of the C.M.S. Mr. Cobb succeeded, in 1873, the late Rev. W. Pennefather at St. Jude's, Mildmay Park, and though his stay was brief, the memory of his devoted ministry is still cherished at Mildmay. In 1875 he went to Teston, where since then he laboured with great success. Mr. Cobb's efforts stretched out much beyond his parish and its care. In addition to numberless missionary and other home and foreign interests, he organised in his own parish a splendid work among hop-pickers, who come in crowds in the hopping season. In his call home many indeed will feel they have lost a godly and faithful friend.

SIR CHAS. W. AITCHISON.

This well-known friend of missions, who was not afraid during his Indian career to witness on behalf of God and righteousness, passed away, aged sixty-three, on Tuesday week, at St. Christopher's, Oxford. A native of Lasswade, he was educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh. Joining the Indian Civil Service in 1856, he successively filled several important positions. He was secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department from 1870 to 1878. At that date he was appointed Chief Commissioner of British Burmah, which post he held till 1882, when he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, holding that office till 1887. A few years ago he left India for this country, and resided principally in Edinburgh. As member of the Council of State for India, his advice on all matters pertaining to the administration of the country was highly valued. He was an authority on Indian matters, and was the author of several important works. During his administration he was greatly esteemed by the natives for his just and honourable dealings with them and the means he took to improve the commercial and social conditions of Bengal. In 1863 Sir Charles was married to Miss Beatrice Cox, daughter of the late Mr. James Cox, of Clement Park and Cardean, at one time Provost of Dundee. He is survived by a widow and grown-up family. The Aitchison College, for the instruction of the sons of chiefs, and the Lady Aitchison Hospital for Women, will perpetuate his memory in India, and the Punjab University was his creation. For the last six years he was the chairman of the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society, retiring only a few months ago, and was frequently to be found presiding or speaking at missionary meetings, ever ready to bear testimony to the proved value of the work being done in India and Burmah by missionaries.

THE two weeks' mission conducted at the Baptist Chapel, Charles-street, Camberwell New-road, S.E., by Mr. Charles Edwards, of Winchester, has resulted in greatly reviving Christians and bringing salvation to some who were without God and hope in the world. The pictures by which the evangelist illustrates the Gospel have been the means of throwing entirely new light on old Bible truth.

A lady who was an infidel has boldly professed Christ, and has written to ask if she can obtain Mr. Edwards' addresses and Bible talks to send to an infidel brother of hers. A man came to me in the chapel one night and said he wanted to give himself up to God, and would close his shop on Sundays. One after another cases are forthcoming. Our congregations have increased and the young people's meetings have received a stimulus.

Ministers and missionary superintendents would do well to invite Mr. Edwards with his wonderful pictures to conduct missions. Under God, they would be the means of much blessing.

JOHN WAITE, Pastor.

The Scriptures in Bengali.

PASTOR HÆGERT, of the Bethel Santhal Mission, writes:—At No. 6, Dhorrumbola-street, Calcutta, India, lives Mr. C. Bomwetsch. He is seventy-five years of age, and has been fifty years in this country as a missionary of the C.M.S. He was for years an editor of a Bengali religious newspaper, enjoying a pension; he needs nothing for himself or family.

This man spent seven years in translating the New Testament into Bengali. It was quickly sold. Then he worked nine years on the revision of the translation, which is now completed, but he needs £200 to have it printed. It would greatly cheer him if funds should be forthcoming for the printing of his Bengali New Testament.

There is a former translation, good for pundits, but not understood by the common people, as it is stilted, and almost all the missionaries agree that a new translation is needed. Mr. Bomwetsch's translation is the best.

Pugilism in the States.—There is now no inch of soil in the United States where prize-fighting can be legally carried on. Congress has passed a Bill, and the President promptly signed it, which makes it a crime in the District of Columbia, or in any territory of the United States, or in any strip of country under Federal control, to hold a prize fight. This is a final victory for good morals and humanity over a species of entertainment that has come to rank with bull fights and other degrading sports.—N.Y. Independent.

Requests for Prayer.—That the Armenian atrocities may be speedily brought to an end.—For blessing on mission at Raphoe, co. Donegal, by Mr. Crawford.—For a series of special meetings to be held in Bloomsbury Chapel, W.C., March 7 to 15, by Revs. W. Y. Fullerton and J. Manton Smith.—For the outpouring of the Spirit on young men in Doune.—For Gipsy Smith's meetings in America.—For a month's mission at St. Just, Cornwall, by Mr. and Mrs. Clegg.—For blessing on a mission for men, by Mr. Monro Collings, at the Y.M.C.A., New Cross, S.E., from March 1 to 9.—For an eight days' mission at the Soldiers' Home, Aldershot, by Mr. J. C. Rainey, commencing March 1.—For special mission, Shaftesbury Hall, Ealing, March 2nd to 14th, by Charles Cook and choir.

Evangelistic Notes.

Garratt, Herts.—Mr. Hugh C. Wallace, of the Evangelisation Society, has concluded a most successful six days' mission to the Baptist Chapel in this interesting village.

Arlington, Gloucester.—Mr. C. B. Jolliffe, of the Evangelisation Society, has concluded a mission in the Baptist chapel here. Christians have been revived, and souls have been led to Christ. L. B.

Wirksworth.—A fourteen days' special mission has been held here by Mr. A. Hanson, with much cause for thankfulness. God's own people have been blessed, and a number of souls decided for Christ. Much interest was manifested in the meetings.

Newent, Gloucester.—Mr. Frank Tarrant, of the Evangelisation Society, finished, on Sunday, 23rd inst., a three weeks' mission at the Congregational Church here. God wonderfully blessed the effort through the clear statement, the natural manner, and the quiet power of his servant.

Ireland.—Gospel meetings have been held in Stewartstown Methodist Church by Mr. John and Mrs. Brandon, of Newcastle, co. Down. Similar meetings have been held in Clones by Mr. Jas. Dixon, of the Belfast Central Mission, and in Aghnacloy by Rev. Henry Ball, Methodist Conference evangelist.

Major Cole is conducting union meetings in his own city, Adrian, Mich., during the day, then urging the people to their individual churches in the evening, where the services are conducted by their own pastors and such assistance as they may secure. The meetings are growing in power, and give the minister a blessed opportunity to keep in touch with his own people.

Belmont, Bolton.—Mr. James Eyres has been here for a mission during the present month. Meetings for men only, women only, and for young people were held. Bible-readings were given each afternoon, large audiences and much blessing attended all the meetings. Abundant testimony was borne at the farewell meeting by converts and others as to cheering results.

Mr. F. Schiverea has lately laboured with success for four weeks at Listowel, Canada. A local paper says:—"During the services over three hundred professed conversions have taken place, and among them a large number of fathers and mothers, several business men, and scores of bright, thoughtful young men and women, as well as some with grey hairs and tottering frames."

South Shields.—Mr. E. P. Telford, on Feb. 21, concluded a twelve days' mission in the Laygate Primitive Methodist Church. During the week hundreds were unable to find even standing room. The Master gave Mr. Telford many words of power, which drew sinners to the Saviour. Many have made public profession of faith. The huge audiences were delighted by the sweet and powerful singing of Mrs. Telford.

Gosport.—A ten days' mission in connection with the Portsmouth and Gosport Seamen's Mission has been concluded in the Bethel, Gosport, by Mr. Owen Harris, of Bideford. God's presence has been very manifest, and a real work of grace has begun in some hearts, more especially among the men and lads. One evening sixty watermen came to tea, and much blessing was felt and known in the meeting with them afterwards.

Kilburn.—The Weaver Brothers have closed a most successful three weeks' mission in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Kilburn-lane, London, N.W. (Rev. Geo. Shapcott's). Christians have been awakened, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners saved. After we had nearly all said good-bye on Thursday, and were leaving the chapel, we found a young lady on her knees and Mr. B. F. Weaver by her side. That soul, too, yielded. It was a time never to be forgotten. CHAS. HENDERSON.

Bishop's Stortford.—Mr. Henry Thorne has concluded a very successful ten days' Gospel Mission at the Baptist Chapel, Bishop's Stortford. Every afternoon Bible readings were given to a goodly number of people who gathered from time to time. The evening meetings grew in power, and the Lord was present to save. Many came into the inquiry room and sought the Saviour, while at the same time a great blessing has come upon those who through Divine grace had already believed. W. W.

Banff, N.B.—A series of Evangelistic meetings, conducted by Mr. John Smith, Evangelist, Aberdeen, and Mr. Davidson, of Inchmarlo, in the Y.M.C.A. Hall here, has been brought to a close. The interest gradually deepened, and a considerable number, more especially of young men and young women, profess to have given themselves to the Lord. The Christian workers in Banff have been greatly cheered by his blessing, which has accompanied the labour of his servants during the past three weeks.

Mr. William Hall, who has been working for twenty-years in the North of England, is looking out for opportunities of Christian testimony in the Midlands. A friend supplies salary, also tent and forms. A godly minister in a needy district might secure Mr. Hall's services during the summer and onwards by sending particulars to Mr. J. N. Carr, Carlisle. Local expenses should be met.

Personalities.

Dr. Joseph Cook is at Clifton Springs, N.Y., and is slowly recovering from his nervous prostration.

Mrs. Whittemore, of New York, is at present visiting Paris, and is the guest of Miss De Broen.

Dr. Th. Cuyler is not quite up to his usual health and vigour (says The Evangelist), and his physician has enjoined a whole week of rest as the thing most needed.

Rev. Alfred Bird has returned from Australia to England. He will be greatly missed in Victoria (says Rev. H. Macartney, of Melbourne), but will be warmly welcomed into the "Keswick" circle at home. Few more thoroughly recommend themselves both by his spiritual tone and his sound theology.

Mr. L. D. Wishard, who has lately taken a period of much needed rest in Greece, is now fully restored to vigour, and is at present in Scotland. He purposes sailing on May 2 for the Cape, and will spend about three months in visiting the young men's colleges in Natal, Zululand, the Orange Free State, etc. He hopes to attend a Students' Conference at Wellington in July.

Mr. J. R. Mott is now finishing a series of Students' Conferences in India, which have been full of encouraging interest. He sails for Australia about this time, and will make a thorough tour of the colleges in that country and New Zealand. Afterwards he hopes to visit China and Japan on the same mission, of arousing missionary interest in the colleges of those lands.

Rev. Dr. Griffith John, who, owing to his engrossment in his work in China, some time ago declined an invitation to return to England to act as president of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, and who declined a second invitation last year to return and take part in the centenary celebrations of the London Missionary Society, has decided to visit England this year.

Dr. Talmage.—The Boston Congregationalist describes this American preacher as one who is heard and read by more persons throughout Christendom than any other living preacher. "It is a great thing to see at the nation's capital (Washington) a splendid company of men and women, white and black, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, filling Sunday after Sunday the seats and galleries and aisles of one of the largest edifices in the city, to hear, not Talmage only, but the Gospel of his Master that he so powerfully proclaims."

Dr. W. T. Grenfell is a young Englishman of interesting history—an Oxford student and athlete, a London surgeon who was converted under the influence of Mr. D. L. Moody in that city, and consecrated his life to caring for the physical and spiritual wants of sailors. For several years he worked in the North Sea, at first with one mission vessel, afterwards with several. For four years Dr. Grenfell has spent his summers cruising along the wild coast of Labrador, carrying on the same double work among the fishermen of ship and shore, healing those that have need of healing, and holding simple, religious services in whatever harbour his mission steamer was anchored.—Congregationalist.

New Hall Mission, Wellington.

THE new report of this mission, founded and carried on for many years by the late Dr. Cranage, shows that the work is well sustained and doing real service in the town. Special mention is made of the Sunday evening Gospel services, both for adults and children, which had been well attended and followed by gracious results. The personal labours of the missionary, Mr. John Jones, from house to house has been of great service in many ways. We commend the whole work of the mission to the prayer and sympathies of the Lord's people. The superintendent is Mr. Robert Weston, Carlton House, Wellington, Salop.

In Arctic Regions.—Mrs. Canham, who with her husband, Archdeacon Canham, of the C.M.S., has been labouring at Rampart House, on the Porcupine River, Alaska, since 1881, gives in her latest letters animated accounts of work and life within the Arctic circle. In a sense it is one long struggle with the rigours of the climate, but there are men living there, and so these missionary heroes toil on and endure that they may seek to save souls. God is blessing the work among the Indians employed by the Hudson Bay Company or coming to the station for trading purposes. The home correspondent is Miss L. A. Large, 1, Spencer-road, Craneswater Park, Southsea.

Temperance Notes.

THE Home Secretary announced in the House of Commons, on Monday evening, that a measure for the treatment of habitual drunkards is in preparation.

A defendant has been heavily fined in the City for selling liquor without a licence. He was the actual owner of the house and took the profits, the licence being held by another man who had no interest in the premises.

A Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Broadhurst, and directed against tied houses, proposes that every licence shall be in the hands of an independent holder, who would be free to purchase his goods where he likes.

Last week Mr. E. Tennyson Smith concluded a temperance mission at Bromley, Kent. At one of the meetings a resolution against liquor traffickers holding office in Christian churches was carried by an overwhelming majority.

An American writer declares that abstemiousness constitutes to-day the predominant feature at all the European royal and imperial courts. To Queen Victoria's influence the growth of temperance is due more than any other monarch.

In a medical address to ladies delivered at Edgbaston, Dr. Rayner Batten dealt with the claims of the temperance movement upon women. At the close he answered a number of inquiries from the audience dealing with some special difficulties often met with amongst women.

Mr. Peter Gilston, ex-Mayor of Leeds, speaking in Wakefield, said that he entertained about 10,000 persons last year, including lords, bishops, princes (amongst them the Prince of Wales), dukes, and Her Majesty's judges, and he did not provide a drop of intoxicating drink for any of them.

The Scottish Baptist Total Abstinence Society reports that "the number of abstaining Baptist ministers in Scotland is now 102, several of whom have retired from the active work of the pastorate. In ninety-nine of our churches unfermented wine is used at the Lord's table, and there are now seventy-six Bands of Hope connected with the churches."

Rev. Allan H. Watts, vicar of Lenton, preached the Temperance Sermon on Feb. 17 to the Nottingham Good Templars.—The debt of £900 on the Good Templar and Temperance Orphanage has been extinguished during the year.—The Governor of Gibraltar presided at the recent anniversary meeting of the Good Templar soldiers, who are doing well on that famous fortress.

A conference, under the auspices of the British Temperance League and the Y.W.C.T.A., was held last week in Wakefield. Miss Briggs expressed the hope that one result of the gatherings would be to unite the various temperance workers in the city. Miss Helen Wilson, M.D. (Lond.), read a paper on "Physiology Teaching and Temperance," and this was followed by a discussion, in which Rev. S. C. Whalley, Mr. W. S. Caine, Mr. Simeon Stephenson (vice-chairman of the Wakefield School Board), and others took part.

Dr. Dawson Burns states that the increase of expenditure for intoxicants in 1895 over the previous year was £3,676,984. The total expenditure was £142,414,812, showing an average expenditure per head of £3 12s. 9½d. for the United Kingdom. The increase in the use of drink was chiefly in England, which country is responsible for £2,865,116 of the sum stated; Scotland and Ireland made up the remainder with £532,505 and £279,363 respectively. This increase of drink expenditure is more than double the annual income of all the missionary societies in the nation.

Dr. Henry M. Field, while attending the meetings of the National Editorial Association at St. Augustine, Fla., at which there were present 356 editors, looked them over as they were seated at table in the dining-room, and he was struck by their abstinence. He says:—"Sitting near the entrance of the hall, and thus seeing from end to end, I did not see a single man touch a glass of wine or mug of lager beer! I confess that I was surprised at what I could have hardly believed except for the testimony of my own senses, but which was most gratifying, not only for the editorial profession, but for the country which they represent."

In a letter to The Scotsman on "The Maine Law in Maine," General Neal Dow re-tells, for the sake of present-day workers, the story of the Maine campaign, which led to the adoption of Prohibition. Having shown how this has altered the whole character of the people, he adds: "In more than three-fourths of our territory, containing more than three-fourths of our population, the liquor traffic is practically unknown; an entire generation has grown up there never having seen a rum shop or the effects of one. In our larger cities and towns, a fragment of the traffic remains mostly on the sly, the parties resorting to many devices to keep their liquors concealed from the view of the officials."

TRUE LOVE TO ONE'S NEIGHBOUR.—Luke x. 25-37.
GOLDEN TEXT.—Verse 27.

OUR Lord's journey from Galilee to Jerusalem led Him along the border between Galilee and Samaria, across the Jordan into Perea, then southward to the fords of Jericho. It was probably in Perea that this incident took place.

"Lawyer" (25)—a student and teacher of the Jewish Scriptures. "Tempted" or tested; either to verify some statement he had heard as to the teaching of Jesus, or to secure the assent of Jesus to some opinion of his own. The lawyer's quotation (27) is taken from Deut. vi. 5, combined with Lev. xix. 18.

"Went down" (30). The distance of Jerusalem from Jericho was about twenty miles, and the descent was about 3500 feet. It was literally, as well as morally, a going down. The road was wild and rocky, and infested with robbers. So frequent were murders and robberies that one portion of it was called "the bloody way." In 1820 Sir Frederic Henniker was stripped and murdered by Arabs on this very road.

Jericho contained about 12,000 priests and Levites, who ministered in the Temple services. It was therefore most natural that a priest and a Levite (31, 32) should pass that way. "Oil and wine" (34), the wine to cleanse the wound, and the oil to heal. "Inn," not such a khan as that connected with the birth of Jesus, but one at which food could be obtained. "Two pence" (35), or denarii, a sum equal to two days' wages.

The parable is intended to serve a threefold purpose.

I. TO CONVICT THE LAWYER.—The application, "Go and do thou likewise" (37), is not an answer to the lawyer's first question (25), but to his second (29), which he asked in order "to justify himself." That he had not loved all men as himself he knew, but with a restricted meaning to the word neighbour, he might yet claim that he had fulfilled the condition on which eternal life depended. Jesus takes away that hope from him. Neighbour means not his personal friend, but every man to whom at any cost he could show kindness.

II. TO PRESENT A PICTURE OF THE SAVIOUR'S WORK FOR US.—What is our condition if we have failed to answer the Law's requirement? We become like the traveller who was left on the road naked and half-dead. We are helpless, and become objects of compassion. The Law—with its ceremonialism—and its righteous demands—passes us by. Whence comes our help? From One on whom we have no claim, whom we have not obeyed, whom we have treated with greatest ingratitude. But "He had compassion" (33), and with entire forgetfulness of self He undertook our case.

III. TO SHOW WHAT HE REQUIRES OF THOSE WHO ARE SAVED.—It reveals to us the essential characteristic of our Christian life. The indifference and callousness seen in the priest and the Levite—two ministers of religion, are not intended to set aside all forms of religious worship; but to show how possible it is for these to be alone, and therefore utterly valueless. Love is the great end of the Gospel as of the Law. Not the performance of outward ceremonies, but little deeds of kindness, of self forgetfulness, of unselfishness—these are to be the true expression of our godliness (see 1 Cor. xiii.).

It reminds us who are to be the objects of our loving ministry. Much of our Christian activity is determined by selfish considerations. We are interested in those whom we like, and who respond to our loving ministry. But what of those we don't like, and who bitterly dislike us? Is not their peril equally great? Dr. Maclaren says:—"Perhaps, if Jesus had been speaking in America, He would have made this man a negro; or if in France, a German; or if in England, a 'foreigner.'" The poor, the degraded, the outcast, the loathsome—these are to be our neighbours, even though they are found in the heart of Africa.

It shows us the form in which our love must express itself. It must be prompted by Christlike compassion, must lead to self-sacrifice, must be prompt, and thorough. For such service the needs of men afford abundant opportunity. Objects of misery are continually appealing for our sympathy. Among many illustrations take only one:—Years ago Linda Gilbert, passing the old brick prison in Chicago, saw a hand beckoning to her from a cell window, and heard a weary voice asking for something to read. She was but a little girl, but she went Sunday after Sunday to that prison, carrying with her a book from her father's library for the prisoner to read. "Little girl," said he, before he died, "you have saved my soul." And she gave him a promise to do for other prisoners what she had done for him. She has kept her word, and has established good libraries in many prisons, and has helped many prisoners back to honest lives.

AMONG THE CHURCHES.

Church of England.

THE vicar of Sutton-in-Ashfield, Rev. F. R. Pyper, has accepted St. Andrew's, Nottingham.

Archdeacon Taylor, at a meeting of the Liverpool Church Association, said he was unable to agree that the supporters of voluntary schools had a right to expect these to be placed on a perfect financial equality with Board Schools. In his opinion they should be prepared to pay for the privilege of imparting denominational instruction.

The Bishop of Liverpool, speaking on Monday evening at the opening of new schools, said that he thanked God for the Liverpool Board Schools. If it had not been for those Board schools a large number of the children of that great city would have been left nothing better than heathens. Still, at the same time, he liked to see schools in close connection with every church.

Few things in the contents of the message of Jesus to his apostles are more remarkable than the restraint shown in the revelations of the New Testament concerning the future life. Immortality, with its allied doctrines of rewards and punishments, occupies a central place in the teaching of the Saviour. This life is dealt with as the mere prelude or apprenticeship of the life to come. We are encouraged to draw our determining motives from the armoury of eternity. And yet we are told almost nothing of the details of the heavenly life. It would seem as though Jesus left his followers freely to exercise their sanctified imagination on the cloud-curtain of the undying dawn, and to body forth their own heaven according to their spiritual insight. What blessed assurance is given us in the words, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also." "If it were not so, I would have told you"! There is profound wisdom in thus giving the soul ample room to paint its pictures of the great future behind the veil. It stands in striking contrast with the barren and uninspiring details of the heaven of spiritualism, whose "revelations" concerning the state of the "blessed dead" carry their own refutation in their spiritual poverty.

The Professor of Poetry at Oxford in a recent lecture has been discussing the place of authority in matters of taste, and holds to Matthew Arnold's opinion that it is of great importance to have some common standard which will help to control the extravagancies of individualism in art. As a matter of fact the authority of experts in all departments is very powerful, and often tyrannical, and yet when experts differ, there can be no court of appeal outside the common sense of the average mind. This is one of the perennial difficulties in religion. There has always been a craving for an external authority in the minds of many people, and this it is which gives the Romish Church her power. But the New Testament gives no colour to such pretensions. The appeal of the Gospel is to the sanctified mind under the influence of the Holy Spirit. One is our Teacher, and One is our Master, even Christ; and One is the Comforter whom He sends to all who will receive Him, for guidance into the truth. There are many questions in theology that can be settled only by the devout judgment of trained experts; but the great questions of salvation and Christian character are within the reach of all who are willing to live by the "inner light."

One of the most interesting biographies of the season is that of the eminent scientist, Mr. G. J. Romanes, who died last year at the early age of forty-eight. This eminent scientist had a remarkable spiritual career. In his youth he was profoundly religious, and distinguished himself as an undergraduate by winning the Burnley prize at Cambridge for an essay written from an Evangelical standpoint on "Prayer and Natural Law." Very soon afterwards his faith was shaken by his scientific studies, and he embodied the results of his thinking in a treatise called "A Candid Examination of Theism," in which he took up an uncompromisingly Agnostic attitude.

This book differs from most attacks on revealed religion in that it betrays a deep melancholy on the part of the author at having to take up a negative position towards the truth in which he had been previously brought up. In this he resembled Renan, who tells us in his autobiography that when he finally parted from Christianity he felt as if "he had fallen on a world of pigmies." But Mr. Romanes differed from Renan in that with maturing years he gradually returned to his early faith, and was engaged at the time of his death in writing a vigorous reply to his own earlier work, which has since been published under the editorship of Canon Gore. This biography completes the story of this soul's pilgrimage from light unto darkness, and then back again into the light.

As might be expected the book is full of deep interest. It is written by Mrs. Romanes, who is able to tell the story of her husband's spiritual life with ample knowledge and sympathy. His reception into the Church of England a few months before he died created a great sensation in scientific circles. These beautiful words sum up what Mrs. Romanes has to say on this point:—

The change that came over his mental attitude may seem almost incredible to those who knew him only as a scientific man; it does not seem so to the few who knew anything of his inner life. To them the impression given is not of an enemy changed into a friend, antagonism altered into submission; rather is it of one who for long has been bearing a heavy burden on his shoulders bravely and patiently, and who at last has had it lifted from him, and lifted so gradually that he could not tell the exact moment when he found it gone, and himself standing, like the Pilgrim of the never-to-be-forgotten story, at the foot of the Cross, and Three Shining Ones coming to greet him.

"The Literary Study of the Bible" is an old theme, though Dr. R. G. Moulton seems to have done exceptionally well in his treatment of it. Some attempt was made in portions of the Revised Version to give English readers an idea of the kind of composition they were reading, but the treatment of the Psalms, Job, the Song of Solomon, and the Proverbs might also have been extended with advantage to portions of the prophets. We agree with Dr. Moulton that the proper literary form of the books ought to be preserved, and that the Bible is an infinitely superior book to any of the classics for use among boys and young men. Its lyrics, its rhetoric, its contemplative prose, its idylls, its parables, its biographies, are unapproachable.

Yet if its literary form were so clearly reproduced as to aid eye and ear, we do not believe it would ever be popular as a classic is popular. Underneath the literature is a spirit which grapples with conscience, and convicts of sin, and men do not like to hear its condemnation. The late Henry Rogers's argument for the superhuman origin of the book is unassailable, and touches this point:—"Man could not have written such a book if he would, and he would not if he could." If he would not have written it, will he, if living without God, be likely to be an ardent student of it?

The friends of social purity in Geneva are making a brave fight to save their Republic from the degrading system of State-regulated immorality, and their determination to succeed is none the less earnest because Mrs. Butler is not far away from them. They are pressing the Grand Council to repeal its regulation statutes, and the upholders of these statutes are resorting to the old and familiar tactics which once prevailed in England. A petition in favour of repeal, signed by 22,000 citizens, was, a few years ago, put into the waste-paper receptacle, on the ground that such a subject as it referred to ought not to be named in the public ear. The system might be carried on ceaselessly under the public eye, but no one was to say a word about what everyone saw and knew! In January last, when the subject came before the newly-elected Grand Council, the President spoke in favour of the status quo, and his speech was reported, but when he had had his say the public and the reporters were cleared out, and the rest of the proceedings were conducted with closed doors.

"A conspiracy of silence" in defence of vice never can succeed, "the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it." Neither silence, where it can be enforced, nor lies, when they are scattered broadcast, can shut out the truth for ever. Brave and good men are on the Grand Council, who can and will speak; the press is not all on the wrong side; and a band of resolute reformers are pledged to the work of repeal. The greatest difficulty in Geneva, as in every country which has long tolerated any wickedness in its midst, is the prevailing deadness of feeling. Men get so accustomed to the sight of wrong as to forget that it is wrong, or to think that it cannot be removed, and thus its continuance is indefinitely prolonged. But even indifference can be aroused into attention, and selfishness into action. And should Geneva be untrue to itself early this March, when its immoral regulations come up before the people for judgment, there still remains the authority of the Federal Government, which may decide to make this city the same as the rest of Swiss cities; it may order the removal of the one plague spot from Swiss soil.

Details are to hand of the two recent successful expeditions against the slave-trading African chiefs Mlozi and Zaraf. In these two cases, every other means had failed to wean the savage and covetous slave-raiders from their cruel occupation. In the heart of British Central Africa, they carried on their practices in defiance of all warnings and appeals. At last strong contingents, headed by English officers of experience, were commissioned to destroy their strongholds, and after fiercely contested engagements they both fell. Mlozi was captured and summarily hanged; Zaraf deserted his followers as soon as he realised that the case was hopeless, and fled beyond the reach of pursuit. The power of both chieftains seems to be permanently broken, and a large number of slaves have been released and cared for.

It is reported, too, that on the day Prempeh was taken prisoner "thousands and thousands of people were freed from a thralldom which was worse than slavery." All, but the courtiers and chiefs and their immediate followers, are delighted at the thought of British rule being established. If England will but steadily pursue this policy of breaking the last link of slavery in Africa, she will be fulfilling one of her noblest missions, and earning the gratitude of the continent that is so largely under her influence and protection. Nevertheless, the use of force to get it is a matter for regret. Poor Africa! From the Cape to Cairo, and from Abyssinia to the mouth of the Congo, it is the scene of struggles or the occasion of diplomatic contention.

The unhappy position of the Sultan in his own capital is strikingly shown in the fact that he is practically an absolute prisoner in his palace. On the occasion of his visit to the old serail at Stamboul for the purpose of kissing one of the many shawls that cover the Prophet's mantle in that sanctuary, the police were so afraid for the safety of the "Shadow of God" that they advised him not to venture into the streets of Constantinople unless they could first effect the arrest of certain persons who were suspected of an intention upon his life. This is the penalty of the reign of terrorism we have recently seen in Turkey for which the Sultan is personally responsible. He cannot face even his own fellow religionists without being in danger of his life. There is probably as much of a reign of terror in this iniquitous ruler's heart as among his poor persecuted subjects in Armenia, with this distinction, that in his case the terror is a guilty one, while theirs is innocent of evil memory or intent. Their case is not so pitiable as his.

Work in the Light.

By MRS. MERRILL E. GATES.

IT lately happened that a lady was repairing some garment of a dark colour. She wondered in an absent way why she got on so slowly, and why her work did not give her more satisfaction as she went along. The light by which she sat seemed to cast a shadow on her work. At last her sub-conscious state of dissatisfaction led her to move her lamp and lift her work up into such a position that the bright rays of light fell directly on the place where she was trying to set her hitherto ineffective stitches. She not only experienced at once great relief in the stress of her labour, but began to feel the joy which comes from the proper execution of a piece of work, no matter how insignificant, which begins to look as we fancied we could make it.

The work was the same and her ability was the same, but the work was far better and far more easily and happily and quickly done under the light which showed her so plainly where to set her stitches.

Work often seems a tedious unsatisfactory process, simply because the light does not fall on it.

What is true of the labour of our hands is also true oftentimes of our spiritual work.

What is the light in which we should hold the work we do for God? Let us take our missionary efforts, and see in what way it would be possible to make them at once more effective and more easy in their accomplishment.

The three great rays of primary light in which we must ever hold our work for this purpose, are:—1. The light of the command; 2. The light of the promise; 3. The light of the future of God's great plan for the world and its salvation. The threefold light which streams from these united beams will set any work for God in a blaze of clearness and glory.

The light of the command would be enough if we had no other to make our work very clear and very glorious. "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel." "Pray ye the Lord of the Harvest that He would send labourers into his harvest."

Add to this all-sufficing ray—the light of the promise. "My word shall not return unto Me void." He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him," and we have a noon-tide glory of hope and fulfilled purpose falling on our work.

Then, when we take those world-wide voices that chant a future universal kingdom of God upon the earth; when we look up and see a kneeling universe, fallen prostrate at the name of Jesus; when the sounding trumpet of the great Seventh Angel proclaims that the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ—our work is placed beneath a light that falls from the seventh heaven of God's glory. What more could we ask?

Let us bring our smallest and least significant work for God under this triple radiance of God's command, God's promise, and God's glory.

Armenian Relief.—Miss Clara Barton, of the American Relief Fund, has proceeded into the Armenian country. She had an interview with the Turkish Minister for the Interior, and received permission to undertake her mission of succour. The movement in America to raise funds for distribution among the Armenians is progressing very favourably.

Our Reasonable Service.

ROMANS XII. 1.

CHRIST gave Himself for us in the glory of his eternal sonship, and of his spotless holiness, to be a sacrifice for our sin. This might be a reason why we, in our helplessness and poverty, should give ourselves to Him. But there is a deeper reason still, for let us remember that in the day when He redeemed us from the hand of the enemy, He also purchased us as his own inheritance, wholly given to Him in our entire being by the Father, as the fruit of his obedience unto death.

This is shown in John xvii. 11, 24, "Those whom Thou gavest Me," "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me," and was an actual and completed transaction between the Father and the Son, ratified by the shedding of blood on Calvary, and sealed by the Divine Spirit, sent down to enter and take possession of the gift, not given only as a "glorious church" to Christ, but each individual chosen as a distinct temple for Him to dwell in.

According to the ritual of Jewish sacrifice the devoted thing was brought in its living, undivided condition to the priest, and the whole was included in the one offering. The offerer did not claim any part for his own use, neither did he come to the altar to take back any part of what the priest had laid upon it as his freewill offering. Neither did he speak again of giving any of the devoted thing to the Lord, because the whole had been already given.

Now, let us remember that we, body, soul, and spirit, are God's gift to Christ, the fruit of the travail of his soul on our account, when for us He sank in the "deep mire where there is no standing" (Psalm lxxix.) Therefore we cannot, in one sense, give ourselves; but we can "present" ourselves for his acceptance; we can set our seal to God's deed of gift; we can hold ourselves ready every moment for the blessed indwelling and outworking of his Spirit.

Or we can hold ourselves back—we can take again off the altar the gift, or any part of it, which was never our own, but his. He will not hinder us. We may, indeed, grieve his Spirit, and wound the heart pierced for us on the accursed tree; we may on our own part suffer present and eternal loss; but we are free agents either to present the lives that God has already given to Christ as our reasonable service, or to take back from the altar of consecration that which is only his. Which shall it be?

Our lips may be silent, we may shrink from the solemnity of expressing our choice, yet hour by hour our life is the answer which the eye of God reads as on an open page, and notes it in his book of remembrance (Malachi iii. 16). We are manifested in the light that searches out every purpose and every secret thought, and weighed in the balance of the sanctuary where all that is not of Christ comes short of the glory of God. A. E. W.

St. Patrick's Day.—The Dublin Council of the Evangelical Alliance invite Christians to unite in the observance of Tuesday, March 17 (St. Patrick's Day), as a day of Special Prayer for Ireland. They indicate that, "Since this Day of Prayer was first established, a remarkable and satisfactory change has taken place in the moral and social condition of the country. From being one of the most troubled and unsettled countries, it is now one of the most peaceful. While not overlooking the many and serious dangers which still threaten our national well-being, we devoutly thank God for the improvement which has taken place. While second causes have been at work, we gratefully recognise above them all the gracious hand of a prayer-hearing God."

Betting and Gambling.

AN APPEAL TO THE NATION.

WE believe that the public morals are being seriously affected in every class of society, while the national sports, especially horse-racing, are degraded by the development of betting and bookmaking, which are steadily increasing. The increase is to a great extent to be traced to the trade of the professional betting men, which has been allowed until recently to grow quite unchecked. That the danger of continued indifference to the evil has been at length recognised by the magistrates is shown by the multiplication of convictions, and by the severity of the remarks from the bench which frequently accompany the decisions.

The principles of English law in dealing with social evils, while respecting individual liberty, forbid temptation being placed in the way of others for profit; and this distinction seriously needs emphasising in the case of betting, by a systematic enforcement of existing laws, and of such amendments to them as public opinion may sanction. It has become necessary in this way to restrain the demoralising work of the bookmakers, whether carried on in the public streets or in places where they are allowed for an entrance fee to ply their traffic. And to the enforcement of the law must be added strenuous efforts, in every direction, to influence public opinion by that moral suasion which alone can be used in dealing with individuals and their action.

We have satisfied ourselves that the National Anti-Gambling League would in no way trespass upon the liberty of the subject, nor meddle to the slightest extent with the sports of the country. The evil it opposes is assuming the proportions of a grave social national peril. The Society has already done much by its unselfish educational labours to arouse and improve public opinion. Its funds are administered with economy; the principal part of its work is done without remuneration; all shades of religious and political opinion are represented by its members, and we consider that it is worthy of generous countenance and pecuniary support.

What God Said—What Man Said.

(Jer. vi. 16.)

1. The Word of the Lord.
Its power (Mark iv. 39).
Its purpose (Ps. cxix. 9).
2. Three things we are asked to do:—
"Stand still" (Exod. xiv. 13; Ps. xlv. 10)
"See" (John xii. 21; Heb. xi. 9).
"Ask" (John xvi. 24).
3. Man's way is—
Difficult (Ps. cxxv. 5).
Deceitful (Jude ii).
Dangerous (Matt. vii. 13).
Downward (Prov. xiii. 15).
4. We are to ask for "The good way," God's way, which is—Simple . . . "Come" (Matt. xi. 28).
Plain . . . "I am" (John xiv. 6).
Easy . . . Believing (John iii. 16).
5. Man's Answer to the Divine call:—
But they said, "We will not" (Luke xix. 14).

Letters from South Africa—7.

I AM indebted to Miss Emily Jacob for the following sketch of our visit to Genadendal, in continuation of the reference to it in my last.

R. C. MORGAN.

A MORAVIAN SETTLEMENT.

"In all the beauty and brightness of a South African summer we left Capetown on the afternoon of Friday, January 11, to visit the Moravian Mission Station at Genadendal, and to spend the Sunday with the missionaries working there. Our party consisted of Mr. Morgan, Miss E. Holt, and myself.

"Our road led us over much uncultivated moorland—brown and dry at this season, and would have been somewhat uninteresting but for the grand and rugged beauty of the mountains. Here and there we passed a diminutive plantation or a solitary clump of trees, but these were few and far between, and it was a great delight to us when, on rounding the brow of the last hill, we saw the Moravian settlement in its wealth of luxurious foliage, nestling in the valley beneath us.

"Genadendal! How vividly the word describes that spot of beauty! a veritable oasis in a wild and untilled tract of country; but you must visit the valley and understand something of its past history in order to appreciate in a deeper sense the appropriateness of its present name. Once known as Bavianskloof, or baboon's cliff, now rich in verdure and richer still in peace and true prosperity, it is a very real Genadendal or Vale of Grace, and once more, as of old, thoughts arise which can only find expression in the exclamation, 'What hath God wrought!'

"We had still some distance before us after entering the valley over the river which fertilizes it, called Zundereinder—without end—for it never runs dry. About twenty minutes' further drive brought us to the Compound, or centre of the settlement, and to a warm greeting and welcome from the missionaries. Several large trees shade this square; round it lie the church, the schools, the houses of the missionaries, the Training Institute, and the 'Logement,' or village inn. In the latter we found rooms prepared for us, and, after some refreshment, we were just in time to attend the service of song which is held on Saturday evenings.

"The church is a fine building, holding about 1400 people. In its present form it has been completed about four years, and was almost entirely built and provided for by the natives themselves. It is lofty and well lighted, and supplied with a good organ. Its only adornment is a massive wreath between each of the side windows and a large cross over the minister's table or desk. This is raised on a broad platform extending the whole width of one end of the church, and here sit the brethren who are not officiating, with their wives and children, facing the congregation. There are galleries all round the church, the organ and clock being in that opposite the platform. There is a small choir, and the singing is excellent. The men and boys occupy one side of the church, the women and girls the other, a high partition down the centre dividing them, as is the custom of the Moravians. All the women and girls, in lieu of bonnet or hat, wear a handkerchief, generally white, loosely knotted under the chin. The dresses are plain, and of a white or some light-coloured material, though there are few exceptions, and these as a rule very bright colours. The missionaries and their families are the only white members of the Settlement.

"The land granted by Government to this Moravian Station covers 5600 acres, and the whole of the cultivation and planting has been done by or under the direction of the missionaries, and where in bygone years there was nought but barrenness, there now exists luxurious growth of every description, and fruit of all kind abounds. The pine plantations flourish, while the oaks and other forest trees are vigorous and beautiful. The gardens are productive and well kept. Each head of a family has his own plot of land, which must be properly cultivated or else forfeited, for the rules of the station are strict in regard to sanitation, cleanliness, and order, both in house and land.

"The missionaries have supreme authority in the colony, but under them, of the people's own appointment from amongst themselves, they have officers equivalent to elders, deacons, and deaconesses.

"The settlement numbers about 3000, but many are absent during the week, or even for weeks together, at work or in service at distant places. There is but one policeman at Genadendal, and he is also the postmaster, a fact which speaks for itself of the characteristic peace and well-being of the station. A magistrate used to come once a month, but as there was so little to do he now only comes once in two months. There are one or two smaller stations in the neighbourhood, though at some miles distance, and these are visited on the Lord's Day by one or other of the missionaries.

"In addition to the direct spiritual portion of the work and the charge of his own district, each of the brethren is responsible for some special department which meets the need of the colony—the general store, the mill, the printing office, the gardens, etc., and the sisters, in addition to the ties of household and family, have each their special ministry in the community. There are at present seven missionaries now residing at this station, all married, though one had lost his wife about a fortnight before our visit, Mrs. Schutze having been called home a day or two after Christmas, leaving three little girls. Each missionary has his own house, with its true home life; but for the two most important meals of the day—dinner at 12 and supper at 6.30—all meet in the large dining-hall, only the little ones under four years of age being absent. Here they also assemble at 2 o'clock for coffee, when they have a short respite in their busy life and a brief opportunity for social intercourse, a chat over varied matters of general or home interests, or a discussion of new schemes for increased usefulness. Even at this hour the fingers are busy, and socks and stockings grow rapidly under the swift ply of 'mother's' knitting needles.

"The life of the Genadendal missionaries in a true sense responds to their name of 'United Brethren.' There is a real oneness of spirit in the little community, and the bond of love is a marked feature of the workers in that happy valley. The sorrow in one home is the sorrow in each, and what brings joy to one household is the source of gladness to all.

"At the close of the service of song, we returned with Herr Hennig, the superintending missionary, to his house, and spent a happy hour with him and his wife, in hearing much of the work of the mission past and present. We were shown the New Testament given by George Schmidt, the first missionary of the station, to one of the early Hottentot converts, and presented by her, fifty years later, to the three missionaries who returned when allowed to take up the work which had been so long abandoned. Blind Lena's Testament is treasured in the station, and kept in a box specially made for it from the wood of the first pear tree planted by George Schmidt. Later on, we were shown the staff presented by Her Majesty to the last Hottentot chief and bearing the royal insignia.

"Early hours are kept, and at 7.30 on Sunday morning we breakfasted with Mr. and Mrs. Hennig, after family prayer, and then visited the class held at eight o'clock for the candidates for baptism or fellowship. At 8.30 a short liturgical service was held in the church, and at 9.30 the morning service and sermon. The latter Mr. Morgan preached from Rev. i. 5-6, Mr. Gunther interpreting into Dutch. The services were most hearty, all joining in the responses, and the singing really beautiful. Nothing could surpass the reverent and earnest attention of the whole congregation throughout.

"It was our privilege while at Genadendal to be received into the large family, and during our stay there we had all our meals with the missionaries, and greatly enjoyed this little share in the home life. We rested for an hour before dinner, and then repaired to the dining-hall. We had unwittingly but providentially chosen the annual missionary Sunday for our visit. This is quite a festival in the valley. The morning had been ushered in by German chorales from the band of the Boys' Training Institute, and there was even more music than usual in the services throughout the day. At 2.30 there was a large open-air gathering under the trees, when almost all the missionaries spoke, giving an account of the work of one and another of the distant Moravian Mission stations, such as in Labrador, the West Indies, Australia, Alaska, etc., and Herr Hennig gave an account of the early days of their own station.

"It was a pretty sight, the little ones in front, the women to the left, the men to the right, the children sitting on the grass, the adults on forms or standing in groups, and behind the boys of the Institute with their band instruments, supported by the choir, and all gathered round the missionaries. It was touching to watch the changing expressions on those dark countenances, and to see the very real love they had for the cause, which they were so anxious to do all in their power to support. Every shade of colour was represented, from the coal black of the Kaffir, to almost white; many of the children are remarkably pretty. There was a hearty response when the plates were handed round not only at the missionary meeting, but after the morning service.

"After the people had dispersed, we wandered through the cool woods, by the little river, and then into the cemetery, so fitly called by the Brethren 'God's Acre.' Some of the very first missionaries lie there, and many little ones, and the newly-made grave where so lately one of those devoted workers had been laid to rest was covered with flowers, loving tributes to the dear wife and mother who had been amongst them but a few days before. At 7 o'clock the church was again well filled, and Mr. Morgan's message was deduced from the story of Abraham's sacrifice. After the evening service, we all gathered at the Training Institute for teachers, and spent a pleasant hour of singing with the young men, whose leader is an accomplished musician.

"On Monday morning we visited the schools. All the teachers are coloured; Dutch and English are taught, and the fourth standard has to be passed to secure the Government grant. There is a capital kindergarten, and an industrial school in which straw-plaiting and basket work are taught. About 500 children attend the schools.

"The happiest visits must have a close, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon we said good-bye to our new friends, and started for our long homeward drive of sixty miles, which we broke, as in coming, at Caledon. Mr. Hennig accompanied us to Cape Town on his way to visit other Moravian Mission stations in the Colony.

"I thank God for those two days of communion with his honoured servants at Genadendal—for the lessons of faithfulness and self-sacrificing love gleaned from their bright example, and the new proof of the all-satisfying portion of those whose lives are spent in the service of Christ."

Prayer and Effort.—Public meetings of the friends and supporters of Dr. Barnardo's Homes will be held in the Lower Exeter Hall, Strand, London, W.C., on Monday, March 30. Admission by ticket, free. A statement as to the thirty years' work of the Homes will be laid before the meetings. Plans will be considered for raising the proposed reserve or foundation fund, and the difficulties of the situation will be laid before God in the prayers of his people.

A Prophet in Fustian.

THE men were taking the new organ into a little chapel by the roadside in the village of W——, and as they did so, a man clothed in fustian, leaning against the chapel railings, remarked, "Ah, now, I aint never heered one o' they things, but I guess 'at they've got the wheedlin'est voices it 'ud be possible to hear. Shouldn't marvel if the wust soul in the village was caught by the sounds of it, and whisked into the service o' the Almighty before he knew what was happenin'. Mark my words, now!"

"There's no one needs that change more nor yourself, Jim," remarked the chapel-keeper, as she shook and brushed a pew-cushion, and watched Jim's retreating figure up the village. He did not hear her, however, and went placidly on his way.

"Sort of a prophet in fustian, I should say," one of the organ-men observed to the woman. "Looks as if he knew what the inside of a gaol was like, by the cut of his hair."

"Ah, he's a nice sort, he is," said the chapel-keeper; "when he ain't in gaol he's poaching, and when he ain't poaching he's in gaol; and when he ain't neither, he's drunk, and beating his wife."

Meanwhile the subject of this conversation had entered the bar of the "Old King Cole," the village public-house, and was qualifying himself for the third stage in the chapel-keeper's category of occupations he was wont to indulge in. All the afternoon he was in a state of stupor, and as he emerged from this into the quarrelsome and brutal stages so well known and shunned by his wife and children, he could scarcely be recognised for the genial wayfarer of the morning, whose words had seemed so brotherly.

As the evening shadows lengthened, his wife watched him preparing to go out. She ventured to speak.

"Jim, do be careful! You're not yet sober, and they've doubled the keepers. Suppose you get shot or took!"

"Ah! If I didn't know no more'n a poor, stupid thing like you, all sorts o' horrors med happen. But as it is, though I be full o' liquor, I'm worth a hundred o' you."

A storm was brewing, so his wife kept out of his way, and saw no more of him until he was brought home in the morning with both his legs broken, and the discharge of his gun in his face and in one hand. He was unable to speak; but when Dr. Parslow had set the broken bones and had dressed the flesh wounds, he turned to Jim's wife.

"He may do," said he, "but I doubt it. It will be a tough case, and you'll have your hands full, my good woman. By all accounts he's not been the best of husbands?"

"People will talk, sir," said the wife, "but there's a many worse nor he. I be sad to see 'un lying there so still."

Her devoted nursing and care were rewarded by the doctor's saying, at the end of about eight days—

"Well, you've saved him—he is on the safe track, and he's got to thank you for it. But he will always be lame."

As Jim got better he explained, as well as he could, how the accident happened.

"I'd a thought what my old woman had said about the keepers, and I says to myself, 'Lie low,' I says. Then I crept into the hedge off the Warren preserves, and I took a sip o' Dutch courage. I could hear the keepers plain as plain, and I was on the watch. Presently I thought as I heard my mates a comin' along the road, and I stepped out to warn 'em; but I see nothin', only I heard a voice I knew to be Bill Tucket's, the head keeper, and I give a frightened jump back. That were nearly my death, for I'd a sprang into the ditch backwards, and to save my gun goin' off I let my legs go, and they doubled under me—broke clean above the ankles. I knew it, but I said I wouldn't be caught that time, and I listened for the voices o' my pals, but the pain was too much for me, and I must a gone off."

"But how about the gunshot wounds?" asked the doctor.

"Ah, I were comin' to that. When I come round a bit I began to feel for my flask, and in tryin' to turn, I just touched my gun, and bang went the whole charge into my face and hand. Well, that finished me, for I can't remember no more till I found myself lyin' here, and pretty uncomfortable I found myself, I can tell you!"

Two months later Jim took his first walk out, upon crutches. "After three months teetotal I'm a goin' to see if I can't forget it, in the bar o' the 'Old King Cole,' and I shan't tell doctor."

Now there was one in the parish who thought of the soul of poor Jim, and that was Jim's wife. Knowing of his curiosity in regard to the new organ, she had supplicated the organist, who was also the schoolmistress, to waylay her husband with sweet sounds on the eventful afternoon of his first outing. It was a half-holiday, the chapel was again being dusted, and as fate (in the shape of the thoughtful chapel-keeper) would have it, a chair or two, in the process of work, had been placed outside the door. The swelling notes of the new organ floated out on the air, and the vox humana stop being out, a pathetic appeal arrested Jim as he reached the chapel door. Tears started to his bleary eyes, he sat himself with difficulty on one of the friendly chairs, and gave himself up to the pleasure and pain of "the wheedlin'est voice it 'ud be possible to hear."

Then the "Hallelujah Chorus" woke up all the spirit that was partially stifled in Jim's hardened heart; and "In Native Worth" brought about a tender change of feeling. He was glued to the spot—the tenderness of convalescence, the balmy airs of the afternoon, the thought of childhood, which good music ever awakens, clung to him, and like the ministers of God they were, awoke slumbering thoughts of better things in the poacher's breast. But when the organist, as a final (and unconsidered?) performance, played Gounod's "Nazareth," all the fountains of Jim's nature were broken up, and he sobbed like a little child.

The "Old King Cole" did not see him that day—he crawled home, and everyone marvelled at his new quietness and patience. Next Sunday all W—— was electrified, and God's children were glad, to see Jim sitting in the little chapel, his wife and his crutches beside him, and tears stealing down his cheeks as he tried to sing, in an unaccustomed voice, the songs of Zion. "Eh, dearie me, it does my heart good to see him here," said the chapel-keeper to Jim's wife, as she lingered behind. "I don't forget what he said the day the organ came in." And then she repeated Jim's prophecy, said in a jest.

One quiet day Jim arose with a new resolve in his heart; it was purely his own, for no one had attempted, outwardly, to influence him in this matter, knowing that, in his case, it might hinder the good work for which they and their minister were so definitely beseeching God. In the dusk of the evening he set forth, and no one asked him where he was going. It was the evening of the prayer-meeting, and he had to pass on his way thither the cottage of bedridden Molly Haines. As he passed, he thought he would just peep in and give her a surprise. He gently opened the door, and at once saw that six persons were on their knees, and one was praying.

He knew this one to be the minister by his voice—it was not light enough to see him—and he heard for whom he was praying, "our dear, long-sought brother, James Crawley." He listened—his heart seemed to stand still, and when the voice of his own wife took up the petition, and he heard her say: "Oh, Lord, Thou canst save his soul as Thou hast saved his body. Thou canst keep him from sin, from the drink, from all forgetfulness of Thee; Thou canst heal him and help him. Thou canst fill his heart with love, and make him thy dear son, a kind father, and my good husband —," he could restrain himself no longer—flinging himself upon his knees in the doorway, he cried out: "Ah, do this, Lord, for my Saviour's sake, for my wife's sake, for I long to walk in the way of righteousness!"

And God answered, as is his wont, with showers of blessing, so that others beside Jim came to Him that night, and the prayer-meeting became a praise-meeting in the chapel, and Jim is God's sturdy, faithful son all the days.

"How true you spoke that day of the organ's coming!" says the chapel-keeper. "Someone called you a prophet in fustian."

"Did he?" says Jim, "well, you know I'm a brand plucked from the burning." And he limps off, for he will be lame all his life.

Scottish National Bible Society.

THE annual meeting of the National Bible Society of Scotland was held last week in the Christian Institute. Sir John N. Cuthbertson, chairman, said that this year the number of copies of Scriptures was larger than that of any previous year, and the contributions also exceeded those of any other year. The largest number of copies of Scripture had been circulated at home, but the great mass of the publications had been circulated in heathen lands. The agents numbered 500.

Mr. Sloman read an abstract of the report. Unless the income be enlarged, the present policy of expansion must soon be restricted. It was worthy of note that every second book went to a heathen, one in every six to a Roman Catholic, three out of every four to men of foreign speech. The charity of the Bible Society began at home, but embraced the world. The total issues since the union of 1861 amounted to 15,654,307 Scriptures, of which nearly ten millions had gone to foreign countries and the colonies.

Rev. Dr. MacEwen said that one of the most striking facts stated in the report was the extraordinary ingenuity of the colporteurs in carrying out their labours. One French agent during a holiday travelled on a tricycle and disposed of 3,800 copies of Scriptures. The agents also incurred dangers—in Austria the danger of imprisonment, and in Spain the danger of losing their lives. The saddest report was from Turkey, where only 1,000 copies were circulated last year, and from Syria, where the circulation was 120.

Rev. G. Gladstone said that never before was the Bible more subjected to criticism; but wisdom was justified of her children. Reaction had already set in, and we could afford to possess our souls in patience, as we saw the gracious Word retained all its old power and its old adaptation to the needs of man. Mr. Gladstone spoke of the fundamental position upon which the society was based, and the reasons why further efforts should be put forth to promote the work of the society. Dr. George Smith and Mr. James Murray also spoke.

Home for City Workwomen.—For nearly fourteen years the Convalescent Home for City Young Workwomen has carried on a quiet work among the City workwomen, and 3000 have since it was opened paid longer or shorter visits to it. A debt burdening the Home has by a sale of work been reduced to £10, and we are very anxious to get this cleared off before the close of our financial year in March, and before our busy season begins. Last year we had to disappoint many girls who could not afford to pay for a rest in the country, and we shall be so sorry to have to refuse deserving cases during the coming summer. We have a good supply of work over from our sale, and if any lady would offer a room and be willing to invite her friends to buy it would probably clear our present debt of £10. Further particulars, with a report, would be forwarded to anyone applying for it.

OUR DAILY HOMILY.

SUNDAY, March 8.

"AND IT CAME TO PASS IN THOSE DAYS WHEN THERE WAS NO KING IN ISRAEL."—Judges xix. 1.

It will be sufficient to ponder these words, which occur four times in this book, without reading further in this terrible chapter, which shows the depths of depravity to which man may sink apart from the grace of God. Where Christ is not King, drunkenness, impurity, cruelty, selfishness are supreme, and pursue their ravages unchecked.

The Book of Judges depicts the state of the heart which has not admitted the Kingship of our Saviour. Where there is no recognition of this, and a man does as he likes, then the heart breeds all manner of uncleanness, and sin when it is finished bringeth forth death.

In connection with the present marvellous movement afoot in our colleges, 500 Japanese students met recently under the motto, "Make Jesus King." Oh that this might be our life-motto!

Let young men and women, who may read these words, specially ponder this suggestion. Perpetual failure in life indicates failure in consecration. If you are continually broken in upon by raids of evil, it is certain that you have never enthroned the Son of God. He is never Saviour in the fulness of his power till He is acknowledged King. Directly the coronation has taken place, He assumes the responsibility of putting down all rule, authority, and power; overcoming the evils that had held sway; and bringing every thought into captivity. Such are the warnings and appeals of this chapter and the following. "Make Jesus King."

MONDAY, March 9.

"AND PUT AWAY EVIL FROM ISRAEL."—Judges xx. 13.

The earnestness and promptness with which Israel dealt with and put away this evil thing were very commendable. They had gathered from all the land, even from Gilead beyond the Jordan. They were knit together in a perfect unity of feeling and action. They resolved to subordinate all things beside to the excision of this evil.

So must it be in the Church. The Lord Himself took Ananias and Sapphira out of the infant Church; and the Apostle very earnestly besought and commanded the Corinthians to put away from among them the wicked person, who had committed a sin that would not be named among the Gentiles. "Christ, our Passover, is crucified for us;" therefore, we must purge out the old leaven before we can keep the feast (1 Cor. v.).

At the close of this age God will send forth his angels, to sever the wicked from among the just, and to cast them into the furnace of fire.

In our own life it is impossible altogether to avoid contact with such people. Indeed, to do so, as the Apostle says truly, we must go out of the world. But we can abstain from their friendship and company. It is an altogether different thing to have dealings with a worldly man in business, and to admit him into bosom fellowship and comradeship in our leisure hours. The first is permissible, but not the second; else our companions will seduce us from our loyalty to God. Beware of taking on the colour of the ground on which you lie.

TUESDAY, March 10.

"WE HAVE SWORN BY THE LORD."—Judges xxi. 7.

Amid the gross evils of this time, the people of Israel were very tenacious of their vows, which had been ratified in the presence of God, and under the solemn sanctions of the tabernacle. Because they had sworn not to give their daughters in marriage to Benjamin, they had to devise an expedient to obtain wives for the 600 who had escaped massacre, that the tribe should not become extinct.

The same spirit was manifested by Jephthah, when he said, "I have opened my mouth to the Lord, I cannot go back." No doubt there was the implied conviction that God would avenge the violation of an oath solemnly taken in his name.

What new emphasis is added by this conception to the words of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "God, willing to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath." Since He could swear by no greater He swore by Himself, that He would bless and multiply Abraham and his seed. If then you are of the faith of faithful Abraham, you have the right to claim the fulfilment of God's promise in this double aspect: He will bless and multiply. And it is impossible for Him to alter or fail in the word He hath spoken.

The Psalmist said that God's statutes, i.e. the things which He established, were his songs. Surely we have every reason to sing, who know that the covenant of God's love is as steadfast as his throne. Let us turn his statutes into songs.

WEDNESDAY, March 11.

"CALL ME NOT NAOMI, CALL ME MARA."—Ruth i. 20.

So she spoke, as many have spoken since, not knowing that God's ways are ways of pleasantness and all his paths peace, when they are not isolated from the plan of our life, but considered as parts of the whole. We cannot pronounce on any part of God's dealing with us, until the entire plan has been allowed to work itself out. How grieved God's Spirit must be, who is lovingly doing his best, when He hears these words of murmuring and complaint. Let us lift the veil, and notice the pleasant things in Naomi's life.

True, her husband and sons were dead, but their deaths in a foreign land had left her free to come back to her people and her God; to nestle again under the wings of Jehovah; and to share the advantages of the tabernacle.

True, Orpah had gone back, but she had Ruth, who was better to her than seven sons.

True, she had no male child to perpetuate her name, but the little Obed would, within a few months, be nestling in her aged arms, and laughing into her withered face.

True, she was very poor, but it was through her poverty that Ruth was brought first into contact with that good man, Boaz; and, besides, there was yet a little patrimony which pertained to her.

Yes, Naomi, like thousands more, thou must take back thy words. Thou didst deal bitterly with thine own happiness in leaving the Land of Promise for Moab, but God dealt pleasantly with thee in thy return and latter end.

THURSDAY, March 12.

"UNDER WHOSE WINGS THOU ART COME TO TRUST."—Ruth ii. 12.

In after days this was a favourite image with David in his wanderings and escapes among those same hills. Perhaps he had received it as a fragrant legacy from the life of his good ancestor Boaz. At least on one occasion Jesus employed it in saying that He had wished to gather Jerusalem, as a hen her chicks.

How warm, cosy, and safe the chickens are, when they have gathered under the wings of the brooding hen. It must be a very heaven for them. The storm may roll through the sky, the heavy rain-drops fall, the hawk may hover above, poisoning itself on its wings, but the body of the parent-bird is interposed between them and all that threatens. What wonder that the Psalmist said that he would hide under the shadow of God's wings, till all his calamities were overpast.

Are you sheltering there? Have you come out of the storm and tempest to hide there? If so, remain in happy confidence. God is between you and all evil or alarm. Be still; yea, be still.

If you have not come to trust under the outspread wings of the Cherubim, do as Ruth did. Leave the land of your nativity, the far country of Moab; leave your people and your gods; tear yourself away even from some twin-soul, dear as Orpah; come across the border-line, and glean in the fields of the Gospel. There you will meet with the true Boaz, and become affianced to Him, and live at home for evermore in the house of bread.

FRIDAY, March 13.

"THE MAN WILL NOT BE IN REST, UNTIL HE HAVE FINISHED THE THING THIS DAY."—Ruth iii. 18.

Boaz had many good traits—his religious demeanour and speech, his courtesy in greeting his servants, his refusal to take advantage of Ruth's trust; but none are more satisfactory as an index of a noble character than this well-known and acknowledged promptness of action, when he had once taken in hand the cause of the needy. From of old, Naomi had recognised this quality in her kinsman, and knew that he was a man of his word, who would assiduously complete what he had undertaken to perform.

It is a characteristic that we should do well to cultivate. Let us not arouse hopes, and finally disappoint them; let us not make promises to forget them. Our words should be yea, yea. Those who commit their cause to us should feel perfectly at rest as to our executing what we have promised.

How true is it of Jesus! For Zion's sake He does not hold his peace, and for Jerusalem's sake He will not rest. He has undertaken the cause of the Church, albeit that it is so largely composed of Gentiles, and He will not be in rest until the marriage-feast is celebrated. He has made Himself responsible for thee and me, and He will not rest until He has played the part of a Goad to the furthest limit, and accomplished our redemption.

SATURDAY, March 14.

"RUTH HAVE I PURCHASED TO BE MY WIFE."—Ruth iv. 10.

So this exquisite idyll, which began with three deaths and famine, ends with marriage rejoicings. Shall not all God's idylls end thus? Shall it be left to the dream of the novelist only, to make happy for ever after? God has eternity at his disposal, as well as time. Only trust Him; "thy darkest night shall end in brightest day."

It is impossible not to read between these lines, and see the foreshadowing of another marriage, when the purchase of the Church shall issue in her everlasting union with the Son, in the presence of God the Father. Let us, however, apply these words to ourselves as individuals.

The Lord Jesus has purchased us to be his own, not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with his precious blood.

He has purchased also our patrimony; this earth is his; and shall be yet rid of all intruding evil, to shine as the brightest jewel in his crown.

He has received the shoe, the symbol of dominion and authority. He is not only our lover, but our Lord.

He waits to take us to Himself, in a love that shall not cease, and compared to which all the love we have ever known, is as moonlight compared with sunshine.

Wigan's Evangelistic Mission.—The report of this mission, carried on in Queen's Park Tabernacle, Queen's Park estate, Harrow-road, shows vigour and go in the various branches of the work. The Sunday-school and other agencies for the children are flourishing, while the Gospel open-air and tent services have been greatly blessed. It was no uncommon thing last season to see more than a thousand working men and women listening to the Gospel. Mr. Henry Wigan may be addressed, 13, Albert-gardens, Albert-road, Kilburn, N.W.

Slade Mission, Plumstead.—The report states that the attendance at the Gospel services has steadily increased, and there has been much real blessing. The open-air band continued its work during the summer months. The prayer meetings have also been well attended. The monthly cottage and B.W.T. gatherings have been a means of much blessing to many. An addition has just been made to the mission of a fine class room. The Sunday-school has also been much blessed. The treasurer is Mr. J. G. Brodie, 1, Gossage-road, Plumstead.

Uncle Tom at the Seaside.—2.

IT is quite a long time since I had a chat in this column with my young friends; but you know you have kept me pretty busy with the questions and answers of the Bible Searcher, so that I have been glad of the help of other kind writers whose articles I hope you have enjoyed reading week by week.

I had about two hundred nephews and nieces when we had our last talk about the sea, seven weeks ago, and now I have got nearly a thousand. So I think it is quite time we met each other again, even if it is only in print.

When you go to the seaside in your holidays you know how crowded the sands are with children of all sizes, and their parents too. But at this time of year they are almost deserted, and in many places you would not see a dozen children upon them in a day. Most fathers and mothers are engaged at business or at home, and have not time to spend a fortnight or a month by the sea, except during the summer; so that the visitors who go there in the winter are principally of two kinds—either those who do not have to work for their living, and can go when they like to where they like; or else those who have been ill and have gone away to get strong again.

"Ah," I think I hear some of you say, "I know which I should like to be. I should like to belong to the first kind, and have no work, no school, and no lessons to do. What a jolly time I should have!" Yes, I daresay you would; but, you know, you would soon get tired if you never had anything to do but idle away your time. Of course I know that—

All work and no play
Makes Jack a dull boy, and I like to see children enjoying a good game, and I think Jesus does too. But I once knew a boy who, when asked what work he did at school, said, "There's so much play to be got through, I've got no time for work!" Well, he's grown up now, and I'm afraid he still thinks too much about games and sports, so that he neglects many more important things and does not make the best use of his life. And children who play when they ought to be working are likely to grow up useless men and women.

So I want you to remember that it is not always the people who have least to do, or who think only of their own pleasure, who are the most happy. Read Eccles. ix. 10; Col. iii. 23; 1 Cor. x. 31.

Now, what about the other class of people at the seaside—the invalids? "Oh," you say, "I don't want to be one of them. I like to be able to run about, and feel quite well and strong." I'm sure you do; so do I; and when we see pale, delicate persons just able to sit out upon the sea-front, we feel sorry for them, and are, I hope, thankful to God for our good health and strength.

I expect you very often do things, and want to do others, in which you say, "there is no harm"; and because there is "no harm" in this or that you think it is right. But here is a little lesson I want you to learn from these poor invalids. They are "doing no harm" as they walk, leaning upon their friends, or are wheeled along in bath chairs. But you said just now that you do not want to be like that; then you must not be content with "doing no harm." You must aim to make your life a useful one, by doing all the good you can in all the ways you can; and thus follow the example of our Lord Jesus, who "went about doing good."

Whenever you feel unhappy, do something to help someone else, and that will make you feel better yourself. This verse suits young and old:—

If sad at heart upon thy way,
When thou art left alone,
Give joy to others every day,
And thus secure thine own.

Now one of the reasons why both these classes of people go to the seaside in the winter is because they find more sun and less fog than in the smoky towns and cities. At Brighton, for instance, a notice is put up every day to say what the weather is like in London. We all like the bright sunshine better than a dark, cloudy day, and I remember once how glad I was at being there on a bright, sunny day, when I read that in London there was a thick, yellow fog. I wonder if, when you have done something to displease your parents, it ever seems to you as if there was a cloud between you and them. You feel uncomfortable in their presence until you are forgiven; then it is like getting into the sunshine to have their kiss and smile once more. In the same way sin comes like a cloud between us and God, and to be really happy we must seek his forgiveness for all our wrong-doing, and try to please him. Then our life will be pleasant to ourselves, and other people will enjoy its sunshine as it falls upon them.

These are three lessons for you to learn, then:—(1) Be earnest in whatever you have to do. (2) Try and make other people happy. (3) Live in the sunlight of God's love. Then you will, like Jesus, "grow in favour with God and man."

The Bible Searcher.

Answers to these competitions are acknowledged in two lists:—

1. Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue. 2. Those received later, in the one following.

But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the competition appears.

ABOUT PRIZES.

On March 26 there will be special "Bible Searcher" Questions, for which prizes will be given. But only those boys and girls will be allowed to compete whose names have appeared in the lists as "correct" nine times during the twelve preceding weeks.

Those who have joined too late, or have been unsuccessful too many times, to make up nine "correct" weeks by that date, must wait till the next Prize Questions, of which I shall tell you in good time. But you see how important it is for you to send "correct" answers every week if possible, so that you may be able to compete for the prizes when they are offered.

A Dog's Fatal Mistake.

I READ in the newspaper the other day that a gentleman with a fine Newfoundland dog went to stay at a hotel in New York.

One evening the proprietor was surprised to hear the dog howling, and went upstairs to see what was the matter. As the bedroom door was locked, he burst it open, and found to his horror that the man had taken poison to kill himself. Of course he ran to help him, but the dog, thinking he was going to hurt his master, would not let him go near. Consequently the man died before any help could be given him.

Poor old doggie, he was so fond of his master and so faithful that we can hardly blame him, but you see what an unwise friend he was.

Dear lads, remember that some companions who perhaps are very fond of you may one day prove to be very false friends, if they make fun of good things and prevent your being helped towards God by your teachers and parents. Be very careful what sort of friends you choose. "If sinners entice thee, consent thou not" (Prov. i. 10). UNCLE TOM.

A Child Shall Lead Them.

SOME time ago a missionary from Madras was travelling through crowded villages, and received an invitation to go to one never before visited. On his arrival, the people collected around him, and begged him to send them a missionary and a schoolmaster to teach them "the sacred Book." The missionary asked them, "What do you know about my sacred book?" And an old man sitting near him answered, "I know a little of it," and began to repeat in Tamil the first two or three chapters of St. John's Gospel. To his surprise, also, he found that the man was totally blind. He asked how he could possibly have learned so much, when the man answered that a lad from some distance, who had been taught in a mission school, had for months been working in this village, and had brought with him a part of the New Testament. He had read this aloud so often that the blind man had learned it by heart, and although the boy had left the village some time before, not a word of these precious truths had been forgotten.—Missionary Link.

Santals and the Gospel.

By SELMA COLLIANDER, LUND, SWEDEN.

TRAVELLING by railway from Calcutta, one reaches the frontier of Santalistan in five or six hours, and from Rampur Haut Station it is a distance of but twelve miles, on a broad and good high road, up to Ebenezer, the station of the Scandinavian Santal Mission. The frontier of the country towards the North is principally formed by the river Ganges. There the Santal people, a branch of the original inhabitants of India, but belonging to quite another race than the Hindoos, live in the lonely valleys of the low and inaccessible but very beautiful Vindhya mountains. The complexion of the Santals is dark; they have thick lips and glossy hair, and are more strongly built than the Hindoos. Their language is very rich, having more than fifty different sounds; the verb has twenty-three tenses and so many forms that it can give expression to the finest shades of thought.

The Santals believe in one Almighty God and Creator. They call him Thakur; but they themselves say that they have given up worshipping him, as he is good, and does not do them any harm. Instead of him, they adore the devil, Marang Burn, and all the other demons, the Bongaes, and serve them by all kinds of sacrifices, as well as by drunkenness and other vices.

FORTY YEARS AGO

these people worked their way up from the south of India, being considered to belong to one of the lowest of the races of Hindustan. They were oppressed by their neighbours, the Bengalese usurers, who, as farmers of the taxes, ground them into the depths of poverty and ruin. Indeed, the Santal nation would certainly have become quite extinct if God had not sent them his Gospel at the eleventh hour, and Christian missionaries to befriend them and strive for their enlightenment, relief, and elevation.

About 1855, Mr. Droese, a Church of England missionary at Bhagalpur, who was working amongst the Paharis of the Rajmahal Hills, extending his labours southward, came across the north extension of the Santali migration; he did not know their language, but at their request opened village schools amongst them. Subsequently Mr. Puxley, at his own cost, placed himself at the service of the C.M.S., and taught them the Gospel in schools and by preaching. In 1863, Rev. W. T. Storrs was removed by the Church Missionary Society from Lucknow to Bhagalpur. He knew Hindustani and Persian, and after some study sought, by framing addresses in Santali, to bring home the Gospel to the understandings and hearts of the people. Since then the operations of the Church Missionary Society have realised great extension, and lately a band of associated evangelists has been resolved on.

WORK OF SCANDINAVIAN MISSIONARIES.

In 1867 Hans Peter Borresen, a Dane, and L. O. Skrefsrud, his intimate Norwegian friend, began evangelistic work amongst the Santals, first on their own responsibility, and afterwards in union with the Scandinavian Lutheran Santal Mission. We cannot go into the sacrifices which they made to undertake mission work, nor the sufferings they endured at the beginning. At first these two men of God stood alone. They were in a foreign country without friends, and they had only a little money; in Germany and in their own country they were misunderstood and misrepresented. But God raised up Christian friends for them in Calcutta, who helped them in their distress.

In May, 1867, they began their missionary work amongst the Santal people, and for them alone. They resolved to give themselves up thoroughly to adaptation to them, and to every kind of effort and self-sacrifice for their conversion, amelioration, and elevation. They lived with the people, and followed their customs and manner of life, but it was long before they could break down the barriers that lay between the full confidence of the Santals and themselves as missionary immigrants. The neighbouring nations had been hard upon the Santals, and Mr. and Mrs. Skrefsrud were taken ill of the climatic fever, to which Mrs. Skrefsrud succumbed, and which so prostrated Mr. Skrefsrud that when his wife lay dying he had to be carried to her death-bed to take his farewell of her!

God at length enabled the missionaries to resume their work of evangelisation, and the very important auxiliary to it, the erection of their mission station. In the beginning of 1869 everything constituting the headquarters was ready. The houses were made of clay, with sloping roofs of straw, their outer walls two feet thick. The work was done by the two missionaries, with the help of the Santals. All the timber and ironwork was made by the missionaries themselves. The expenses of erecting the mission station, amounting to 10,000 rupees (about £2000), involved

GREAT AND STRENUOUS ENDEAVOUR.

Mr. Skrefsrud devoted his time to the study of the Santal language, whilst Mr. Borresen travelled about the country begging money from the rich Europeans who lived in that part of India. To find out the guttural sounds of the Santali tongue, Mr. Skrefsrud had recourse to the laryngoscope, and in order to command the spoken language, both the missionaries mixed freely with the people, and won their confidence.

Moreover, they accompanied the Santals on their hunting excursions, and sat and conversed with them round their nightly camp fires, and, as far as possible, joined in the habit of the hunters to relate stories and legends. The opportunities thus opened to them they embraced in order to relate stories from the Bible, and particularly to tell of the incarnation of the Son of God, and his atoning sacrifice, and of the pardon, salvation, and full redemption of man by faith in the efficacy of the expiatory sacrifice of Jesus Christ. At length the oral story of the manifested love of God to men in the gift of his Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life, supplemented by tracts and copies of the Holy Scriptures in the language of the Santals, which had been made for them and taught them by Mr. Skrefsrud, produced effects in the decided conversion of the people in considerable numbers to genuine discipleship to Christ.

(To be concluded.)

Malta Marriages.—A judicial settlement has at length been arrived at with regard to the question of the validity of mixed marriages in Malta, which was a good deal discussed during the tenure of the late Government. The subject was publicly discussed before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in February, 1894, but no judgment was given until July last; the judgment will be shortly issued as a Parliamentary paper. The Press Association understands that the effect of the judgment is to uphold the validity of marriages by Protestant clergymen between Protestants and Catholics in Malta.

The Canning Town branch of the Lockhart Mission reports that the work is spiritual, social, and philanthropic. "The Gospel of Christ is still our theme. At our adult meetings, in our Sunday-school, and also among the older members of our Band of Hope, many have been saved, and are now endeavouring to live the Christian life. In our temperance work we have also been encouraged in seeing many rescued from that terrible enemy, strong drink." During the winter efforts have been made to deal with distress in the district around. The superintendent is Mr. G. H. Driver, 8, Percy-road, Canning Town, E.

so at first the Santals regarded the missionaries with suspicion, and would have nothing to do with them.

Cow-houses served for lodgings until a hut of leaves could be built with money which Borresen had brought with him, the proceeds of property sold on leaving Berlin. A building plot was bought close to the country village Benagaria—the spot whereon Ebenezer, the present headquarters of the mission, is situated. The missionaries endured heroically the discomfort and unhealthiness of this manner of life, which at one stage in their early experiences was nearly the death of the missionaries, as it was of the wife of Skrefsrud; this was soon after their residence at the spot which they chose as the centre of their efforts. "A PRISONER OF THE LORD."

ABOUT a year ago we gave portrait and sketch of "a prisoner of Jesus Christ" the late Mr. James Talbert, of Dundee, who had lain for sixty-four years glorifying God in the furnace of bodily suffering. We were thankful to find how many tired ones were cheered and comforted by our brief story of one whose prison became his palace. But there are other and similar witnesses to the wondrous sustaining grace of God. We have lately been reading another "record of loving kindness and tender mercies" penned by one who has been a helpless pain-stricken sufferer for forty years.

BELLA COOKE, of New York, whose little room has been a place of precious communion for many saints, and the birthplace of many souls, was born in Hull in 1821, of godly parents, and brought up among the Methodists. Her early spiritual experiences were very vivid, her convictions deep and almost agonising. About the age of thirteen she believed herself converted, and apparently was, but does not think she entered into fulness of rest until later years. Marrying an earnest believer, she looked for a quiet home life, but financial loss came, and in 1847 they emigrated to New York. After some trying experiences in a strange city, a Christian sister, who became a true and constant friend, induced her husband to employ Mr. Cooke. This friend, Mrs. Lankford, was used to lead the young Englishwoman into a new sense of calm rest in God. And much was it needed, for the cloud of affliction was gathering fast. Already she had lost two babes, and now in 1849, after a few years of married life, her husband was taken from her by cholera. Her own account of her experiences at this time are pathetic, her sorrow is intense, yet her faith in God is calmly confident. The widow's God (Jer. xlix. 11) raised helpers for her, though darker grew the way; her baby was taken, and her own health was failing.

In 1852 she began to suffer much, and three years later went into the Women's Hospital. From the outset in her illness, loving earnest Christian doctors, ready to do anything for her, for Christ's sake, seem to have been raised. As one who came voluntarily and devoted to her years of constant care and willing gifts put it (on her objecting to his doing so much without hope of fee): "If He has given me a little more money and knowledge than you, ought you not to be willing to allow me, as his steward, to share it with you?" While still able to be about at all, she was constant in labour for the poor; and the interest did not fail, for right through her long continued helplessness she has helped and aided poor women by strong faith, constant prayer, and the gifts of loving friends who seemed to have been attracted by her presence and sweetness, and to have been glad to give or do just as she needed or wished.

Again and again, suffering from a complication of diseases, she seemed passing away, but came back from the margin of the river to suffer and witness yet awhile. The keynote of her letters at this time may be shown by one extract: "Remember, dear, that He who sits as a Refiner will not let the precious metal perish; but when his image is reflected He will say, 'It is enough,' and no matter how fiercely the fire may burn, He hath said. 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.'" This was penned forty years ago, and still the writer is glorifying God in the fire. Fifteen years after she says: "It has seemed at times while writing as if I was almost lifted up to the third heaven, and then I had to stop and weep with joy at the dealings of my Father, and exclaim, 'Glory! Glory! to Thee, Thou who art my Husband, Brother, Friend.'" Again, "Unable to speak, sight almost gone, almost in an agony of pain... yet I lay encircled in the arms of my Beloved, and was safe." The constant correspondence with her friends (often by amanuensis) reveals a marvellous spiritual insight. Her conversations with those who frequent her chamber are, as some of our readers know, remarkably fitted to call out longings after God, after intenser devotion and fuller service.

How singularly and closely her visitors and helpers for Jesus' sake became attached to to her, and she to them, is disclosed on each page of her story.* They find joy in ministering to every need, while she enters into their thoughts and interests, and when they are called home (as many have been in these long years) mourns them as friends beloved.

There are no more touching pages in the whole book than those in which she notes the calling home of her first and special friend, Mrs. Lankford, and long years after of another peculiarly dear friend, Mrs. Doremus, whose daughter having been trained to find joy in waiting on the invalid, promptly and gladly took her mother's place as closest of friends. Miss Doremus says that her mother's friendship with Mrs. Cooke lasted thirty years, and "has become an inheritance in the family."

Then, through it all, the poor are not forgotten by the helpless one—now we find "her room crowded by twenty-eight turkeys, and clothing and gifts" for distribution, the "Bella Cooke Bank" is opened and kept in funds by friends, so that the sufferer may draw from it at will for poor cases. All this and much more is simply in answer to prayer. She hears of need, lays it before God, and ere long some one—often a complete stranger—comes in, saying: "Are you praying for anyone in especial? I felt I must come. How much do you want?" Thus, an immense amount of suffering has been relieved. While herself a Methodist, her helpers seem largely to have been Friends, not that other persuasions are absent, but that Friends predominate.

This is no place to raise questions as to faith-healing; we merely, therefore, note that her book describes hopes held out by certain who hold such views. Dr. Cullis is stated (page 275) to have declared, "In three days she will walk." For such an helpless one, this was a very trying position. Her one thought was to bring glory to God. She knew He could heal her if He willed, but if she said anything she might unsettle others, so she kept silence and left it in her Father's hand. "I felt," she says, after such an episode, "I was just where God would have me."

One characteristic of these journals and letters is the care the author takes to record the names of loving helpers and ministrants. Hosts of them are unknown yet faithful servants of Christ; but some well-known names occur, such as Mr. Joseph Ashworth, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dodge, Virginia H. Field, Mr. George Müller, Dr. Cuyler, Miss Paterson, of India, Mr. Samuel Bettle, Jerry McAuley, Mrs. Prentiss, and Alice and Mary, daughters of Lord Mandeville. Many ministers and missionaries, too, are found seeking in her little room counsel and stimulant for fresh and fuller service. One such writes: "Never shall I forget her counsel and sympathy in trouble, and her heartfelt rejoicing when lost sinners are coming home to God. In that little chamber I have witnessed in this suffering woman a faith and peace which kings in vain might envy, and rich men give their gold to buy. There ministers have been helped to preach, and business men have learned fortitude and patience, amid the trials and struggles of life.

"Twenty-seven years have passed away since I first called on Sister Bella Cooke, and no one but herself knows her sufferings in the furnace of affliction. She still survives, a monument of patience and suffering, a beautiful illustration of the sustaining power of Divine grace. Who can tell how much consolation she has imparted to the afflicted? How much instruction to the inexperienced? How much sympathy and good cheer to all Christian workers who have known her!"

"RIFTED CLOUDS," from which we have drawn our information, is no melancholy record of sorrow; it is rather an inspiring book; bright from first to last with a beautiful spirit of calm repose in the goodness and mercy of the Lord.

France. — The Salvation Army's automotor Bible carriage for the spreading of the Gospel in the French fairs and markets has proved a success. During ten months I travelled over six thousand miles, visited over four hundred towns and villages in Normandy, Brittany, Burgundy, and the south of France, selling several thousands of Gospels and a quantity of general literature. I am on the point of starting for the east of France. ALLEN THOM.

Afflicted London Children.—The new enterprise of the committee of the Flower Girls' Christian Mission (Mr. John A. Groom, secretary, 8, Sekforde-street, Clerkenwell, E.C.) is an effort to reach the most suffering class of London juveniles. It is proposed to add three new houses to the waif girls' village which already exists at Great Clacton, one of which will be a holiday home for blind children, one for those who are deaf and dumb, and one for helpless cripples. In aid of the building and furnishing fund (£5000 being required) the Duchess of Teck has undertaken to open a sale and floral exhibition at the Holborn Town Hall on March 10, the sale to continue during the two following days. Contributions for the stalls should be sent to Mr. Groom as mentioned above.

By REV. J. STORJOHANN, CHRISTIANIA.

THE GRANTING OF THE PRAYER, AND THE THEOPHANY.

ONE of the greatest moments in David's history, as well as in that of Israel, is now drawing nigh; well prepared for by distress and anxiety, prayer and sacrifice, praise and prophecy. This decisive battle, in the third year of the famine, in which Lahmi Goliath was compelled to play a leading part, took place at Gezer or Gob (2 Sam. xxi. 19), the mountain pass through which the Philistines had time after time sought to penetrate into the valley of Aijalon* (see also 2 Sam. v. 25).

In four psalms David has sung this, the supreme experience of his life, an experience of Divine hearing and deliverance in a time of danger and distress, both to his life and his country. In Psalms xviii. and xxix. he addresses himself to Jehovah and to the angels; in Psalms lxvi. and cxxiv. to the heathen and to Israel in this great matter.

Psalm xviii. is altogether symmetrical, and its poetical construction provides an important clue to its comprehension. Like most of the longer psalms, it has a prologue and an epilogue, each of three four-lined strophes, which become evident by including the heading, so necessary to the full understanding of the psalm. It was needful to state that the song was sung to Jehovah.

The body proper of the psalm, the description of God's intervention by means of an earthquake, a thunder-storm, and a hurricane, and the panic thereby caused to the Philistines, is comprised in three sections, each of three four-lined strophes—verses 4-19, i.e. sixteen verses in all. The other corresponding part, how the victory was completed by God girding David with strength (32, 39) for warfare (30-34), to pursue and put the enemy to flight (35-40) and not to stop before all the Philistine strongholds were at last surrendered by the trembling enemy (41-45), also comprises three sections of three four-lined strophes, amounting altogether to sixteen verses. The middle of the poem is composed of two sections, each of ten lines, and is really the heart and centre of the psalm. Here David's personal perfection, based on the grace of God, appears as a motive, not a reason, for the salvation experienced (20-24), and, in addition, the universal law of God's dealing thereby comes to light. The number ten, as a complete number, is no doubt chosen with a purpose. The second section of the central part (25-29) takes up again the address to Jehovah as verse 1 in the prologue, and the body of the psalm may be regarded as consisting of two equal parts, viz., verses 4-24 and verses 25-45, and the whole psalm as of ten parts.

The central apologetic and doctrinal part excepted (verses 20-29), it will be seen that the psalm is plainly a historical description of what took place during the battle and pursuit, and that therefore it was quite suited to appear as David's war bulletin, so to speak, in 2 Sam. xxii., after the account of the Philistine war.†

* Curiously enough, this spot was refound in 1873 by the French Consul at Jerusalem, M. Clermont Ganneau, who was put on the track by means of an old Turkish chronicle, in which the place was mentioned; moreover, he found the name hewn in the rock itself.

† The text of 2 Sam. xxii., differing not a little from that of Ps. xviii., presents highly interesting questions to be solved. It is impossible that the writer of the later published account, in the Book of Samuel, can have arbitrarily changed the text of the well-known psalm. It is rather to be supposed that 2 Sam. xxii. is the first form in which this song appeared, in the very camp of the victorious army. The whole song is, in a certain way, David's answer to his warriors, who had asked him not to go into battle personally, that "the lamp of Israel might not be quenched." To this his answer refers: "Thou art my lamp, Jehovah" (29), which, later, in the liturgical song is altered to: "Thou lettest my lamp shine" (28). There are various indications that the two texts stand in the relation to each other of a soldiers' and people's song, and a more carefully treated liturgical song composed for the sanctuary. For this reason, we read over the psalm: "To the chief musician," but not over 2 Sam. xxii. The uncommon Aramaic expression in the introduction, "I love thee, O Jehovah, my strength," is suited to the Temple song, but not the war song.

PSALM XVIII.

For the Chief Musician.

By the servant of Jehovah, David,
Who spake unto Jehovah the words of this song,
In the day that Jehovah delivered him
From the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul.

1. He said: Heartily do I love thee,
O Jehovah, my strength!
2. Jehovah, my rock!
And my fortress, and my deliverer.
My God, my rock, in whom I take refuge,
My shield, and the horn of my salvation, and my tower.
3. As the Praised One, I called upon Jehovah,
And from mine enemies was I saved.

PART I.

1.

4. The cords of death compassed me,
And the floods of Belial terrified me;
5. The cords of Sheol were round about me,
The snares of death came upon me.
6. In my distress I called upon Jehovah,
And cried unto my God;
He heard my voice out of his temple,
And my cry before Him came into his ears.
7. Then the earth shook and trembled.
The foundations of the mountains moved and were shaken,
8. Because He was wroth smoke went up out of his nostrils,
And fire from his mouth devoured, coals were kindled by it.

2.

9. He bowed the heavens also, and came down,
And thick darkness was under his feet.
10. And He rode upon a cherub, and did fly;
Yea, He flew swiftly upon the wings of the wind.
11. He made darkness his covert, his tent round about Him,*
Darkness of waters, thick clouds of the skies.
12. At the brightness before Him his thick clouds passed,
Hailstones and coals of fire.
13. Jehovah also thundered in the heavens,
And the Most High uttered his voice
(Hailstones and coals of fire).†
14. And He sent out his arrows, and scattered them;
Yea, He shot out lightnings, and plunged them into panic.

3.

15. Then the beds of the waters appeared,
And the foundations of the earth were laid bare,
At thy rebuke, O Jehovah,
At the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
16. He stretched from on high,—He took me,
He drew me out of great waters,
17. He rescued me from my strong enemy,
And from my haters—because for me they were too mighty.
18. In the day of my calamity they fell upon me,
But Jehovah became a staff to me,
19. And He brought me out into a wide place;
He delivered me because He delighted in me.

PART II.

1.

20. Jehovah rewarded me according to my righteousness;
According to the cleanness of my hands He recompensed me.
21. For I have kept the ways of Jehovah,
And have not wickedly departed from my God,
22. For all his judgments were before me.

* In 2 Sam. xx. 12 this line is given thus: "He made darkness tents round about Him."

† In 2 Sam. xxii. 14 the repeated "hailstones and coals of fire" is omitted. It would disturb the regular strophical harmony. In this place it is inserted as a repetition of verse 12, for the further explanation of the word "voice."

And his statutes did I not put away from me.

23. I was also perfect with Him,
And I kept myself from my iniquity;
24. Therefore Jehovah recompensed me according to my righteousness,
According to the cleanness of my hands in his sight.
25. With the merciful Thou shewest thyself merciful;
With the perfect man Thou shewest thyself perfect.
26. With the pure Thou shewest thyself pure,
And with the perverse Thou shewest thyself froward.
27. For Thou,—Thou savest humbled people,
And haughty eyes Thou dost bring low.
28. For Thou,—Thou lightest my lamp;
Jehovah, my God, brightens my darkness;
29. For by Thee I have run down a troop,
And by my God I leaped over a wall.

PART III.

30. As for God, his way is perfect;
The word of Jehovah is tried;
A shield is He unto all them—
Who take refuge in Him.
31. For who is God* save Jehovah?
And who is a rock beside our God?
32. The God that girded me with strength,
And made my way perfect.
33. He it was who made my feet like hinds,
And made me stand upon my high places.
34. He it was who taught my hands to war,
So that my arms did bend a bow of brass.
35. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation,
And thy right hand has holden me up,
And thy condescension has made me great,— 36. Thou hast enlarged under me my steps, and my feet have not slipped.

2.

37. I pursued my enemies and overtook them,
And I did not turn, till they were consumed.
38. I shattered them and they could not rise,
They fell beneath my feet.
39. For Thou hast girded me with strength for battle,
Thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me,
40. And my enemies Thou hast made to turn their backs upon me,
That I might cut off them that hate me.

3.

41. They cried, but there was none to save,—
To Jehovah, but He answered them not.
42. Then did I beat them small like dust before the wind,
Like street mud I emptied them out.
43. Thou hast delivered me from stripes of the people;†
Thou hast made me the head of the nations.
A people whom I had not known,
Medid they serve.
44. At the hearing of the ear, they obeyed me;
The children of the stranger feigned obedience to me.
45. The children of the stranger faded away,
And came trembling out of their strongholds.
46. Jehovah lives, and blessed be my rock,
And exalted be the God‡ of my salvation.
47. Even the God that executeth vengeance for me
And subdued peoples under me.
48. Thou, my deliverer from my enemies,
Yea, above them that rose up against me, Thou lifted me up;
49. From the man of violence Thou rescued me;
Therefore will I give thanks unto Thee, Jehovah, among the nations.
50. To thy name also will I sing praises,
As to Him who magnifies salvations for his king,
And shows lovingkindness to his anointed,
To David and to his seed, for evermore.

* In these three lines "God" is successively the rendering of the Hebrew words Eloah, Elohim, and El, in the order now given.

† 2 Sam. xxii. 44, it is "the stripes of my people," as in Psa. cxliv. 2, which also shows the connection between the two psalms.

‡ In verse 46 the Hebrew is Elohim, in v. 47 El.

SIR,—The following letter from Dr. Pierson has been addressed to the little committee of personal friends who have arranged his present tour in England, and as it disposes of several points in the recent controversy, which has been a matter of sincere regret to them, they hope that you will kindly insert it in your next issue.—Yours truly,
